

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

DAY IS BREAKING.

Designed to be sung at an approaching Odd-Fellow's Festival.

BY REV. BRO. NELSON BROWN.

DAY is breaking!—day is breaking!
Soon will pass the gloomy night;
Rosy Morn is now awaking—
Ho! she comes, in robes of light.
Day is coming,—light is streaming
Gently from the smiling sky;
O'er the world the light is beaming—
Ho! old NIGHT is passing by.

Day is breaking!—up, each sleeper!
Ho! to work!—there's work to do!
Up, each sower!—up, each reaper!
Up, each brother, good and true.
Morn is coming!—who rejoices?
Every heart that throbs with love;
Hark! the glad some angel voices!

Love shall conquer;—clouds of warning
Flee before each golden ray;
Up, each sleeper!—for the morning
Brightens fast—behold! 'tis DAY!
Love shall conquer; then no longer
Hate's foul flag shall be unfurled;
Every day our ranks are stronger,
Gaining victories o'er the world.

Hark! the shouting!—hark! the shouting;
Hasten on, with sword and shield;
TRUTH old ERROR now is routing—
Soon we win the battle field.
We are brothers—we are brothers,
Working men, all good and true;
We can work as well as others;
Ho! there's work enough to do.

Tears are flowing—tears are flowing—
Love shall wipe them all away;
Broken hearts its power are knowing,
Sorrow's night is changed to day.
Light is beaming—light is beaming
Now in glory from the sky;
O'er the world its rays are streaming—
Love shall conquer by and bye.

French Nouvellette.

A LION IN LOVE.

BY FREDERIC SOULIE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH, FOR THE GAZETTE AND RULE.

CHAPTER I.

THE term lion, employed to designate a certain class of young Frenchmen, is of such general use, that I deem it unnecessary to enter upon a more particular definition of it in order to make it intelligible to my readers, as signifying something else beside the sanguinary tyrant of the forest, or the submissive slave of Mr. Van Amburgh.

This much being premised, I may venture to commence my story.

One day, not long ago, and about the hour of noon, a lion, of most admirable proportions about his chest, alighted from his carriage at the Café de Paris, his entrance into which created a lively surprise for two good reasons. In the first place, he was in full dress; and in the second, he called for his breakfast with the air of a man that has something to do, and who is in a hurry to be about it.

A friend of his turned upon him a look whose scrutiny was for once unassisted by the eye-glass, and said:

'Where the deuce are you going to, Sterny?'

'To a wedding.'

'Whose?'

Thereupon all heads were turned inquiringly, glances were exchanged, eyes were upturned wonderingly to the ceiling, and on all sides the question was naturally asked:

'Who is going to be married?'

Sterny saw this by-play, and hastened to put an end to it by saying:

'Oh, no one, gentlemen, no one of any consequence to you. This is a private affair.'

'And when will you get through with it?'

'Indeed, I can't say; but I shall manage to effect my escape immediately after the ceremony at church, when I shall be no longer wanted.'

'Wanted! how do you mean?'

'I mean that I am witness for the bridegroom.'

'Indeed!' was echoed on all sides.

'Yes,' resumed Sterny, who saw astonishment depicted on the countenances around him; 'the bridegroom is my father's godson. He wrote me, to that effect, a letter which left no excuse for refusing him a favor which he considers an honor. That is the whole secret; and now,' said Sterny rising, 'proceed with your breakfast in quiet, and farewell until this evening.'

As he was going out, one of his friends asked:

'Where does this marriage take place?'

'Really, I don't know. We are to meet at the bride's in St. Martin street, at noon; it is now quarter past the time—adieu.'

He disappeared, and although the circumstance was, in itself, sufficiently insignificant, it became the topic of conversation.

'The old Marquis Sterny,' said a retired potter's son, who professed a great respect for hereditary traditions, 'has kept up some of the patronizing customs of the old nobility, and, therefore, the part that Sterny is going to take in this affair is graceful enough, and in good taste, but, spite of his illustrious name, he don't understand the thing; and so, instead of being attentive and kind to those worthy people, he will go among them with an air of weariness, or of vanity; whereas, in fact—'

'Whereas,' interrupted an ex-beau of forty, whose claims to lionhood were disputed, who was a corpulent exquisite of undeniable ugliness, a sort of wealthy corn extractor, who called every woman he spoke to my dear, 'whereas, in fact, the whole affair might be pleasant enough; for there are some very pretty women to be found in that class.'

'Pretty, if you will,' said a real lion, whose existence was a problem, but whose individuality had a dash of the artist about it, which consisted in fostering whatever related to art or fancy; 'pretty I grant you, but it is still the lower class.'

'Oh, gentlemen,' said the potter's son, 'the old nobility took some notice of the lower classes.'

'No doubt,' replied the artist lion, 'of the lower classes of former times, I believe you.'

So saying the lion lighted his cigar, and with a chair supporting each leg, he gazed at the people passing by on the Boulevard. All the other lions gave themselves up to pastimes equally interesting, and not another word was said of Léonce Sterny.

In the meantime Sterney had reached Saint Martin street. On that day our lion had no particular appointment; there was to be no race, no drive to the woods, and he was not compelled to depart from the enjoyment of any pleasure for the two hours which he was about to devote to Prosper Gobrillon, his father's god-son. He might as well be bored there as any where; and so, neither attaching any importance to the step he was taking, he stopped at the house of Mr. Laloine, dealer in feathers, without having made up his mind to be in any particular mood; he was simply performing a task imposed upon him. He arrived just in the nick of time; he alone was waited for, as he clearly perceived, without any one making him sensible of it, and he did not deem it necessary to offer any apology for his delay. He was introduced to the bride, who did not dare to look at him, then to her parents, and he perceived that the young people present kept elbowing each other very significantly whenever he made a bow or spoke. Looking around in vain in search of some one under shelter of whose conversation he might escape from this annoying scrutiny, Sterney withdrew to a corner, while the family were taking the necessary measures preparatory to the departure, when a tall young woman suddenly entered, exclaiming:

'I told you that I would have time to change my dress before the arrival of your Marquis.'

'Lise!' exclaimed Mr. Laloine, rebukingly, while all present stood transfixed with astonishment at this outburst.

Mr. Laloine's looks, glancing toward Léonce, made his daughter sensible of the impropriety of her conduct, and she crimsoned with a blush, the like of which our handsome lion had never beheld.

'Forgive me, papa, I was not aware,' said she drooping her head; and Mr. Laloine going up to Sterney, said with a paternal air:

'She is a mere girl, not quite sixteen, and she does not know how to behave herself.'

Sterney looked at the mere girl, whose beauty seemed angelic.

'Is that your daughter?' asked he.

'Yes, Monsieur le Marquis, a spoiled child, whom we came very near losing in consequence of a terrible disease of the heart, and whom it is necessary that we should humor: that is the reason why I did not scold her.'

'Ah! then have the goodness to introduce me to her, and accept my apologies for my want of punctuality.'

'Don't mention it, sir,' returned Mr. Laloine, 'and pay no attention to that whimsical child.'

But that was not Sterney's way of thinking. Never had he seen any thing half so charming as this beautiful girl. While her mother was gently reproving her, and seemed to be advising her to be more circumspect, she had cast upon the lion a furtive glance, at once searching and not very favorable, and she wound up her mother's lecture by a slight gesture of impatience, plainly meaning, 'I was sure he would be a marriage.'

The party set out for the mayor's, and Léonce was placed in the bride's coach, in company with Madame Laloine, and one of the witnesses on the part of the family. Luckily the distance was short; those four persons felt remarkably awkward, and by way of conversation, Léonce's colleague found nothing better to ask, than—

'What is your opinion, sir, of the sugar question?'

Now, Sterney had no opinion on the subject at all; nevertheless he answered inoffensively:

'Sir, I go with the colonies.'

'Ah, I understand,' replied the other bitterly, 'the progress of national industry alarms you. It is clear that government intends to ruin everything in France.' And the speaker broached the sugar question, which lasted without interruption, until their arrival at the mayor's.

By this time Léonce had forgotten the beautiful Lise, and he began to find his task rather irksome. They reached the mayor's house, and just as Léonce stepped out of the carriage, he beheld the beaming countenance of Lise, who was alighting from her own. At that moment a slight confusion occurred, which was the prime cause, perhaps, of the whole of this story. Lise was leaning upon the arm of a tall young man, who rejoiced in the honor of being groomsman, and who was standing close by Sterney. Hearing her name called by another young girl immediately behind her, Lise turned around to replace a flower which had become disarranged in her head dress, while the groomsman stood motionless, with his arm curved like a loop to receive the beautiful arm of the youthful Lise. But, just as she had got through with the service she had been called upon to perform, a voice called the young man to the head of the procession; he withdrew, and Lise took the first arm within her reach, and which happened to be that of the handsome lion; she then turned quickly to him, saying:

'Come, let us make haste!'

At sight of Sterney, she uttered a faint cry, and wished to retreat; but Léonce pressed her arm, detained her hand, and said with a smile:

'Since fortune has favored me, let me profit by her favor.'

'Excuse me, sir,' answered Lise, 'but I am bridesmaid; I couldn't think of it; Mr. Tirlot might get angry.'

'And who is Mr. Tirlot?'

'Who!—why he is groomsman; it is his right!'

'A right which I would gainsay in the listed field,' said the young lion, who imagined he was making use of the most unmeaning phrase imaginable!

Lise looked at him with all her might, and answered, with some tremor in her voice:

'If that is the case, sir, let us proceed, and I will say that it was I who would have it so.'

These words, and the trembling tone in which they were uttered, convinced Léonce that Lise thought he was in earnest about the challenge to the lists, and that she was quite sure that the Marquis would slay the groomsman if he dared to find any fault with his arrangements. All the company had by this time entered the municipal hall; Léonce and Lise were the last to enter, and the young girl was eager to explain:

'It was Mr. Tirlot's fault; he left me alone on the sidewalk, and if it had not been for Monsieur le Marquis, whose arm I was thankful to accept, I should have had no one to gallant me.'

The phrase gallant rather dispelled Léonce's enchantment; but as the mayor was not yet come, and for want of anything better to do, he took a seat by the side of Lise. At first he was at a loss for something to say to her, and he obviously annoyed her very much by his presence.

Léonce attempted to act it grandpaternally, and said with a benign smile:

'This is a day that is very apt to make a young woman's heart throb.'

Lise made no answer.

'It is a momentous day.'

Still the same silence.

'And which no doubt will shortly dawn for you.'

'Oh!' exclaimed Lise, 'it is too provoking in the mayor to keep us waiting so!'

'You speak very slightly of so grave a magistrate.'

'Why so?' asked Lise; 'is the mayor a magistrate?'

'Of course he's a magistrate; for, in point of fact, it is he who really marries your sister; the ceremony at church is nothing more than a mere form.'

Lise cast a terrified look upon Léonce, recoiled slightly from him, and said with downcast eyes:

'I am well aware, sir, that there are many persons who are of your way of thinking; but I am sure that I would never be the wife of any man who would not exchange vows with me before God.'

'Oh! oh!' thought Léonce, 'she's pious!—but then she is so beautiful! Let me try again.'

'And those vows would not be difficult for you to keep; for whoever shall be happy enough to obtain your hand will, I am sure, comply with your every wish.'

'I hope so,' said Lise, archly.

'Ah!' cried Léonce, 'I am afraid you are something of a tyrant.'

'Certainly I am,' replied she, relapsing into all her youthful heedlessness.

'But don't you know that's very wrong?' said Léonce.

'What difference does it make to you?' said she, laughing, 'you will not have to suffer for it.'

'That is no reason why I should not sympathize with him over whom you will one day tyrannize,' said Léonce, also laughing.

'But I am satisfied he will never complain.'

'How do you know?'

'I am sure of it.'

'He must love you very dearly, then.'

'Who must?' asked Lise, in surprise.

'Why this husband that is to be—this future slave, who is to bear his fetters so joyfully.'

'How should I know him?'

'But you just now said you were so sure.'

'Oh!' said Lise, 'I am sure that I would love him; I am sure that he will be an affectionate husband, and as I will be a devoted wife, he can't be otherwise than happy.'

This was spoken in a tone of such sincerity and truth, that Léonce had implicit confidence in the young girl's presentiments, and he said with an air of conviction:

'I have no doubt of it, he must be happy.'

'Ah, at last!' cried Lise, rising, 'here comes your magistrate, as you call him.'

The mayor made his appearance, and began with the ceremony.

CHAPTER II.

The mayor read to the plighted pair those articles of the Code which had reference to their living in harmony together; they took oath to observe them; declared that they mutually accepted each other, and then they all stepped into a private office where the signatures were to be taken down.

One would think it is a very simple matter to sign a record, and still it turned out to be an affair in which Léonce drew upon himself the notice of Lise, and, as usual, in a manner not very favorable to himself. When the newly-married pair and their parents had signed their names, the turn of the witnesses came next; Léonce did as he saw the others do, but his surprise was great when, on handing the pen to the one who was to succeed him, he saw Lise shake her head with a gentle air of disapprobation.

Could it have been because he had signed as the Marquis de Sterney? Why, the omission of his title would have displeased Prosper Gobillon, who was quite proud of having a Marquis to witness his marriage. Perhaps he had signed before his time? Perhaps he had filled up more space than was necessary.

Sterney, who, as a man of the world, thought he was sufficiently well skilled in the proprieties of life, was sorely puzzled to conceive in what respect he could, by any possibility, have incurred the disapprobation of a young shop-girl, and he was determined to solve the mystery, which seemed to him amusing enough. For this purpose, he kept close to the desk, looking now at Lise, now at those who signed after him, and who, as he thought, did precisely as he had done, without any fault being found with them by the young girl. But when it came to Lise's turn to sign, she made him sensible of his oversight; for, upon the clerk's handing her the pen she paused, and said in a tone in which might be detected a shade of irony:

'One moment, if you please; allow me to take off my glove.'

And suiting the action to the word, she signed with a slender hand of dazzling whiteness.

Léonce saw it now; he had signed with his gloves on. Whoever heard of signing a marriage certificate with a gloved hand? Who thinks of raising a gloved hand in attestation?

Léonce was pondering on this subject, when preparations were made for the departure. Mr. Tirlot, who was groomsman, and consequently, grand master of the ceremonies, had gone to order the carriages to drive up to the door, and Léonce thought that he might again offer his arm to Lise. She took it with an air of no very great pleasure, and without perceiving that she had forgotten to resume her glove: and there goes Léonce, walking by her side, bending his head, and riveting his eyes on the charming hand that gently rested on his arm.

At first sight, Lise had appeared to him a beautiful girl; but, while he readily acknowledged to himself that she possessed a degree of beauty, that was dazzling with the freshness of youth, he had no idea that she enjoyed in their minutest details, those graceful prerogatives which enable the women of the world to compensate for their pallid, meagre, or withered charms. He looked upon her hand—so silky-soft was its texture, and so beautifully slender its shape,—in the light of a precious rarity, which had got strayed by some chance among those good people; and by degrees his eyes rested upon a ring which circled her forefinger, and bore a small golden plate, on which was engraved, in characters scarcely legible, a motto which Leonce eagerly strove to decipher. He was so earnest about it, that he was not aware of their having reached the coaches, into which the party were beginning to enter. It seemed that Lise was not engaged in quite so deep a study; for the pretty tapering fingers that Leonce was so attentively gazing upon, became agitated with impatience, and ended by executing upon his arm a trill which was most beautifully prolonged.

At that moment, Leonce looked at Lise; this motion of his head drew her attention, and she eyed him with such an expression of archness, that Sterney, resolved not to have the worst of it, said: 'It appears, Mademoiselle, that you are an admirable musician.'

'What makes you think so?' inquired she with a touch of disdain.

'Because you have just been performing on my arm a most exquisite air.'

Lise blushed, but this time it was with a painful embarrassment; she abruptly withdrew her naked arm from that of Leonce, and, unconscious of what she was either saying or doing, she said falteringly and in an undertone:

'Oh, pardon me, sir, I forgot to put on my glove—'

'As I forgot to take mine off,' said Sterney; 'you see, we are all of us liable to make mistakes.'

Lise found nothing to say in reply to this; the steps of a carriage were lowered before her, she entered it quickly, so quickly indeed that Leonce obtained a glimpse of the tiniest foot, finely arched, and which was gracefully attached to the smallest ankle. Sterney had a great mind to take a seat beside her, but he had the good sense to do no such thing. Lise had, unconsciously, got into Leonce's carriage; he withdrew after quickly saying to the footman:

'Shut the door, and follow the other carriage,' and he then jumped into a hackney coach in which he found Madame Laloiné.

'Well!' exclaimed the mother, 'what have you done with Lise?'

'I have placed her in a carriage?'

'With whom?' inquired the prudent mother.

'Alas, she is alone, Madame.'

'How so, alone?'

'Yes, Madame, she entered, I believe without being aware of it, into my coach.'

'Ah,' cried Madame Laloiné, 'I can't conceive what ails her; she seems quite perplexed since this morning.'

'It is my barouche,' resumed Leonce, modestly, 'there are only two seats in it, and I did not presume.'

Madame Laloiné thanked Leonce for his forbearance by a silent and solemn bow, and added:

'I am sure she will feel very lonesome.'

Leonce had a secret idea that she would not feel lonesome at all.

In truth, Lise was at first astonished to find herself alone, but she took advantage of the circumstance to recover from the confusion which the last words of Leonce had caused her, and answering her own thoughts and the remarks which she supposed were addressed to her, she shook her pretty head, saying:

'Well, after all, why should I care?'

So saying, she began to examine that splendid carriage which was lined throughout with satin, adorned with silken tassels, and whose motion was so noiseless and so undulating. She seated herself first on one side, then on the other, in order to enjoy the soft elasticity of the cushions, raised, partially, one of the window glasses in order to admire the thickness of the plate, and smiled delightfully on finding herself so pleasantly situated.

Then, she had an idea that the magnificent carriages in which the ladies of fashion enjoyed their drives to the Elysian Fields, must resemble the one in which she was seated; and without thinking for a moment that she could become it as well as the noblest of her sex, she indulged in an imitation of the unstudied ease with which she had seen others recline in their coaches.

Like them, this singular creature would bury her reclining limbs in the silken cushions, which seemed lovingly to caress her rosiest cheeks, and alabaster shoulders, giving way to the softly sinking motion of the vehicle, half closing her eyes in order to look down upon the poor foot passengers who kept turning round to gaze upon her. Then, as if she perceived at a distance some acquaintance of hers, she would slightly bite her nether lip, and, sweetly smiling, imperceptibly nod her head, as if she were addressing some secret salutation to the handsome horseman who was riding past; and in all this extemporaneous phantasmagoria, it so happened that the handsome horseman was Leonce Sterney.

In truth, who could it have been, other than the handsome lion, whom Lise saw in her mind's eye, mounted on a fine English steed, and cantering gracefully by her side? It surely could not have been Mr. Tirlot, whom she had seen tumble off a donkey, during a pleasure party to Montmorency. It was Sterney, therefore, to whom she addressed her kindest glance, her sweetest smile, as he passed.

But only imagine what must have been her astonishment, when she actually saw the face of Leonce, who, motionless and on foot, however, was offering her his hand to assist her in alighting from the coach. At first she started when she found herself surprised in this unconscious attitude, like a child that has taken a place to which it has no right; and when Leonce asked, as he was helping her out:

'Pray, who is it you were bowing to, and smiling upon so delightfully?—'

She would have been glad to escape far off, and hide her confusion and her blushes. Sadly and slowly, therefore, she entered the church, and Leonce perceived that she paid no attention to the ceremony that was going forward. Lise did not slyly watch the countenance of the bride or the awkward demeanor of the bridegroom; she was not curious to ascertain if the wedding ring had passed beyond the second joint, which implies submission; but she prayed, and prayed fervently for herself. One would have thought that remorse had entered that young heart, and that she sincerely asked Heaven's forgiveness for her fault.

Heaven granted her prayer; for she at last rose with calmness, severity and self-reliance. When the party was about to go into the vestry, she turned toward Sterney, and without appearing to notice that he was watching her with marked attention, she went straight up to him, took his arm, and said in a tone which was very different from any she had hitherto employed:

'All this must no doubt be very tiresome to you, sir.'

'Tiresome!—why should you think so?'

'Because it breaks in upon your habits and pleasures. But you will soon be rid of it.'

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ELEGANT STARVATION.—An extravagant young gentleman, who had spent all his money, and had worn out every trace of credit, was living at a beautiful villa in the country, with a devoted partner in poverty. 'Yesterday,' he boasted to a confidential friend, 'we supped off a pair of ear-rings. That case of champagne in the cellar is the production of some thirty volumes of the Encyclopedia Americana. We have dined during the past week off my dress coat; and this very day, had it not been for my patent leather boots, we should have been obliged to breakfast without Bolognas.' Of course these fearful privations increased, till at last they reached a climax. One day the hopeful economist came in nearly famished, and entreated his lovely housekeeper to order dinner. 'Dinner!' she repeated; 'there's not a scrap in the house, or an article left to procure one with.' 'Surely, 'tis a desperate act, but it must be done.' 'What?' inquired the lady, anxiously. 'What? Why, fry the gold fish and roast the canary?'

LONELINESS.

A POETIC MEDITATION—BY LAMARTINE.

BENEATH the oak tree's shade, the mountain's crown,
At eve's mild hours I sit, in sadness, down,
And gaze upon the fields, a picture sweet,
Unrolled in varied beauty at my feet.

There flows the river, with its foaming wave,
There creeps, there hides within a rocky cave,
A brighter stream, with waves of milk-white hue Rolls by the golden stars, which light the heavens of blue.

Upon the mountain's top and wooded sides,
Twilight's last ray in tranquil beauty glides;
Night's gleaming chariot rises o'er the night,
And gilds the horizon's edge with mellow light;
While from the Gothic spire, like spirits springing,
The soft tones of the evening chimes are ringing;
The traveler listens—as the village bell
With day's last murmurs blends, and sounds the parting knell.

Beauty is spread around; yet my dimm'd eye
Sees nought to charm the soul in earth or sky—
For earth is but a shadow on the wave,
And suns warm not the coldness of the grave.
In vain, the spirit casts wild glances forth,
Sweeping from east to west, from south to north;
Upon her darkness breaks no beam of light,
Nor flashes in the sky, angelic pinions bright.

Cottage and palace—mountain, vale and sea!
The charm is gone that made you dear to me;
The breathing spirit of the rock, the wood,
The stream, has flown—all is solitude!
With eye unkindled, gazing on the sun
I see his burning steeds their courses run;
The clear blue sky—the blackening cloud I see,
Wrapt in a gloomy shroud; they're both alike to me!

O! could I mount to where the sun-fires glow,
Earth's plains of green and deserts far below—
Though caring nought for all the day-beams gild,
The boundless riches with which earth is filled—
Yet, far beyond the boundaries of his sphere,
Celestial tones might strike the spirit's ear,
Another sun shine bright upon her eye,
All of me left behind—save that which cannot die!

Then would my longing spirit rise above,
With hope reviving, and rekindled love,
Ravished with joy and burning with a flame,
Which all have felt, yet none could ever name!
Why can I not on morning's chariot rise,
Pierce the blue vault, and seek my native skies?
Why must my chained pulses here remain,
Throbbing discordant in this world of pain?

When autumn's leaf falls withered from the trees,
It gently floats upon the passing breeze;
Borne on the whispering zephyrs, slowly sails,
And rests at last within the beautiful vales;
And I am like the leaf—a withered form,
Bear me, ye tempests, on your wings of storm,
To valleys of delight, to hills above,
Plains of eternal green, and rivulets of love!

WAIT NO LONGER.

OH for such an education—

Knowledge prospering in the land,
As shall make this busy nation
Great in heart as strong in hand.

Knowledge free and unencumbered,
Wearing no dogmatic fetters;
Quickening minds that long have slumbered;
Doubling life by living letters.

Knowledge that shall lift opinion
High above life's sordid bustle:
Thought claims limitless dominion—
Men have souls as well as muscle.

Knowledge that shall rouse the city,
Stir the village, shake the glen;
Teach the smith in the smithy,
And the plowman, they are men.

All who will may gather knowledge,
Prompt for every earnest wooer;
Indifferent to school or college,
She aids the persevering doer.

Shall we wait—and wait for ever,
Still procrastination rueing;
Self-exertion trusting never—
Always dreaming—never doing?

Wait no longer—Hope, Faith, Labor,
Make man what he ought to be:
Never yet hath gun or sabre
Conquered such a victory!

"COME UNDER MY PLAIDIE."

A SONG FOR THE SEASON—BY ELIZA COOK.

OLD Christmas is weaving his holly again,
And begemming his garments with ice spangled pride;
While the wind, with its snow-spear, is piercing the plain,
And the shrew-mouse lies dead by the shelter'd hedge-side

'Tis the time when the hand that has plenty should fling
What it has to bestow on the want-stricken near;
And no holier carol of joy can we sing,
Than "Come under my plaidie," in Poverty's ear.

Oh! let us look out on the pinch'd and the poor,
And ne'er question too closely their claims on our breast;
They have blood-veins to curdle, and pangs to endure,
And starvation is active in warping the best.

"Come under my plaidie" is Charity's song,
And the theme of God's melody breathes in the tune;
When we find how it cheers as we wander along,
Can we hum it too often, or learn it to soon?

The great ones that meet but Prosperity's face—
Oh, too often their bosoms grow callous the while;
As in boldest and highest of mountains we trace
'Tis the hardest of strata that formeth the pile.

How soon does the exquisite blossom bell fade,
If the hot beams unceasingly fall on its cup;
But the draught of sweet water it drinks in the shade,
Feeds the beauty we prize when we see it look up.

And so should Humanity's shadows impart
The rich moisture that fits for the sunshine of Power;
For the dew of Benevolence freshens the heart,
As Night's pure distillation enlivens the flower.

Though we have but good-will and kind wishes to spare
Let us give them, like Him who brought peace upon earth
We must all have a bit of some "plaidie" to spare,
And dividing the garment increases its worth.

If we read, as we ought, the wide Truth-bearing scroll
That fair Mercy eternally hangs in our sight,
We shall see there are duties of love which the soul
Is too apt to forget in its self-serving might.

Affection may link to the kindred around,
The fond spirit may turn toward many a friend;
But warm feelings, like water-rings, own not a bound,
And the fullest and strongest the furthest extend.

Let us help where we may—let us give what we can—
To stop Misery's flow where gaunt Famine crawls through;
'Tis Compassion's soft wings make the angel of mau;
And there's something that most of us surely can do.

"Come under my plaidie"—let rich ones be heard
In the chorus that cannot too loudly be troll'd;
And when yule feasts are smoking, and yule logs are stirr'd,
Think of boards that that are breadless and hearts that are cold

"Come under my plaidie"—oh, fear not to pour
The most feeble of whispers to swell the blest tone,
For though small be the seed we may cast from our store,
It will bear the right grain when God garners his own.

SIR RICHARD MACGINNIS

AND THE SHERIFF.

A Reminiscence of Soldiering in Tipperary.

A merry going out often bringeth a mournful return, and a joyful morning a sad evening.—THOMAS A. KEMPIS.

'Och, and sure yer honor won't forget Tim. Tim, yer honor,' exclaimed one of those contortions of nature, ycleped a dwarf, to a fine well-made son of the sister isle, as he walked down Dame street, Dublin,

'By this, and by that, you are the biggest little blackguard I ever saw in my life,' replied the gentleman at the same time throwing him a ten penny.

'Long life to yer honor, and thank yer honor,' shrieked the dwarf, as he hobbled off to waylay another passer-by.

'Well, Sir Richard, has the bay gelding won at the Curragh? I am just after seeing Larry Burns, and by dads, from his long face, and up-turned nostril, I guessod you had no luck. Why, he turned on his heel, and would not deign an answer,' said a short gentleman with a low crowned hat, knowingly stuck upon one side, and a bright green cut away coat mounted in brass.

'Then you have guessed too true, for as soon as the blackguard was called upon, he shut up. However, my book is pretty square. I made up my loss out of Captain Seymour—one of the castle aids-de-camp; he would back the English mare against a true bred son of the Emerald Isle.'

'Arrah! Sir Richard, you did well. Ireland, my boy, for ever. Never mind, you are not cut out for a flat, eh? Twenty to ten you win the Cahir steeple chase with Brien Borhoime.'

'I wish I may. Good day.'

The charitable donor and loser of the race was Sir Richard Macginnis, or, as he was familiarly styled—ears polite, are we to utter it?—Hell-fire Dick, was a true specimen of an Irish gentleman. Kind, brave, liberal to a fault, ready to resent an injury, but lastingly grateful for a benefit; he had had many an 'affair,' and paced many a distance in the Phenix, and had dropped and won many a fifty pound note at Daly's; but the days of which we chronicle were very different to those of pikes, felons, trials and soldiers in the old capital of Ireland. She was then in the zenith of her glory, the envied of the envied, or, in the words of Lever, 'There was wealth more than proportioned to the cheapness of the country, and while ability and talent were the most striking features of every circle, the taste for gorgeous display exhibited within doors and without, threw a glare of splendor over the scene, that served to illustrate, but not eclipse, the prouder glories of the mind.'

At an early age Sir Richard Macginnis had come into an Irish property of about four thousand a year, a little encumbered with debts, in Tipperary. Ah! many a time had the old walls of Castle Knock vibrated with the merry song and chorus o'er the generous port, many a time had its oaken floor received the ponderous shock of a four bottled man. Many and many a guest had enjoyed true Hibernian hospitality in the old castle; and many a fox had been tally-ho'd away from its covers, and many a snipe or 'cock had fallen to the unerring aim of its owner, or his sporting friends; but alas! these palmy days were not to last for ever. Sir Richard, bitten with the mania of traveling, determined to view the beauties of England, where at Cheltenham, he met, wooed and won, the fair, accomplished, though dowerless daughter of Admiral Howard. For a time affairs went on smoothly; Dublin was yearly sought; and expense followed expense, but in a few years the baronet found his property mortgaged to lawyers and money-lenders, his rents badly paid, the Union passed, and blessed with a son as errant a pickle as ever lived, whose education was entrusted to the combined care of the Protestant clergyman and Father Gleeson (for though Sir Richard was a staunch Catholic himself, he considered all sects whether Roman, Greek, or Infidel, as brethren). But the young scion and his two pedagogical divines were much like a person attempting to sit upon two chairs at one and the same time, and the old issue was the consequence; but the youth's fall was either upon his legs or seat—for he almost daily contrived to escape the exhortations of the Rev. Mr. O'Neil, or the Latin expositions of Father Mark, to rush to the whoop of Pat Sullivan the Irish huntsman, or the to-ho of Jack Moffat, the English keeper; in time his view hollow was clearly heard at the cover side as he saw sly reynard steal away, and his merry laugh re-echoed through the sylvan glades as he shot the errant woodcock, until he became as good a shot as his father, and few could beat him with the Tip. Hunt on black Mungo.

The — Dragoon Guards were quartered at Cahir (or as some garrison punsters, unjustly though it be, call it dull care) and a subaltern's detachment was thrown out to Fethard under the command of Lieut. Mytton.

Jack Mytton was the only son of a wealthy Yorkshire squire, who not being able to manage his son at home, procured him a commission in the — Dragoon Guards, as he then hoped he would be under some restraint. Poor Jack! he had talents for every thing but soldiering; he could make as good a book on the Derby, play as good a game of chess, calculate the odds, or win a rubber of billiards as the best man alive; but to manœuvre a troop, or tell off a squadron, was far beyond his comprehension; and in proof thereof he had ridden and won two steeple chases before he had been dismissed his riding drill, and had made a pot on the St. Leger, before he could change front to the right.

One day a party of Mytton's brother officers drove over from head quarters to see him at Fethard.

'Ah! ah! Jack, old boy,' cried Captain Osprey on their arrival, 'how are you? Had any shooting?'

'How is the detachment?' inquired Cornet Whiskerless.

'How is the hay?' asked a third.

'What is the price of meat a pound?'

'Hunting any more of her Majesty's troopers,' asked Captain Osprey.

'Ah, my boy,' replied Mytton, 'recollect the Italian proverb, Li matti hanno bolletta di dir cio che voglion. So hold your peace of troopers.'

'I see you have Boatswain still,' said Whiskerless, as a shaggy Irish spaniel came jumping and fondling to the party.

'The best dog that ever lived,' replied Mytton. 'I was shooting at Colonel Mallahome's last week, and having bagged twenty couple of snipe—'

'Oh, oh!' chorused the party.

'Well, believe me or not, my story is true. Well, I had drawn my left barrel's charge, and was returning home through a little cover, when old Boatswain sprang a woodcock, but not liking to discharge my right barrel for fear of repealers, I walked on and took no notice; not so, old Boatswain, who reared himself on his hind legs and marked him—on I walked—but the dog tugged at my jacket. At last, I followed him, and he led me to bush, whining and looking in my face, until I had reloaded my gun, when he sprang forward, and up rose a fine woodcock—which, gentlemen, I am happy to say, I have ordered for this day's dinner.'

'Ah! ah!' cried Osprey, 'the author of the Arabian Nights has at last been discovered.'

'Why, I suppose you are first cousin to the young gentleman who walked out of an Affghan tent at Sobron after his legs had been shot off.'

'Why, Mytton, you are quite an Herodotus,' said Osprey.

'By the by, you did not send the sea serpent story to the Lords of the Admiralty, did you?' inquired another.

'That certainly was a very fishy tale,' said Whiskerless.

'Well, come,' replied Jack, 'a truce to your disbelief, however, after your drive, I make no doubt a little luncheon will be acceptable.'

'I have a very unpleasant duty to perform to-morrow,' said Mytton, as they sat in the old oaken-paneled mess-room at Fethard on the night in question. 'I am going to assist the sheriff, who is going to levy a distress warrant upon Sir Richard Macginnis. Poor Dick! the best friend I have in these parts.'

'Oh! oh! oh! fancy Mytton aiding the civil power,' chorused the whole party. 'What time do you start?'

'The route says six,' replied Jack.

'Six,' replied Osprey, 'why you will hardly have the very slightest appetite for breakfast. By gad, I know I never have any till noon.'

'Oh, establish a commissariat on the road; and a fatigue party off to-night with liquors, moselle and champagne; and if there is one thing a shoeless, dirty, Irish cook can toss up better than another, it is a lamb coutelette a la Tata,' said Whiskerless with a sneer.

'Yes, I am sure you will have quite a little fete champetre,' said a third. 'How I envy you.'

'Well,' cried Mytton, in an excited tone, 'a pony all around that I perform this duty so that were his Grace of Wellington commanding he could not do it better.'

'Done!' said the party, and the bets were properly booked.

Then followed the light desultory scandalous conversation of the mess room, when the flirtations of Miss Smith were duly discussed, with the merits of the Derby winner, and the tenets of the Bishop of Exeter, with Bendigo the prize fighter; and after these topics had been drained equally with the claret, a little hazard, a la poulette, concluded the excitement of the evening.

At six o'clock the following morning Lieutenant Mytton and his party of dragoons left the barracks of Fethard, he inwardly execrating his luck at having to leave his brother officers, who were going that morning—in the words of the Irish gossoon—to slate the snipe, while they (his brother officers) were delighted at the preposterous idea of Mytton ever being detached upon duty. Half-way on his road, Mr. Sandy Macgregor, the sheriff, and his two coadjutors, as ruffian looking gentlemen as ever graced—or disgraced—the Bog of Allen, joined the dragoons. Mr. Macgregor was a Scotchman, as you might conceive from his name, the only son of a humble butcher in Glasgow, but early in life he showed the cacoethes scribendi, and he used to supply the poet's corner and local information of the provincial press with the paper bullets of his brain until a contested election took place, when, for some good work for the radical member, he was appointed agent, or factor to a Tipperary estate, which, not relishing such a woodcock life, he quickly resigned, however, for the lucrative office of sheriff and C. P. of the riding.

'Foin day, captin,' said Macgregor.

'It is,' was the sulky reply.

'It's too good a day for the deed, captin; but if a mon boorows siller, he mon pay, that's Scotch law; but this is an unco stoney wynd,' said the sheriff, as his horse stumbled over the loose stones. 'My curse upon ye, ye stumbling brute! ye ugly creeping blastit wonner! He is but a stitched up thing, captin. I borrowed him of the vint'or of Clonmel; my ain Galloway is sairly racked wi' the rheumatics, and he's as lame as an ould cat.'

'The Duke of Leeds writes that Eisenburgh cured his feet, perchance that chiropedist might do your horse some good, or indite a note to Lord Aldborough, he is always writing to the papers about some pills, he may give you some advice, gratis, yah!' replied Mytton, with a yawn; 'do any thing, in short, but weary me with your stories of your horses.'

'Beg pardin, captin. But I have an unco drouth, let us stop at this 'shebeen,' as the Irish folk call it, and have a drappie of bunch-toddy, eh? you ken what our poet sings,

"But bring a Scotchman from his hill,
Clap in his cheek a Highland gill,
Say, sic is royal George's will,
An there's the foe,
He has nae thought but how to kill
Twa at a blow."

'Well,' said Mytton, 'I do not mind a small drop of whisky; I am rather cold, and it is such a bore this work.'

'Thunder and turf,' as the Irish say, I agree with you,' replied the sheriff, as they drank their whisky.

'And sure then,' observed one of Macgregor's deputies, when the detachment was once more in motion; 'if he preached what he practised, he would give us poor devils a drop. Didn't I hear him hold forth at Manchester as how we were all brethren, all equal, all men?'

'Your governor, I suppose. Oh, I could well believe it, the d—n hypocrite,' observed a dragoon, who had been everything from a Methodist parson to a pickpocket, 'but a day of reckoning is at hand.'

'And sure we all know that; its the day Dan O'Connell brings in repeal,' said the Paddy.

'My friend! I speak not of terrestrial, but of celestial matters. I speak of that time when those who have received much, of them much will be required,' said the dragoon, with emphasis.

'Well and sure, isn't that the day when we get repeal? Hasn't O'Connell got much? God help ye! two and threepence of mine last Palm Sunday; and, by dads! shan't we require much of him? He requires a tithe of our wages—but, mi boy, when Parliament sits in College Green, then we shall be repaid cent. per cent.'

'But I am afraid the cent. per cent., like my promotion, will be a long time coming,' answered private Lomax. 'My only hope is Mister O'Connell will introduce equality; let us have a Commonwealth, it is the only principle to find favor with the masses. Let us divide the funds of the aristocracy. You know—

"Princes or peers may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can take as a breath has made;
But a noble peasantry—"

That is the new name we will agitate under. Was not Adam our common father? Why should the aristocracy be rich? I do not see it laid down in the Bible to be the case. Look at my profession, the soldier gets drunk by day, the officer by night—what is the upshot? Why, the soldier sleeps on the floor of the mill, I beg your pardon, the guard room's trestle, the officer on his feather bed—but halt!

"—we're on dangerous ground,
Who knows how the fashions may alter?
The doctrine to-day, that is loyalty's sound,
To-morrow may bring us a halter."

'Come you, Mr. Lomax,' said Serjeant-Major Fieldday, riding up; 'if you don't sit steadier on your horse, I will give you a taste of awkward drill when we get back to barracks.'

'Will it rain whisky,' inquired Tom Shrub, 'when you get repeal?'

'Be dads, and it will,' replied Paddy.

'Then hurrah for repeal! I'll be anything for a glass of whisky, except a coward to my country, or a traitor to my Queen,' said Shrub.

'Do you hear?' cried Serjeant Fieldday, 'press down your heel, Lomax; feel up your horse, Shrub—or awkward drill.'

When the party approached the mansion of Sir Richard Macginnis, every thing pertaining to it had the stamp of poverty and blunted exertion plainly marked. The old iron gates creaked and groaned on their rusty hinges; the woodbine and ivy were allowed to throw their unrestrained tendrils over the dilapidated lodge, while the pig shared the inside of the cottage with a dirty, slatternly woman and some half-dozen children of the same clique; while the hens were grubbing their resting-places among the uncultivated flower-plats. A kind and beneficent nature had this autumn poured forth her gifts with a liberal hand, and as Sir Richard generally received his rents in kind, many a portly stack stood forth in the staggarth, and many a turkey or fat pig gobbled up the stray ears of wheat that lay scattered in all directions. Mr. Macgregor had already appropriated, in his mind, a fine fat turkey for his next Sunday's dinner, and compressed his lips at the bare idea of the juicy bird.

While the sheriff and the soldiers were defiling up the avenue, Sir Richard was engaged in leveling a rising knoll of the park.

'Be gorha, Sir Richard!' shouted a shoeless, sockless lad; 'here's the military, yer honor, here master, ein sidour—dou—ah! ah! fithohe, ah! buidhean—ein maor—Oh! Sir Richard, we shall be kilt.'

'You are right, my boy, the soldiers are here; run, you young devil's spawn, run to the bog, tell the men to come down with the carts and take the farm-yard away to Connaherra Mountain—run, you devil.'

'Ah, your honor, and I will, and it isn't Pat that won't have sixty men from Barrymacrowdy Bog. Bad cess to the blackguards. Yes, Mr. Macgregor, it's queer to me if you die in your bed.'

'Ah! the top of the morning to you, Jack, my boy,' said Macginnis, welcoming Mytton at the front door; 'marching order, eh?'

'Why, no—not exactly. No—Mr.—Mr.—this man—General——, got the—orders,' replied Mytton, very much abashed.

'Yes, sir, I am the cause. I, sir, Sandy Macgregor, sheriff, late of Glasgow, but now of Clonmel,—the suit of one Mahali Solomons, a member of the Hebrew persuasion—800*l.*, to speak in round numbers, due the 15th of last month.'

'Oh, Solomons' bill; well, sir, I am happy to have it in my power to settle it, so if you will leave the soldiers there, and walk into my study, I will pay you in Bank of Ireland notes. As for you, Mytton, old boy, a ride over our hills will have given you an appetite for breakfast; you will find Lady Macginnis in the dining-room.'

'Sir, I do not think it the strategy of a general to leave the soldiers in the rear,' said Macgregor, not at all relishing the idea of walking into the lion's jaws alone.

'Oh, hang your strategy and soldiers, I am for breakfast,' replied Mytton, delighted at the termination of his duty; 'go and get the money and join me in the breakfast-room; let the men dismount, Serjeant Fieldday, and you can piquet the horses here until I come.'

'Let us go into the drawing-room,' said Lady Macginnis, after the breakfast was over, to Mytton, 'I have got some new music from an English opera—'The Bohemian Girl'—it came out last season at Drury Lane.'

'Oh, delightful!' said Mytton.

Lady Macginnis sat down to her pianoforte and sang some beautiful airs from that sweet opera, and hacknied though they be now, still they bear with them that freshness and plainness that must make them popular in all seasons and in all ages. She then changed her theme to one of the song-loving Italy, or broke out into a wild chanson of her own native Isle.

Mytton was in the seventh heaven as he drank in the silvery tones of the fair songstress.

'Could I but command my wishes, it would be,' exclaimed he, 'to be sent upon a like duty every day.'

'Are you sure of that?' said Lady Macginnis, with a meaning smile.

'Sure? Did you ask me such a question!' said Jack, his heart beating against his side.

'Yes, Lady Macginnis, I am sure.'

'Ah! but we poor ladies know what you officers are. However, I suppose you have heard Lord de Grey has resigned the vice-royalty?'

Mytton heartily wished the vice-royalty at the bottom of the waves, he wished to resume the subject of love.

'You must really see my new garden, Mr. Mytton; so if you will remain here until I join you, I will show it to you, I only want to put a shawl and my cottage bonnet on—here is the New Monthly or the Globe to amuse you until my return,' said Lady Macginnis.

Mytton turned the matter over in his own mind; he had made an impression, there was no doubt; he looked down the lace of his trousers, and brushed up his hair, and came to the conclusion he was a much better looking man than he had ever thought himself before. Lady Macginnis was in love with him; on that point there was not a shadow of a doubt, in his opinion, but would she show it, or must he make the first advances? As Hamlet says, 'Ay, there's the rub.'

'Now to business,' said Sir Richard to the sheriff, taking down a deal box.

'What's that for?' said Macgregor.

'Simply to aid our business,' said Sir Richard, unlocking the box, and producing a pair of pistols.

'Now listen to me, sir.'

'I will,' said the sheriff, in abject tones.

'These pistols alone, or nearly so, remain to me of a once fine fortune, now, alas! gorged by those land cormorants—Jews and bill-brokers. Not satisfied is Solomons with making me pay cent. per cent., not satisfied with pillaging my property, not satisfied with insulting me, but to crown all, he sends a reptile like you to seize the subsistence of the next six months, backed as you are by soldiers. Sir! know then, by my own recklessness, by putting faith in men I believed to be my friends that has brought me to my present crisis, but not by dishonesty or fraud—my tenantry owe me far, far beyond the amount of the bill you hold, but would I turn them from their hearths and homes, for their children to beg their bread or become meet subjects for the hulks? however—enough, here you sit until released by my orders—you shall then go unmolested, unhurt, but if you stir an inch, it is at your peril. Moffat,' he exclaimed, and a short stiff man with a bullet, bull-dog head, entered, 'guard Mr. Macgregor; should he attempt to stir, give him—'

'A cold pill,' growled Moffat, eyeing him under his shaggy eye-brows.

'Oh, Sir Richard! for pity's sake, leave me not with that—that thing—I will be so quiet, mon. I won't stir limb or leg. I won't—'

'Won't do what?' inquired Sir Richard.

'Won't say what I was going to say.'

'Well, Sir Richard,' replied the sheriff, after a pause, 'suppose that velvet gentleman should fancy, fancy, I say, I moved, and just popped the cold pill into me, it would be culpable homicide, indeed it would, Sir Richard. Lock the door, bind me hand and foot, do any thing but leave me to the mercy of that thing.'

'Never fear,' said Sir Richard, as he left the room.

And there the sheriff and keeper sat, the latter as Homer sings—the former, upon the tip end of his chair, pale, with perturbation and fear breaking forth at every pore.

'I think she takes a precious long time putting on that cottage bonnet and shawl,' exclaimed Mytton, as he turned over the concluding page of the New Monthly. 'By every thing that's beautiful, half past three!! Hush! I hear breathing—a gentle tap—the lady's maid at two to one—French perhaps—love is the soul of a strapping dragoon—so I shall just take one kiss, and he stole on tip-toe to the door, opened it, and bosh clash he went headlong into the hall, over the prostrate body of Sandy Macgregor.

'Take that,' said Mytton, when he was once more upon his legs, administering a swingeing box on the ear, 'take that for eaves-dropping.'

'Mon alive, I have feeling: well mon that's my ear, and I will make you pay for it too. A pretty kettle of fish you have got into by keeping the dragoons in the park.'

'Where are the dragoons?' inquired Mytton.

'I dinna ken,' replied the sheriff.

'Where is Sir Richard—Lady Macginnis?'

'I dinna ken.'

'What the devil do you 'ken?' inquired Jack.

'Why this, I have been caged up with a gay ugly body, cocking and uncocking a gay ugly pistol for two hours. I have lost £800 and fees, and I verily believe Sir Richard is gone.'

'G! O! N! E!' exclaimed Mytton, as a light suddenly broke out upon him. Why the d—! didn't you knock the ugly man down—cried murder—anything?'

'Me knock the ugly beast down? no, captin, you may be a man o' war, I am one of peace. I'm nae sa fond of knocking men down.'

'My master's compliments, and he desired me to give you this note,' said a footman.

Mytton tore it open, and read:

'DEAR MYTTON:—Allow me to assure you that it is with feelings of sorrow, as far as you are concerned, that I am obliged to leave you in the sudden and unceremonious manner in which I have done; circumstances over which I had no control compelled me. I have gone to 'the Cave,' the entrance is guarded by a natural barrier of rocks, which I have strengthened by two Tipperary boys as sentinels; recommend Mr. Macgregor not to follow except he wishes to become the supper of the eagles. Accept the apologies of Lady Macginnis and myself, together with the assurance that we shall at all times be delighted to see you at Castle Knock. Believe me, very truly yours,

'30 past 2 p.m.' 'RICHARD MACGINNIS.

'Duped!' exclaimed Macgregor, 'and the stock and corn gone too—duped by an Irishman!'

'Duped!' re-echoed Mytton, in faint tones.

But let us now turn our thoughts to the dragoons, whom we left picqueted in the park. Nearly opposite the lodge, lived Terrence O'Flarthy, who had an uncommonly handsome daughter, with long black ringlets and melting brown eyes—so when Sergeant Fieldlay had kept post over the picquet for some hour or so, he became weary, and to disperse his ennui, strolled to Mr. O'Flarthy's house, to whisper soft nothings into Miss O'Flarthy's ear. Presently, Corporal Can teen espied a snug little shebeen near the other lodge gate, and he thought he might just step over there and taste the quality of the whisky.

Thus, link by link was that chain of responsibility broken, so lauded by the greatest captain of our age, the Duke of Wellington. The soldiers followed their superiors, and when Mytton returned he found the horses linked together in charge of a recruit. Tom Shrub, insensibly drunk, Blackwood, a Sheffield rough, swearing he would not go home till morning, while Private O'Rourke swore 'Jack, Lieutenant Jack, bedads, was a trump.'

But to retreat to Fethard! Oh, for the talent and pencil of a Leech or a Brown! First rode Mytton on his black charger, heels down, in a hard gallop; then followed Macgregor, toes down, heels up, arms a-kimbo in a good round trot, while his dirty dressed subs would ride the soldiers' troopers, ludicrously contrasting their gay trappings with the men's coats, while one finished the picture by appropriating a soldier's helmet, giving him in return a crownless hat. In short, the whole road was strewn with relics of that day's adventure. Napoleon's retreat from Waterloo, or that of the Ten Thousand in ancient history, never equalled it.

But let us drop the green curtain, simply to rise it for the reprint of the London Gazette:

'Cornet Waterloo, Quatre Bras Snooks to be lieutenant vice Mytton who retires.'

CUPID AND PSYCHE.

A HINT TO SOME MARRIED LADIES.

WITH cheeks bedew'd with drops of pearl,
Sad Psyche sought the grove,
Where she her tresses used to curl
With innocence and love.

Sweet Modesty, a rural maid,
O'ertook the rural fair—
Ask'd why in loose attire she stray'd,
And why diffused her hair?

'I Cupid seek o'er hill and dell;
From me the god is fled;
And what's the cause I cannot tell,
He shuns the nuptial bed.'

'Dry up thy tears and cease to mourn,' Return'd the sylvan chaste;
'Accept of me this magic zone,
And bind it round thy waist.'

'Tie up thy locks, thy dress improve,
And soon this change thou'll see:
Psyche shall cease to follow Love,
And Love shall follow thee.'

The zone about her waist she ties,
Each tress a ringlet flows;
Her bosom's hid from vulgar eyes,
Each cheek displays a rose.

Now in the stream surveys her face,
And smiles at charms so fair—
The while she studied ev'ry grace,
Love came and found her there.

Enraptured, to her arms he flew;
With joy she blest the change;
Improved the cause from whence it grew,
And Love forgot to range.

Ye wedded dames, my hint descry,
Nor blame the friendly part—
The slattern makes the lover fly,
While neatness chains the heart.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF LOVE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH, FOR THE GAZETTE AND RULE,
BY KATE ST. CLAIR.

"Love makes two beings see each other clear
At one glance, as two drops of rain in air
Might look at each other, had they life,
Love does a way disguise."

CHAPTER I.

BARON VON HERNER resided in a fine old chateau, two hours ride from the imperial capital. The worthy baron belonged to the ancien regime, and did not much admire the new and increasing splendor of the Arch-duke's regal court; so he drew around him many kindred spirits, in his elegant retirement, and, in short, here he was an Arch-duke himself, in miniature, with no lack of courtiers among a splendid train of retainers, and looked upon with vice-regal awe and reverence by all the country round.

To be sure, there were some who asserted that the good baron was wise in not mortgaging his chateau, and removing with his family to the capital, amid the magnificence of the Imperial Court, for what would he be but a poor devil of a baron, among a host of splendid German nobles, the favored and wealthy officers of the royal administration? But of course, these were ill-natured people—very; nobody regarded them.

Now the Baroness Von Herner was an amiable and exemplary woman, and had been a court beauty, but the brilliant Bavarian had never known real happiness, until in the retirement of the simple and unostentatious country life, with him, for whose sake she had forsaken the glittering train of admirers at the court of her kinsman, she experienced the heart happiness she had sighed for vainly, amid the dazzling throng.

The baroness, like Napoleon's Josephine, was passionately fond of flowers, hence the gardens of the Chateau d'Steinvillie were the tenth wonder of the world, and the baron often asserted, smilingly, that the grounds and conservatories would be the ruin of him, and Madame la Baroness had ever ready some pretty woman's retort, accompanied by a kiss, perhaps, so of course, the vote was carried by acclamation, and another splendid and unheard of exotic arrived soon after—

"From the sunny shores of a far-off clime."

A fairy-like life led Sophie and Terese Von Herner, amid this wilderness of flowers, until the maiden beauty of the former had ripened into the proportions of womanhood, and the good baron no longer called her 'child.'

Her's was the proud step of a princess; and the dark commanding beauty of Bavaria's daughters, which she inherited from her mother, was in striking contrast with that of her younger sister, Terese, whose hair burst in a cloud of golden curls over a bright, sunny brow, and the deep-blue, laughing eyes of the Saxon.

Sophie hunted like Diana, and rode like Camille Leroux. Terese was sentimental, loved poetry, sang divinely—like Grisi—and her broderie was magnificent. The baron called it the tapestry of Gobelin and Arras—he was so transported because she had wrought him his favorite horse.

Each day saw Baron Graffen at the chateau, and each day as he rode back to the capital, he was more than ever perplexed to ascertain whether he most loved Sophie or Terese. Sometimes the latter had more than usually enchanted him with some exquisite piece of music, or some drawing, expressly for his lordship, and he threw himself back in his carriage, closed his eyes, and the vision of the future Baroness Graffen rose up before him, with the golden locks, and soft, pleading eyes of Terese von Herner. And then, perhaps, his revery would be disturbed by the quick trampling of horses' feet, and from some green vista of the old forest, Sophie on her powerful black hunter, would sweep past him like the wind—queenly and magnificent, her black eyes flashing with the fire of an untamed spirit, and her long hair floating on the wind—the goddess of the chase herself.

CHAPTER II.

AND then it was Sophie—Sophie who leaned upon his arm that night, amid his dreams—his peerless bride; while the murmur of admiration swelled into enthusiasm, as the glittering throng of the court gave way, and he led her to the royal presence. He had won the most splendid woman of his time—that is, like the poet—in dreams.

And the next day Sophie's eyes shot forth more defiance and pride than ever, when he would have detained her, to tell his tale in the merrie greenwood. Was ever poor man in such a cruel perplexity? Oh, for some good genius to whisper which

He whom the gods called Xanthus, went to assist Ilium in battle, with Mars, Phœbus, Latona, and a goodly number at his back. Baron Graeffen bethought himself of the eloquent tongue of Count Frederick d'Einsfeldt, and the disinterested friendship of Philip of Thorneau.

The former was to beseege the heart of the proud beauty, in behalf of his taciturn friend, the baron; and the latter was to talk moonlight, music and poetry, and select the shining skeins for Terese's famous embroidery, and at the same time he was to discover the state of the gentle girl's mind, regarding the wealthy lover, who would himself abide the decision in the success of either case.

But, alas for all things human! the handsome count made love to the "cruel lady" at first for the baron with his tongue, while with his dark eyes he looked anything but the ambassador, and at last, one fine morning, as they were riding in the woods about the chateau, he spake of love more impassioned than ever, but most unfortunately forgot to mention the name of Baron Graeffen at all.

Without stopping for a reply, his horse happening to curvet somewhat suddenly, he boldly stole a kiss from the Diana; at the same time he felt a marvelously keen cut across his cheek from the riding-whip of the outraged divinity, and she was off with a bound and a gallop that would have astonished Astley himself.

So Einsfeldt returned and sought his friend with a grave face. He regretted that his utmost efforts had been of no avail—the lady was glacier whom no sun could melt. The Fates had decreed it.

As for the other minister at the court of Cupid—Philip of Thorneau—he was a man of strict honor and integrity, but somehow, it seemed very odd and out of place, to groupe the stout figure of Baron Graeffen with the birds of Paradise, the brilliant flowers and shining silks. And then, when lute and voice had died away in dreamy music, how could he take up the refrain with 'Baron Graeffen.' So he waited until she should make a drawing. It was the ruins of a fine old Gothic castle, and when at last, he adroitly turned the conversation to the baron's chateaux on the Rhine, his villas, his immense wealth and position at court, the mischievous maiden took from her portfolio a 'head' of that gentleman, executed with boldness and surprising fidelity.

Now Baron Graeffen was neither handsome or ugly; he had a most benevolent expression of countenance, and an air distingue. There was one feature, however, that the merry artiste had portrayed in strong relief, and Thorneau nearly suffocated himself in the vain endeavor to preserve a becoming gravity, when he saw at first glance, the shining black mole on the left cheek of the baron, which the utmost license of whisker did not conceal. The Corinthian maid, thought he, traced the features of her lover by the light of a lamp, and then again he had recourse to his mouchoir at the idea of that lover having a mole also.

But the next moment Thorneau experienced a profound emotion, for he caught sight of a sketch which Terese blushingly endeavored to conceal in the portfolio. It was himself, and his vanity whispered that there was no ebony excrescence. There was the pale high brow, the masses of dark curls, and the long silken moustache, to the life.

"Terese!" and he detained the hand that would have concealed the picture, "my own Terese." She hid her glowing face in his bosom, while delicious tears streamed down her cheeks, and he—the haughty Thorneau, kissed them away.

The next morning he sought an audience with Baron von Herner, and, judging from the radiant features of the former, as he retired to the garden, where through the shrubbery he caught glimpses of a white dress; he was happy, very happy. In truth, they gazed in each other's eyes with perfect rapture, and forgot all about poor Baron Graeffen, and his much abused mole. Such is all-powerful love.

"The subtle tyrant o'er all hearts."

Meanwhile, as Philip of Thorneau was meditating how he should best lay the result of his mission before his friend, the baron, one of those fortunate chances which occur when one least expects them, had favored the suit of the latter, with the proud beauty.

The baron was riding through the forest toward the Chateau d'Steinville, which he had not visited in some time, having been absent at Dornen. At a distance, he perceived a group of peasants gathered around one of their number, who had evidently met with some serious accident. He rode up briskly, and ascertained that a poor woodcutter had fallen a tree upon himself, and was extricated more dead than alive.

The baron himself assisted to make a rude litter of branches, upon which they bore the wounded man to his humble cottage, the baron following, and with many kind words of comfort, to honest dame Margery—with whom he left his purse, he set off at full speed for the best surgeon at the capital, whom he dispatched forthwith to the sufferer.

On the morrow, Baron Graeffen mounted Charlemagne, and again wended his way toward the chateau. He stopped at the cottage, entered, and seated himself by the bed of the patient, for the honest and kind-hearted people had interested him much. He was fond of children; he took the little, fair-haired Wilhemina upon his knee, and kissed her; and prattled with the chubby young woodcutter, who came up timidly to play with his gold chain, and listened to dame Margery so attentively that he quite soon won all their hearts.

Now it so happened, as he sat there with Wilhemina upon his knees, and looking with a sort of dreamy happiness, out upon "the beeloved lindens" through the open door of the cottage, that Sophie rode slowly up and dismounted; for good Margery had presided most faithfully over the household department of the chateau, until the black eyes and honest eloquence of Heinrich Stiller won her to his home in the merrie greenwood.

Right amazed was she to find the baron sitting by the bed-side of the humble cottager, and as she advanced blushing to take the little Wilhemina, who stretched out her arms toward her, he thought he had never seen her look so beautiful. There was a soft, womanly timidity about her he had never before observed. He resigned the child to her, their eyes met and lingered, and in that sudden magnetism, and the exquisite thrill it gave him, he knew that she did not hate him.

The good baron, in his simplicity was not all aware that it was his act—the spontaneous act of a noble heart, which had caused the proud lady to stand with downcast eyes and glowing cheeks, with a silent reverence that was eloquence itself. He had also the happiness of accompanying her homeward.

The Chateau d'Steinville was brilliantly illuminated. It was a bridal fete, and the nobility of the surrounding country, and the beauty and chivalry of the imperial capital were there. Even royalty itself was not wanting to give eclat to the scene, for amid the dazzling rooms lingered the Arch-duke Charles, and his glittering duchess, to do honor to their beloved kinswoman, and surrounded by the flower of the German nobles.

If Sophie von Herner was queenly, the Baroness Graeffen was magnificent, with a right princely coronet upon her brow, and her robe of velvet with diamond stars—the trousseau of both brides, was the royal gift of the Arch-duke.

Terese, Madame Thorneau, was as radiant as a fairy in her sunny beauty, and it was evident from the manner in which she gazed in the face of her husband that she thought him little less than a god. It is also recorded that the Arch-duke said to the Baroness Graeffen: "Madam, you have won the most amiable man in the kingdom—and a most noble heart."

THE DOUBLE PAIN.

From the Spanish.

"Con dos cuidados guerreo
Que me dan pena, y suspiro
El uno cuando no os veo,
El otro cuando vos miro."

My heart doth own a double fear
A double pain, a double sigh—
The one when you are absent, dear;
The other when you're by.

At seeing you, my heart doth mourn
With love that cannot find relief;
At missing you, my heart is torn
With all the bitter pangs of grief.

And now I shed the burning tear;
And now I heave the useless sigh:
The one when you are absent, dear—
The other, when you're by!

STANZAS.

BY HENRY FRANK LOTT.

I MAY not stand beside thy bed,
Now pain hath left thee pale and weak,
To gently raise thy drooping head,
And softly kiss thine alter'd cheek.

I may not all my kindness prove,
Because I am shut out from thee,
To mourn that those thou canst not love
Must do what should be done by me.

Thou canst not see how much I'm grieved;
Thou canst not hear affection's sighs:
I hourly pray thou'lt be relieved,
And soon restored to bless mine eyes.

Had pleasure held thee from my sight,
With patience I could bear thy stay;
But oh! the thought unmans me quite
That sickness keeps my love away.

THE BENEFICENCE OF GOD.

BY C. F. GELLERT.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN FOR THE GAZETTE AND RULE.
BY JOHN FRANCIS VAN EDEN HOLLERMAN.

How great is the Almighty's bounty!
Is he a man who feels it not?
Who, with perverted heart and senses,
Withholds the thanks he owes his God?
No! to appreciate His kindness,
Be e'er my duties' chief delight!
The Lord has never yet forgot me;
Cease not, my heart, to love Him right!

Who has, thus wonderfully, formed me?
That God who has no need of me—
Who, with kind lenity, leads, guides me?
He whose advice I elight too free—
Who fortifies the peaceful conscience?
Who renovates the heaven-born mind?
Who blesses me with so much goodness?
Is't not His hand, so boundless kind?

View, O my soul, in yonder life,
Destined, as thou art, for that bliss!
Where thou shalt bask in Heavenly glory;
Where thou shalt see God as he is!
Thou hast a right to those high blessings;
Through God's own bounty they are thine—
See, therefore, Christ had need to suffer,
To buy for thee that bliss divine.

And this good God should I not honor?
Not understand His mercy free?
He call me—and I not obey Him?
Not walk the path He shows to me?
His will my inmost heart must cherish;
His word is from eternity;
God I must love with love unbounded,
My neighbor as myself would be.

This is my gratitude, His pleasure,
That I be perfect as is He.
As long as I His laws count treasure
His image is displayed by me—
Does love to God pervade my being,
Each duty is felicity;—
And though I fail through human weakness,
Yet sin has triumphed not in me.

O Father, let thy love and mercy
Be ever present, dear, to me!
Fill me with strength and pure desire,
Devoting all my life to Thee!—
My constant solace be in troubles;
My guide in health, prosperity;
The conqueror of my fears when, lastly,
My soul, through death, returns to Thee!

AN OWER TRUE TALE.

Oh! it was pitiful;
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none.—THOMAS HOOD.

By one of those accidents which so often make me the witness of the most diverse scenes, I found myself, during an intensely bitter winter's day, in a miserable cellar in Whitechapel. A woman, whose delicate and somewhat refined appearance indicated, in despite of her ragged and scanty clothes, that she had 'seen better days,' pressed a half-clothed infant to her shrunken breast, from which the little creature, by its impatient, fretful cries, seemed vainly endeavoring to draw some nourishment. Another child, about a year and a half old, dragged at her skirts, clamoring for food.

The little light that could find its way through the dingy window was rapidly deserting that gloomy abode. Not a spark of fire glimmered in the rusty grate; not a vestige of furniture was there, excepting a sackcloth bag, stuffed with straw, which served as a bed, though the coverings had long since gone to the pawn shop. Upon this the wretched woman sat, and hugged close her famishing children. Darkness gathered thick around them, and despair settled upon her soul. Yet still the restless wailing of the feeble infant, and the unceasing, monotonous demand of the elder child, 'Mamma, give me something to eat! mamma, give me something to eat!' kept her awake to her misery, and would not allow her even the poor consolation of an apathetic stupor.

At length she arose and groped her way up stairs to a little huckster's shop that was kept by the woman of the house.

'For the love of God, Mrs. Jonson,' she said, 'let me have one penny loaf on trust. My poor boy has not eaten a morsel all this day, and you may be sure I'll pay you as soon as ever my husband gets any work.'

'Ay—but you see he's been out of work so long already; and you owe me two weeks' rent as it is, Mrs. Bridgeman,' replied the mistress of the shop, whose squalid appearance bespoke her but few degrees better off than her lodger; 'I've six children of my own to look to, and I can't take the bread out of their mouths to put into other people's. Why don't you make up your mind to go into the poor-house at once! You'd get food and shelter there for nothing till times get better.'

The mother cast one look of agony upon her children; gathered them up yet closer to her heart, and went back in silence to her cellar.

Worn out with crying, the children sank into a restless slumber, and a dull blank, but which was not unconsciousness, fell upon the senses of their wretched mother. She remained thus for perhaps an hour, when a gleam of light and an entering footstep aroused her. It was her husband, bearing in his trembling hands a burning rush-light, a loaf, some cold meat, and a pint of porter in a broken jug, borrowed from the landlady. He placed the food in his wife's lap and sought among a heap of rubbish for something that would serve as a candlestick. The bread, so much needed and so earnestly longed for, remained unnoticed where he had laid it, the jug was held mechanically in her hand, and her eyes were fixed upon her husband's face; for a look of reckless desperation that dwelt upon it suggested the terrible idea that yet bitterer sorrows and degradations might be in store for her.

'Have you got work, Joe?' she at length found courage to ask.

'No,' was the abrupt reply.

She still sat motionless and speechless.

'Can't you eat, dear?' said her husband, in a tone of anguish; 'does it come too late, then, after all? Here—drink a little, that will give you strength.'

'I can't, Joe,' replied his wife, turning aside the proffered draught, while her tearful eyes were still riveted on his face; 'I cannot taste it till I know where it comes from.'

'It would only trouble you to know,' he said, gloomily; and, sitting on an old broken box at a short distance, he buried his face in his hands, adding, 'eat and drink to give you strength to hear it. It's of no use saying a word about it. It can't be helped now—I've done it.'

'What have you done? What have I to hear?'

'Feed the child, and eat something yourself, and then I'll tell you. But don't blame me, Jane, don't blame me. What's done can't be helped.'

'You've always been a kind, good husband to me, Joe,' said the poor woman, giving a liberal supply from the bread and meat to the now awakened child, but turning heart-sick from it herself, 'and never, even in our happiest days, were you so kind and tender to me as you have been since we came to this dreadful place. Surely you wouldn't go now and do anything that would break my heart!'

'I hope it won't, Jane. But what could I do? I couldn't see you and the children starving—I couldn't come back again without a bit of food, when I knew you had tasted none all day. And even if it should end in my having to go abroad for a few years, why, perhaps, you may get leave to go too. After all, there's no use in complaining about it now; I've done it, and there's an end.'

'Go abroad!' exclaimed his wife, 'then it is what I feared. You have robbed somebody to get this food for us!'

'I—robbed!' repeated he in great amazement; 'is that what you were afraid of? Cheer up, then, my dear girl, your husband has not come to that yet. I've only enlisted for a soldier, and that bread was bought with the shilling I got from the sergeant. I was afraid to tell you what I had done, I thought you would take on so.'

'Heaven be praised it is no worse!' she cried; 'and now, dear Joe, I feel that I can eat.'

They partook of this frugal meal together, and then sat for above an hour talking over the past and future. From this conversation I gathered that she had married below her station, and contrary to the wishes of her father, who was a wealthy stable-keeper. Will it be believed? At that very moment he was probably sipping his port after a sumptuous dinner, though fully aware of the abject misery in which his unhappy daughter was plunged. Her mother cannot be living, thought I—and just then the name of a mother-in-law was mentioned, which partly accounted for her father's severity.

As I saw more of these good people on a subsequent occasion, I will only mention here that this enlistment proved to be a most fortunate event for them, and that though they had many hard trials to pass through, it was ultimately the means of placing them in comparative comfort.

HEMP AND MUSKETOES.—Steamboats have their troubles as well as other folks. Like printers and doctors, they have to turn round very often for nothing. The 'dear people,' have been told it was 'no trouble to show goods,' till they believe it. See what it's coming to.

On her trip up the Missouri, the obliging Henry Bry was hailed by a green looking customer at an obscure landing, and rounded to, supposing he wanted to take a passage. The boat swung round, puffing, hoarse and impatient.

'Halloo, Captain!'

'Coming aboard?'

'No, but I thought may be somebody there might be travelling up to buy hemp, and I'd just jest ax you.'

The Henry Bry gave a snort and a lunge enough to bream her boilers as she turned on her keel and got under way again—the 'great hanged' hemp man swearing she had no accommodation about her.

Capt. Luke had nearly forgotten the incident, when some distance from Glasgow—deponent saith not where—a man was observed standing on the river bank, beckoning, as it seemed, most seemingly, first with one hand and then the other, beating the air before his face, and looking intently to wards the boat. Again the polite Henry Bry, fetched a circuit of some half a mile, and came to.

'Halloo, stranger what do you want?'

'Nothing!'

'What in the — (using a bad word this time,) did you make signs for?'

'Only keeping the musketoos off to see what boat that was!'

'Somebody gave a toast that evening—'Hemp and musketoos—the worst take in on the river.'—[Glasgow News.]

A FASHIONABLE CALL, AND ALL THEY SAID.—

'How do you do, my dear?'

'Putty well thank you.' (They kiss.)

'How have you been this age?'

'Putty well—how have you been?'

'Very well, thank you.'

'Pleasant to-day.'

'Yes, very bright—but we had a shower yesterday.'

'Are all your people well?'

'Quite well, thank you; how are yours?'

'Very well, I'm obliged to you.'

'Have you seen Mary B— lately?'

'No, but I've seen Susan C—.'

'You don't say so. Is she well?'

'Very well, I believe.' (Rising.)

'Do call again soon.'

'Thank you—I should be pleased to come, but you don't call on me once in an age.'

'Oh, you should not say that, I am sure I am very good.'

'Good day.'

'Must you go?'

'Yes, indeed, I have seven calls to make.'

'Good day.'

'Jack,' said one sailor to another, 'I don't want to hurt your feelings; but shiver my timbers if I don't think you have stole my watch.'

SPAIN has taken her first step in internal improvement, by opening a railroad from Barcelona to Mataro, a distance of about thirteen miles.

CHRISTMAS OF THE FOREIGN CHILD.

From the German of Frederick Ruckert.

AMID a spacious town,
The Christmas lights are blazing.
Beneath the cold night's frown
A foreign child is gazing
Sadly up and down:

In every house he sees
Fond fingers intertwining,
Through lamp-illuminated trees
The bright warm rooms are shining,
Ah! bitter sights are these!

He weeping speaks: "To-night,
To every child is given
A Christmas tree and light,
But I by earth and Heaven
Am now deserted quite:

"A sister's gentle hand
Had given me all I needed,
If I at home did stand,
But here I am unheeded,
In this cold foreign land.

"Will none the orphan see,
And let him in for pity?
Oh, God! and can it be,
That in this crowded city
There is no place for me?

"Will no kind heart relieve
The orphan's deep dejection?
Alas! I must receive
But only the reflection
Of this strange Christmas eve!"

He taps with fingers thin
On window and on shutter,
They hear not for the din,
The weak words he doth utter,
Nor let the orphan in.

The father's lessons mild
The listening boy's ear drinketh—
The Christmas gifts are piled
By mother's hands. None thinketh
Of that poor orphan child.

"Oh! Christ, my Saviour dear,
No father and no mother
Have I my heart to cheer,
Be all to me, no other
Consoler have I here."

Cold, cold his small hand grows,
He rubs his frozen fingers—
He shivers in his clothes,
And in the white street lingers
With eyes that will not close.

There cometh with a light,
Which through the dark street breaketh,
In robes of simple white,
Another child—who speaketh
These sweet words of delight:

"Behold thy Christ in me,
Again a child's form taking—
A little child like thee—
Though all are thee forsaking,
By me thou shalt not be:

"My word's impartial boon
I waft o'er hill and valley,
I send my aid as soon
To this poor wretched alley,
As to yon gay saloon:

"My hands, with light divine,
Thy Christmas tree shall kindle.
Thou'lt see, compared with thine,
All other trees shall dwindle,
How beautiful they shine."

To Heaven his little hand
The infant Saviour raiseth—
There doth a great tree stand,
Whose star-lit branch outblazeth
All o'er the azure land:

The child's heart bounds with glee,
At all the starry tapers—
His eyes grow bright to see
Through Heaven's transparent vapors
That glorious Christmas tree!

Before his wandering eyes
A glorious vision shifted—
A dream of Paradise!
For Angel hands uplifted
The Orphan to the skies.

Within that blessed sphere
A home he now hath gotten—
Even with his Saviour dear:
There soon is all forgotten
That he hath suffered here.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1849.

NEW YEAR'S DAY.

THE old year is dead. Its joys, its hopes, its schemes of ambition or pleasure all are perished. Many of the friends and kindred with whom we have exchanged salutations at its opening, are gone, and, with many of our brightest hopes and dearest joys have been swallowed up by the pitiless grave. Only the memory of them remains to us, to-day. Standing, as we do, by the tomb of the dead year, and by the cradle of the new, it becomes us to pause a little, and meditate the solemn lesson, which the season reads to us; to recall and review the past, to consider our present state as moral beings, and to consider how we may best prepare ourselves for future usefulness. We should not so far forget ourselves in the gaieties and amusements of the season, as to exclude from our thoughts those serious reflections which the truths that surround us, are fitted to awaken in our hearts.

It is well for us, at times, to forget the world for a moment, enter into ourselves and make a thorough examination of our own hearts.—And what time so fitting as this? All the changes of the year, all those alternations of time which attract our observation, were no doubt designed as means of improvement and progress to aid us in accomplishing the grand purpose for which we were created. Indeed, all the dispensations of Providence—our prosperity, our adversity, our trials, our comforts, our hopes, our fears, our joys, our sorrows, our health, our sickness, our strength, our infirmities, our occupations of business, our enjoyment of pleasure—all, in fine, that surrounds us, and all that happens to us—events, changes, seasons—are so many agents to bring our numerous faculties into exercise, to keep them from inaction, and gradually to advance them toward that perfection of which they are capable, and for which they are destined. We are here to learn our obligations of love, and gratitude, and reverence to Heaven—the duties of purity and virtue with regard to ourselves, and of compassion, and justice, and charity, toward our neighbors. We are placed, here, not only to hear and receive the lessons of wisdom and goodness, the rolling year is ever bringing to us, but to act upon them; not only to study virtue in theory, but to be governed by it in practice.

We have all duties, most imperious duties to perform. Let us resolve then, here, on the first day of the year, to be faithful to those duties. No one of us, dear readers, is so humble that he may not do much good, or on the contrary, that he may not be the occasion of much harm. In every calling, in every grade of life, how many useful precepts may an individual instil into the minds of those around him, how many good ideas may he advance, how many things he may say, that shall serve to check vice and encourage virtue, that shall lead his associates to be more conscientious, more prudent, more benevolent, more useful and happy members of society? How many things he may do to lessen the sum of human woe, to relieve distress, and to shed the radiance of a pure and commanding example around him? By being temperate, correct, prudent, diligent and benevolent, how much influence will he not exert upon those around him to conform themselves to his feelings and habits?

Let such be your meditations, friends and brethren, at the beginning of the year. Remember that it is life's great duty to sacrifice the temporal to the eternal, the present to the future, and the relative to the absolute. In the midst of the festivities of the season, and under the beaming radiance of those bright hopes which gild the coming time, forget not that the least and most trifling of your thoughts, and words, and deeds march forth with unerring certainty toward the future, to gather up the appropriate recompense, whether it be bright or dark.

Let us strive, then, this year to make some progress in goodness, and to make the world around us happier and better, by our having lived in it. We salute you, therefore, brethren and friends, with our editorial benediction, and wish you 'a Happy New Year.'

THE NEW-YORK QUESTION.

AND THE NEXT SESSION OF THE R. W. G. LODGE U. S.

Our friends of the New Constitution party in this State have, as we have before remarked, looked forward to a future session of the Grand Lodge of the United States, for a reversal of the late decision against them. Many Lodges are influenced, we learn, to adhere to an unauthorized organization, calling itself the Grand Lodge of New York, and remain out of the Order, by the hope that the G. L. U. S., at its next annual meeting, will legalize their proceedings, and restore them to fellowship. We revert to this subject now, because we wish to show our friends that they have been deceived by false hopes. The question is now settled definitely. There can be no change. The suspended Lodges in New York can never again become members of the great family of Odd-Fellows, but by acquiescing in the decision of the R. W. G. L. U. S., and petitioning for re-instatement. And why not do this? We believe that most of the brethren who adhere to the new organization, are honest, well-meaning men, but deceived. And consequently we have not a doubt that most of them will soon return to the fold from which they have strayed. The UNITY of the Order ought to be the first thing in thought of an Odd-Fellow, and he should be willing to submit to almost everything, so far as the administration of the affairs of the Order are concerned, rather than raise a finger to disturb it. The Order of Odd-Fellows is a Republic, not an anarchy.

The following table will show the exact character of the G. L. U. S. for 1849, and shows how very fallacious are the hopes of the New Constitution party, mentioned above.

GOLD! GOLD!! GOLD!!!

EVERYBODY is leaving, or preparing to leave, for California, this new found El Dorado. Old men and young men, wise men and fools, rich and poor, are turning their eyes with longing toward this land of golden hopes. No less than twenty vessels, of various sizes, are advertised to sail some time during the month of January, carrying out their freights of expectant gold-seekers.

We have no doubt that the accounts regarding the abundance of gold in California, are mainly true; nor do we doubt that large quantities of the precious metal have been gathered by individuals without much labor. Still, we would advise those who are going out to the gold region, to moderate their expectations. They should consider well their privations. They should bear in mind that in California there is as yet no law but the will of the strongest, and that life and property are insecure, and that in the most favorable circumstances, they must labor harder, and fare worse than our Southern slaves, or State's prison convicts. Then again, the climate is unhealthy, and the cholera will find there an admirable sphere for its ravages during the ensuing summer. We dislike to be a prophet of evil, but we cannot forbear expressing the opinion that, of those who go out to California, but few will return, and that those few will not be much richer than before.

THE CHOLERA—DEATH OF DR. HAWKS.—We regret to see by the Southern papers, that this terrible disease is prevalent in New Orleans, and in most cases has proved quite fatal. On Monday evening, intelligence reached this city of the death of Rev. Dr. Hawks. It would seem from this and other cases, that the disease does not confine its ravages to the lowest classes of society—to the intemperate and filthy, but attacks all who are exposed to it.

The death of Dr. Hawks touches us profoundly. He was alone in New Orleans; his family being in New York, little expecting a blow like this. May heaven support them in their trials, and the hopes and promises of religion console them in this dark season of grief.

OUR NEW FORM.—We are convinced that our patrons will be pleased with the present appearance of the Gazette and Rule, and especially with the contents of this first No. of the volume. Will our brethren of the press be so kind as to exchange with us a New Year's salutation?

VIVE LE NAPOLEON.—It appears by the last advices from Europe, that Louis Bonaparte has been elected President of the French Republic. Whatever may be the result of this election, we do not fear anything disastrous to the Republican character of the French. A monarchy is no longer possible in France, and the Empire died with the great Napoleon. Louis Napoleon may, perhaps, make as good a President as Gen. Cavaignac.

THE PHYSICIAN'S MISSION.

"A wise Physician skilled our wounds to heal,
Is more than armies to the public weal."

PHYSIC, at the present time and in this country, seems to be regarded by the mass of people as a mere trade, and they think, perhaps truly, that "If physio be a trade, it is the trade of all others the most exactly cut out for a rogue." They regard the physician in the same light as the watchmaker, who, with eyes armed with a microscope, examines very carefully and sapiently the machinery of his customer's watch, in order to discover the disorder, and finally tells him that he can do no good to the watch without taking it all to pieces; while another, more honest, would have told him that he had only forgotten to wind it up.

There is unquestionably too much reason for taking such a view of the medical profession, yet taking into consideration the influence of the profession as a whole, and the position of its leading minds, a far different conclusion must inevitably be arrived at. The counterfeit coin only proves the existence of a genuine, and the more valuable the coin, the more attempts at counterfeiting it.

Physicians have, in nearly all ages of the world, been held in very high estimation. The most learned men of all ages have united in ranking very high the learning and humanity of medical men.

In Ecclesiastics it is said, that "God created the physician and the physic, and that he hath given science to man, and that 'tis he that healeth man, &c."

The Savior of the world, when upon earth, made it a special business to heal the sick, inasmuch that "whithersoever he entered, unto villages and cities, and countries, they laid the sick in the streets, and besought that they might touch, if it were but the border of his garment; and as many as touched him were made whole." The great orator, Cicero, says: "that nothing brings men nearer the gods, than by giving health to their fellow creatures." Plato, the great heathen philosopher, says, that a good physician is second only to God himself.

"How the tender springs of life," says an eminent physician, "that elevate a man to move but a little below the angels, vibrate and ravish the mind with pleasure, when our art snatches a victim friend from the jaws of death! And shall we then prefer inglorious ease to the divine energy of raising the dead?"

Pope, in his epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, says:

"Friend of my life, which did not you prolong,
The world had wanted many an idle song."

A large number of medical men have gone forth from Europe and the United States, to foreign countries as missionaries, not of medical art exclusively, or even principally, but rather with the intent of rendering medical science and art subservient to the propagation of Christianity. Dr. Macgowan, an American medical missionary at Ningpo, has written a tract, entitled, "Claims of the Missionary Enterprise on the Medical Profession;" which contains, says a reviewer, facts and arguments of interest to every practitioner who looks beyond this earth, and the pains and sorrows he has to alleviate; nay, of deep and surpassing interest, because if truly Christian, he must see that the medical missionary is therein more closely assimilated to the founder of his holy religion than any other. "Of the physician it is the high and honorable boast, that with him science is merely the necessary means to an important end—that all his knowledge is eminently practical, and its great purpose benevolent. It is his province to assuage human suffering in all its varieties and aggravations, and, in imitation of the Savior, 'to heal all manner of diseases.'"

In consequence, probably, of the abounding numbers of skillful physicians, a lower estimate is placed upon the value of a well skilled practitioner. He is no longer considered as "more than armies to the public weal." Such facts and views, however, as above detailed are sufficient to show that the physician has presented to him a much wider field of thought and moral action than is generally assigned to him. A due consideration of the true position and duties of the physician, is worthy of attention, and demands a most comprehensive tone and method. The physician's proper study is MAN, in every possible relation. He has to study man as a spiritual being, and as a mere animal; as a moral creature, and as a piece of vital machinery; as in the "image of God," and as an unreasoning brute. He has to study man as the masterpiece of God's handiwork; and designed as such to reflect in his nature and relations the image of him after whose likeness he was formed. Who so likely, then, as the physician, if he be a true scholar, to obtain a knowledge of God—of the Divine Idea?

In considering man as a spiritual being, the physician is bound to study all questions arising from theology or moral philosophy, in connection with the structure, functions, and disorders of the brain and nervous system. The nature of his studies inevitably leads him to the conclusion that all men are alike the offspring of the same parent, and that a universal fraternity in the family of man, was the design of the Great Author of his being. With such a broad scope of inquiry, which it is imperative that the physician should occupy, it is not surprising that he should sometimes come to conclusions not exactly in accordance with the principles of dogmatic theology, or of the popular code of morals, that he has been lenient in his judgments, slow to punish, ready to plead human infirmity in excuse for crime, thrown the shield of professional opinion over the thief and murderer; that he has pleaded for toleration, been latitudinarian in his principles, and, in short, has been pronounced a simpleton, a protector of felons, a heretic, a materialist, an irreligious person, an atheist, and that too, quite frequently by ministers of the gospel, to whom, from professional respect and courtesy, he is in the habit of rendering his professional services gratis. He is regarded as a man who must be "all things to all men," in order to render his profession as much as possible a lucrative trade.

The mind of the supremely selfish man is not open to the reception of the sublime truths contained in the science of human nature; hence, if such a man pursues the profession of medicine, his mind grasps naturally, only such facts and principles as are calculated to minister to his selfish propensities, to fill his pockets; and as a matter of course, he practices the profession as a mere trade. But between such a man and the true-minded scholar, a wise discrimination should always be made in regard to all professions.

"The honest scholar," says an eminent writer, "is the only true scholar." * * * "If knowledge appears to those who want both genius and integrity, only as a means to the attainment of certain worldly ends, she reveals herself to him who, with honest heart, consecrates himself to her service, not only in her highest branches, which touch closely upon things divine, but down even to her meanest elements, as something originating in, and determined by the eternal thought of God himself."

It is to the honest-minded physician, that God's handiwork is revealed, and the operations of infinite wisdom laid open in the living creation, and especially in man, the image of God. The medical profession are the recognised cultivators and appliers of the science of human nature, and as such, have a mighty future mission to fulfil toward humanity. The attention of the profession has been, and is still directed to the arrest and extinction of epidemics; to the highest degree of salubrity attainable by sanitary improvements; and in these fields the most brilliant results have been accomplished. The physician everywhere comes in contact with misery and vice, with degraded habits, ignorant, superstitious, and injurious customs, with the numerous families of the poor, and the pampered homes of the rich. To all he can give advice with benefit, and in every sphere diffuse a knowledge of hygiene. Too often, however, he finds that those with whom he has to do, will not recognise him as a friend, but impugn his motives. They do not distinguish between the true physician and the charlatan. To remedy this evil, seems to be a settled point among the profession to communicate their knowledge as much as possible—to make it popular; either orally and private, orally and public, or in publications.

Prof. Meigs, of the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, says, in a series of letters to his class, that one great cause of unsuccess in medical science, is the absence of information among the population generally. "This absence of information is the fruitful source of Homeopathy, Hydropathy, Thomsonianism, Panaceaism, and all the Catholicisms, infallible worm destroying lozenges, Balms of Gilead, and that shocking absurdity, the Vegetable Pill, which, like a sort of epidemic diarrhoea, has tormented the intestinal canal of thousands and tens of thousands of our far-seeing compatriots, until the American population have become hardened in purgations. If Horace were here, he would not think the dura meporum ilia the toughest things in creation." * * * "I say, then, it is our own stupidity and remissness that work evil to the people, and redound to our own hurt also; for there is no person, endowed with a good share of common sense, to whom you could not address, through that common sense, a reasonable and plain statement of the facts of his case, the probabilities as to its course, duration, and end; with an enumeration of the safest, most convenient, and certain process for its cure. Imagine such a person, well informed, and you have the idea of a patient the most docile, the most exact in therapeutic and hygienic obedience; the most confiding in your skill, and the most grateful for your intervention in his behalf. Would that all our brethren in this land might adopt views like these. With their united force of intellect, of character, of beneficence, and of social station, it would be but a short time ere the diminished head of charlatanism, under whatever disguise, would be found only to lift itself up among the most ignorant and abject portions of the population, instead of riding, as it does to-day, with chariots and with horsemen, a shame to the intelligence of the age, and a perpetual eye-sore to the lover of truth, and the contemner of every species of imposture. Let us explain ourselves then to the people."

Again he says: "If I could give you the best piece of advice in my power, I think I should give you this advice, namely: in all your dealings with mankind as physicians, and in all your life-doings, strive, first, to increase the boundaries of your knowledge; and second, strive to make that knowledge as vulgar, as popular as possible."

The views, now briefly presented, of the medical man's mission and consequent duties, are respectfully offered to the consideration of every lover of Truth. As will be seen, they are not the views of the writer only, but of a vast body of the medical profession, who are assiduously laboring for progress and reform.

ORIGIN OF ODD-FELLOWSHIP.

In seeking for the origin of Odd-Fellowship, we do not wish to be understood as looking for data as to the age of the institution. As men, or Odd-Fellows, we do not care whether the Order originated with Adam, or with Noah—whether its original archives are in the graves of the primeval Eden, or whether they rest in that Ark, so sacred in Jewish and Christian Chronology, or whether it belongs to the improvements of the 19th century. The date of an institution can be no guarantee for its utility.—It may be ancient as our mother earth, yet it may at the same time be noxious as the poisoned Upas. It may have been sanctioned by kings, by princes and priests, who have belonged to the rusty ages of the past, and yet antiquity can give no real glory to its existence, nor can titles of men, sanctioned by time, add to its utility. It may have been baptized in the vapory mists of that dew, first set in the clouds of Heaven as a sign to man; yet all of this can give no reality to that which has no substance in the experience of truth.

We seek for the origin of Odd-Fellowship in a different channel—we seek for it in society—in the corruptions of the times—in the injustice which prevails between man and man—in a want of the common feeling for the universal good—in the inhumanity so prevalent—in the want of charity and brotherly love, and in the entire lack of that friendly sympathy, which is not only the bond of society, but the surety of its progression to permanent prosperity and peace.

Odd-Fellowship is now, and always has been, a "Brotherhood," the foundation of which is, goodwill to all classes and conditions of men, but more especially to those who are of the Fraternity. But why has this brotherhood been established? Answer: because there has been no real brotherhood existing in the world for centuries; because men were unkind to each other, and forgetful of each other's wants—association, on the broadest foundation of enlarged benevolence, became necessary; because men abused the gifts conferred by a beneficent Providence, and used them only for the advancement of the most selfish purposes—it was imperatively demanded that a strict conservative principle should be established, through the agency of which mankind would be made to act like beings born for a higher destiny than that of earth, and brought to feel and to realize that they are brethren, by a common law of nature, and that they should be friends, by the practice of those kindly charities by which our condition only can be blessed, and on earth made a very heaven!

In a word, the Order of Odd-Fellows has been established to carry out three cardinal principles of human happiness—"Friendship, Love and Truth." Had mankind acted in accordance with these maxims, Odd-Fellowship would have been unnecessary. But the reverse has been the case.—The friendship of the world is but a fable—its love but a dream, and its truth but a shallow pretense. The wise and good have seen, and deplored the evil and sought the remedy. It is found in the institution of our Order, one of the lights of the age. It seeks to inspire its members with a love for each other—to imbue their hearts with a feeling of the most expanded charity and universal philanthropy, and bids them go forth among men, and sow the seeds of kindness and love. Thus our Lodge-rooms are made the schools of virtue, and we go thence to the broad theater of the outer world, to practice what we learn within our holy temples. Can such an institution fail in its mission?

ODD-FELLOWS HALL, NEW YORK.

It will be seen by the following circular, that this magnificent building will soon be ready for occupancy. We shall shortly give a full description of it.

Office of the Board of Managers of the Odd-Fellows' Hall Association of the City of New York, December 11, 1848.

The Board of Managers are gratified in being enabled to announce to the Lodges disposed to occupy apartments in the new Hall, that at 8 o'clock, P. M., on the 15th day of January next, the Board will proceed to decide on applications for Lodge Rooms, on the principles announced in the circular of February 16th, 1848, viz: "The Lodge having the largest subscription for stock in the Hall, to have the first choice of room and night of meeting for its own body, at the terms fixed; the Lodge having the next largest subscription, to have the next choice; and so on with all subscribing Lodges that desire to occupy premises in the Hall. Where the subscription of two or more Lodges are equal, choice among them will be determined by lot. After subscribing Lodges are accommodated, should there be an excess of tenements, they may be let to non-subscribing Lodges. In all cases the Board reserves the right of refusing a lease where the good of the Order may require it."

To enable Lodges to learn in ample time their several relative positions on the stock list, a statement is herewith submitted, showing the same at this date.

Since the issue of the last circular, to meet the increased demand for accommodation, the plan of building has been to some extent modified, by which an additional Lodge Room has been constructed, and ample provision made for the meeting of six Lodges each night.

The finishing and decorations of the room are now in rapid progress, and it is expected that before the time of allotment, they will be in such condition as to enable Lodges to make satisfactory selection.

Three of the rooms are expected to be in readiness for occupancy in February; and the remainder before the first of May, ensuing.

By the accompanying statement of terms, &c., it will be seen that no two rooms are to be fitted up in the same style, it being the desire of the management to gratify every taste, and afford an agreeable variety in the finish of the apartments.

In the last circular it was announced that the number of shares of Hall Stock remaining unsubscribed, was eighteen hundred and seventy-one; since which time there have been nine hundred and seventeen shares taken; leaving nine hundred and fifty-four shares of the capital stock not yet subscribed for, as exhibited in the appended statement. The smallness of this balance of untaken shares will admonish Lodges desirous of securing an early choice of "Lodge Room and night of meeting," of an immediate enlargement of their subscriptions; as the hour of commencing the allotment will alone terminate the period of qualifying for prior choice. And for the purpose of affording them full opportunity, individual subscription will, meanwhile, be discouraged by every proper means.

In all cases, leases will be given for a term of years, under wholesome reservation, for the general interest of the Order.

By order,

JOHN A. KENNEDY, President.

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Secretary.

COHOKTON LODGE, NO. 213.

Whereas, We believe the Constitution submitted by the G. L. of the U. S. to the G. L. of the State of N. Y., was taken up by that G. L. at its November session, 1847, and as directed by the G. L. of the U. S., was at that session amended and adopted, and forthwith became the legal Constitution of the G. L. of the State of N. Y.; and whereas, said Constitution, styled the New Constitution, was recognized by this Lodge, and by a large majority of our sister Lodges in this State, as the truly legal and binding Constitution existing in said State; and whereas, we believe that the legal continuance has not been impaired by the subsequent action of any of the officers or Lodges working under and by virtue of said New Constitution, but that it is still binding upon us. Therefore,

Resolved, That the decision of the G. L. of the U. S., restoring the Old Constitution after the New Constitution had been legally adopted, being utterly destructive to all the powers heretofore vested in State Grand Lodges, and to all the rights of a State jurisdiction, is not binding upon us as a Lodge, and that we will sustain the Grand Lodge of the State of N. Y. working under the New Constitution, in maintaining its independence of autocratic despotism, and that we will yield to it a firm and steady support.

Resolved, That we tender our sincere thanks to those members of the G. L. of the U. S. who supported and defended our organization, and also to G. M. D. P. Barnard and G. Representatives John W. Dwinelle and Theodore Dimon, for their zeal and faithfulness in executing the trusts committed to their hands.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing Preamble and Resolutions to each Lodge in this district, and to the legal and Constitutional G. L. of this State.

Passed by Cohokton Lodge, No. 213, at a regular meeting, December 15, 1848.

DUTIES OF ODD-FELLOWS.

EXTRACT FROM BRO. VAN WINKLE'S ADDRESS, Before Adelphi Lodge, Clarksburg, Va.

"But, brethren of the Order, this is but one of the many influences scattered round you to confirm your good intentions, and to dissuade you from what is wrong. Need I ask whether, in your estimation, the Order is worth preserving in its purity? If it is, much depends upon every individual connected with it, to shield it from reproach, and to illustrate in his own case the advantages it is calculated to confer. Your mere adhesion to it imposes an obligation, more comprehensive than any formal pledge or promise, to maintain its integrity and uphold its usefulness. Its prosperity, even its continued existence, must depend upon the faithfulness of its members individually; and, therefore, every brother should feel himself deputed, like certain officers of the Roman Republic, "to see that it takes no harm." His first duty will evidently be to watch narrowly, that his own conduct conforms to the principles of the Order. This must not be mere outward conformity, but he must strive so to educate his heart, that benevolence and sincerity become its leading impulses, and integral parts of its character, exemplified every where and to all. He must also watch the character and conduct of his brother in every concern of Odd-Fellowship; not with the desire of finding faults and imperfections—not as a spy seeking to discover errors and infirmities that he may expose them—but as the truest friend, deprecating, yet watching for, the appearance of the plague spot, that he may bring the remedy ere the disease becomes too deeply rooted in the system. It is, as you know, the duty of each to warn, to counsel and to remonstrate with an erring brother; and it is not among the least of your privileges, that the truth will be spoken to you in friendship and love, should you wander from the true path. The proper discharge of this duty is most important to the prosperity of the Order, but there is great danger of our entering upon it more to gratify our own censoriousness than because the occasion calls for it. It must therefore be approached with great deliberation, but if satisfied that it is demanded, with equal firmness. Shakespeare, to whom the ways of the human heart seem to have been almost intuitively known, has given a rule upon the subject, which I recommend you to practice when you feel called on to remonstrate with a brother—

"Go to your bosom;

Knock there, and ask your heart what it doth know

That's like [your] brother's fault: if it confess

A natural guiltiness, such as is his,

Let it not sound a thought upon your tongue

Against [your] brother."

"If this rule is acted on, the observation of a brother's conduct, by leading us to scrutinize our own more closely, cannot fail to result in benefit to ourselves.

"It has been no part of my purpose to endeavor to point out the various duties of Odd-Fellows. But I will add, that it is the duty of every brother to watch and to control for good, as far as it is in his power, the Order itself. As a body, it must be consistent, united and vigilant, and must scrupulously confine itself within its proper sphere. It must be prudent, patient and persevering; and must not be diverted from its peculiar mode of operation. It must not forget that its object is not to effect grand and striking results, but to diffuse more widely and certainly the good at which it aims. There is enough in its past history to cheer it on, and to vindicate the course it has hitherto pursued.

May I not, then, in the true spirit of our Fraternity, adjure each brother whom my words can reach, by all we work for and by all we hope, to show his devotion to the good of the Order, by abstaining from every thing that may injure it, and by bringing to its support his best abilities and exertions, and above all, the potent influence of a good example?"

ODD-FELLOWS HALL BURNED.—The Hall of Yazoo Lodge, I. O. O. F., Yazoo City, Miss., was destroyed by fire on the morning of Dec. 1, with all the regalia and furniture of the Lodge. There was no insurance.

HO! FOR CALIFORNIA!!

That the American people are the most impulsive in the world, is strikingly illustrated by the excitement now pervading all classes in relation to the reported riches of our newly acquired territory of California—and the unprecedented zeal with which almost every one possessed of the means to reach the 'golden land,' sets about putting his house in order, making provision for his family (if he have one) during his absence, winding up extensive business in as many days as it would take months under ordinary circumstances, and embarking with light heart and high hopes, for a perilous and tedious voyage to a country 17,000 miles distant by sea, in the hope of either mending a broken fortune, or the building up of one where none ever before existed.

To one of a settled character and placid temperament, this wonderful excitement, generally, of the public mind, is perfectly astonishing,—that men possessed of lucrative business, happy homes, and all the endearments necessary for the enjoyment of life in this world, should be so perfectly carried away by this mania, is beyond our comprehension. It has reached all classes—the merchant and the mechanic—the farmer and the lawyer—and even our staid, sober, philosophizing brothers of the quill, begin to experience mysterious workings of the frigid and phlegmatic feelings which have for years lain buried beneath the dust of some musty manuscript, or kept in submission by some mighty but carefully concealed thought: and ever and anon you hear from the quiet editorial sanctum, the exciting cry of "Ho! for California!"

Then we can imagine to ourselves the phrenzied eye, the dilated cheeks, the firm clenching of the fist, and the sturdy putting down of the foot, as the determination to emigrate to the "Gold Regions" is put beyond any doubt. But, thank Heaven! we are unmoved by it—and are content to take this side of sundown as our abiding place.

Among the thousands who are about leaving us, we have several well-cherished friends, who in times past, have done essential service to literature, and in whose judgments we place much confidence. We allude to JONAS WINCHESTER, Esq., former publisher of the New World, and Golden Rule; CALEB LYON, of Lyonsdale, the eminent oriental scholar and poet; JAMES B. DEVOE, Esq., former editor and publisher of the Daily American Patriot, and DANIEL NORCROSS, Esq., of Philadelphia—the able correspondent of the Golden Rule from that city.

These gentlemen sailed in the ship Tarolinta, on the 6th inst., and carry out with them a complete set of machinery for washing gold, provisions for 18 months, tents and camp equipage, tests, assaying and smelting apparatus, and in fact every article necessary for the rapid prosecution of gathering the gold dust of California, and the sustenance of their corporeal bodies. We particularly commend these gentlemen to the courtesies of the Californians, in general, and the whole world in particular.

Animated, as we know them to be, by the most indomitable perseverance, talents, and energy of character, we cannot for a moment doubt, that if wealth and distinction is to be acquired in the territory to which they are wending their way, they are just the men to succeed. We wish them every success.

LETTER FROM LITTLE DELAWARE.

NEWARK, Dec. 29, 1848.

DEAR EDITOR: When this epistle reaches your reverend hands, it will be already the year of our Lord 1849; '48, with its bloody revolutions and royal slaughters, will have passed away, but its memory will remain in history as the greatest epoch of popular movements in Europe, and of the progress of liberal ideas. You see that I am once more retired from the noisy world, but alas! only for a few days. Less happy than our friend J. J. Rousseau, I have not been able yet to find another island of Saint Pierre, or the Hermitage. Nevertheless, when I can run away awhile from the dirty streets of New York, to this humble cottage, I feel a degree of happiness. I wish I could remain here all my life; I love the country and a retired existence. I think as the learned Solomon, that "better is a dry morsel and quietness therewith," than CHICKENS AND ROAST TURKEYS in a house full of politics, bigotry and sacrifices. The windows of my bed room open toward the East, and at sunrise I kneel like the inhabitant of the American forest before that great symbol of Divinity, and worship Almighty God in his wonderful works.

I left the city of Gotham on the elegant and beautiful steamboat John Potter, of the Camden railroad company. It would be enough to say that this line is under the administration of Mr. Bliss, a most accomplished gentleman. The proprietors of this line spare neither expense nor labor to make it the most comfortable road for traveling in the United States. Neither the cars nor the steamboat John Potter are surpassed by those of any other company; and you may know all the comforts of this convenient line when you have the misfortune to travel on the Baltimore road. God spare you and your friends from the seats and cars of this company. As a proof of what I tell you, last Sunday, leaving Philadelphia for Newark, Del., I was condemned to a seat in a kind of surgical arm-chair, which seems to have been used in some hospital in the Quaker city. I wished to be again on the Camden line, sitting on those comfortable elastic cushions, covered with velvet and damask; but I must be short at present, on this subject. I shall consecrate to it a larger space in my letters on America.

I shall speak to you awhile of little Delaware—of what I have seen, heard and done since my arrival at Mr. Joseph T.'s house. Last Sunday night we were awakened by the unexpected visit of a couple. It was a bride just blessed by some divine, who came, with her husband, to ask refuge and lodging under Mr. T.'s roof. It was a most stormy night—the horse would go no further, and the Miss missed was desirous of finding some lodging; in a word, all was revolution in our house, and Mr. T., known here as a generous and fine fellow, offered his own room, which was accepted, and the couple retired to sleep together, I think, for the first time in their life. But the most interesting part of their conjugal difficulties was previous to their marriage. Early in the morning, they left their native place, some twenty miles from Newark, in search of a clergyman. They had already traveled six hours, without finding any reverend who would unite them in legitimate bonds, not that there are no clergymen in Delaware, (on the contrary, there are too many,) but because it was necessary to obtain a license from New Castle; and as the young lady decided not to return home unmarried, she advised her beau to pass into Pennsylvania, where laws are cheaper and more liberal. But the horse, who was a native of Delaware, and proud of his country, would not cross the boundary on that day, and in spite of the thousand curses of his master, and his many whippings, he would not go an inch further, and they were obliged to leave Jack, and to accept another horse from Mr. T. Thus they passed into Pennsylvania; but all was not over yet. Here two clergymen, refused to marry them, saying that they never did such things on Sunday! Mr. T., who is so generous and kind to young people on these occasions, and it being about midnight, said he would try another minister, who, for five dollars, would marry them two or three times. Thanks to Mr. T., they were blessed by a Methodist charge, and sent forth as husband and wife. The bride, who resembles a Russian grenadier, is a damsel of five and thirty winters; as to Mr. S., if he is not quite as old as his wife, he is at least more stupid, as he had the boldness to tell his moitie, before every one, that he married her in spite of another gail, whom he loved much.

We had a concert at Newark on Christmas day. Mr. Millar, a fine vocalist, and an excellent professor of calligraphy, gave a musical soiree at the Washington Hotel to a crowded house. He was assisted by other eminent musicians, and has become the lion of the girls of this State. He has formed several classes for singing and writing. Every one who is acquainted with him, wish a good success to Mr. Millar of New York.

LECTURES IN LODGES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, December 16, 1848.

DEAR SIR: The members of Algonquin Lodge No. 71, I. O. of O. F. of this city, having determined upon a course of lectures, for their mutual benefit and pleasure, before the Lodge, at stated intervals during the winter; and the services of some of their members having been procured for that purpose, the first of the course was delivered on Friday evening last, being the anniversary of the institution of the Lodge. The address was delivered by N. G. ABRAHAM V. SCHENCK, Esq. The subject was the reason and the objection of the Institution of Odd-Fellowship; the benefit resulting from it in a benevolent and social point of view; and a rational consideration of the different objections urged against it.

It was an elegant and powerful effort, and kept the large and brilliant audience in fixed attention for an hour. The subject was chosen, I understand, by the speaker, by request, it being considered the most appropriate for the occasion.

The Lodge-room is a perfect gem as regards neatness and comfort; and being brilliantly lighted for the occasion, presented a very fine appearance. Mr. Schenck's address made an evident impression upon the audience; and the continuance of these lectures on the plan proposed, leaving to the speakers the choice of their own subjects, will have a tendency to give the Institution a higher position in the estimation of our citizens, and overcome what little prejudice there may exist against it.

This is a very fine Lodge—the members being of the very heart and sinew of our citizens; and, although it has been in existence only one year, numbers about eighty members. I will keep you advised as to these lectures. Yours, &c., T.

MATTERS AND THINGS IN BALTIMORE.

HORACE GREELEY'S LECTURE.—The first lecture of the course, before the Maryland Institute, was delivered on Thursday evening last in the Universalist Church. The lecture was listened to by a large and deeply interested audience. Mr. Greeley's manner is earnest and impressive, and his thoughts are bold and original. This was the first opportunity which a Baltimore audience has had of hearing the distinguished lecturer.

THE GOLD FEVER.—There is no visible abatement of this fever. Multitudes are embarking their all in the enterprize. Merchants are ransacking their stores, in order to get together their old goods for shipment to the gold country. Whether there will be a market for all that is thither bound, remains to be seen.

THE HOLIDAYS.—Our city wears quite a holiday aspect. The confectioners, booksellers and print-dealers have rigged out their establishments in the finest style, and have thus made a desperate attempt to take the attention of the younger portion of the community. The streets are thronged with people; the stores with purchasers. Every one we meet has a present for some expecting loved one. Every face is wreathed with smiles, and all hearts are happy. Christmas day will, we hope, bring a full fruition to the brightest hopes and disappointment to none. Let joy abound.

MAYOR'S PROCLAMATION.—Mayor Stansbury has issued a Proclamation, in which notice is given of his intention to enforce the ordinance relative to the cleansing of the streets, as a preventive of the cholera. He also calls upon the citizens to use every precautionary measure that may tend to abate the virulence of the dreadful scourge, in the event of its visiting the city. It is to be hoped that the recommendations of the Mayor will meet with the most vigilant attention.

THE PRIZE TRAGEDY.—The prize of $1,000 offered by Edwin Forest, for the best tragedy, was taken by George Miles, Esq., of the Baltimore bar. We are gratified to learn this fact, and regard it as a proof that Baltimore is not without literary talent of the highest order.

JOHN T. MORRIS, Esq.—This gentleman was admitted to the Baltimore bar a few days since, and commences to practice with brilliant prospects. His literary acquirements are of the most thorough and respectable character. He graduated with high honors, several years ago, at Pennsylvania College; since which time he has prosecuted, with unwearied diligence—under the guidance of one of the most eminent lawyers of Maryland—his legal studies. Mr. Morris contributed several years since to one of the literary papers, a series of essays on subjects connected with the ethics and customs of the time—which attracted considerable attention; and evinced that he possessed powers of thoughtful analysis, and a style of expression, such as belong only to the most accomplished writers. His excellent talents, added to his popular manners and engaging address, cannot fail in commending him to an extensive practice. We sincerely wish him abundant success.

OUR STREETS.—The streets need a thorough scraping and cleaning. We have rarely seen them so dirty as now. The good work has been commenced, and will, we hope, be persevered in until there shall be left nothing that can offend.

Theatricals and Amusements.

We regret that the benefit for the Monplaisirs, at the OPERA HOUSE, was not better attended. This is the season of the holidays, and the public are absorbed in their own pastimes and merriments at home.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP'S Grand Gala Concert was attended by all the fashion and musical taste of the city. It was, from the variety and talent it embraced, a great treat to the dilettanti. The voyage musical, giving illustrations of music in all parts of the world, was a fine specimen of the taste and professional ability of Bochesa, and his execution on the harp was most brilliant and expressive. Both were received with loud applause. Bravos on all sides encircled Madame Bishop.

At the BROADWAY THEATER Miss Adele and Mr. Charles Hohnstock have been the attractions, playing respectively on the violin and piano-forte, and in a style of consummate excellence. The Carnival of Venice, the variations on the themes from "Il Pirati," and Meyer's air Italian, were all admirably given.

At the NATIONAL, J. R. Scott is playing his line of characters to full houses. W. B. Chapman and C. W. Clarke, late of the Park Theater, are added to their excellent stock company.

AMERICAN MUSEUM.—Mr. Hitchcock keeps up a constant excitement here. Besides an immense number of curiosities and attractions, we find Major Littlefinger, Hales the Giant, Ethiopian Minstrels, Pete Morris the comic singer, and Great Western.

This latter is a genius en genre. His new piece, "The Worst of Homestead," is full of fun and humor, and is well worth seeing. The Museum is an innocent place of amusement.

BOWERY.—Herr Driesbach has drawn crowded houses. His control over his noble animals is wonderful, and his performance highly interesting. The Living Statuary abounds in striking effects. Ciocca and Neri are dancing here this week.

BURTON'S.—Various light and amusing pieces have been brought forward at this house, written and played with great spirit and cleverness. After "Where's Barnum?" we have had the "California Gold Mines," with some admirable hits at the present mania. The satire is pointed, and most seasonable. We are to have "Vanity Fair." Thackeray has furnished capital materials.

The Minstrels, one and all, are well attended, and competition stimulates to excellence in this branch of amusement.

THE ZOOLOGICAL HALL contains a display of noble beasts, and of elephants of wonderful sagacity and training.

THE NEW ORLEANS SERENADES.—Of this popular style of entertainment none more deserve favor and patronage. The ballads, arranged by themselves, are sung in good taste, and always with great sweetness and effect. This also applies to their selections from Italian operas, some of which are given with expression and true feeling, and others rendered irresistibly comic. The parodies are full of humor, not being coarse or overwrought. As a fair specimen of the above, we would mention "Oh! Sally White," from Don Pasquale, and the "Banks of Old Tar River." The burlesque of the Italian opera is admirable. Faults and extravagance of manner on the stage are happily hit off, and the music rendered with an effect rarely surpassed. The vocal powers of several of the company we have already noticed, which are of a high order. But in addition, we have the bones capably played, a banjo without an equal, and a violin of which too much cannot be said in praise. The whole presents great attractions for an evening's entertainment.

NEW YORK AND NEW HAVEN RAIL-ROAD.—This work is now completed. The cars passed over it for the first time on the 25th ult. We now have a direct railroad communication with Boston, and the success of this road must be immense. Much credit is due Robert Schuyler, Esq., the President of the company, for his vigorous prosecution of the work. The Harlem road, under his administration, is going ahead admirably, and is fast rising in value. The depot of the New Haven road is to be in Canal street.

NEW YORK AND BOSTON TRAVEL.—During the winter season, everybody, of course, will go by the way of Stonington. The two boats on that line now are safe and strong, and their officers are skillful and prudent. Captains Howes and Stone are known to everybody. Messrs. Walker, Morse, and McConcklin are unequalled in their various departments. This is unquestionably the route to Boston.

BEAL'S $1 DAGUERRIAN SALOON.—Those of our readers who desire an elegant daguerreotype of themselves or friends, are advised to call on Bro. Beals. He thoroughly understands the art, and his pictures are of unparalleled elegance. Remember his place is 183 Broadway, over Milhew's drug store. Call and see him.

JAMES McALLISTER'S MEDICAL DEPOT, where one can find a remedy for every disease, is at 141 Fulton-st., New York. See advertisement.

We learn by the Rondout Courier that the navigation on the Hudson and Delaware Canal was suspended on the 16th ult. There had been up to the 4th of November 412,500 tons of coal brought down this Canal.

COAL MINE IN WESTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—Several weeks since, a Mr. Fuller, of the town of Weston, in Middlesex county, discovered, on a part of his farm, what he takes to be good evidence of the existence of a coal mine somewhere in that vicinity. In digging a trench, pieces of coal were thrown up, which proved to be of that description called bituminous. Probably coal was never used or carried to that region, and many think that a coal mine might be found there. It is stated by some, that several years ago, a person, while digging in this same place, threw up lumps of coal of fifteen or twenty pounds weight, which, upon being broken, burnt as freely as Cannel coal.

POPULATION OF CLEVELAND.—This beautiful city of the lakes, we see by the annual census for the year 1848, taken in October, continues its steady and somewhat rapid growth. The number of males is reported at 7,076, of females 6,583; total, 13,659, to which 575 are added for the "ten acre lots," (eastern liberty) making the whole number of inhabitants 14,234. The number of colored people in this city is put at 184.

NOBLE MUNIFICENCE.—Mr. James Robb, of New Orleans, has purchased Power's world-renowned statue of the Greek Slave, and has placed it on exhibition in that city—the entire proceeds of its exhibition to be appropriated to the relief of the destitute widows of the city.

It is estimated that there are now 27,343 white children, between the ages of four and twenty-one, in the public schools of Cincinnati. The net increase in number for the year 1840 has been 5,372.

THE CRADLE OF TEARS.—The Chinese word for eyelid is eminently beautiful, signifying the cradle of tears.

Two hundred and twenty-five English emigrants, who profess the Mormon faith, lately arrived at St. Louis, and destined for Salt Lake. It is said that between three and four hundred more are on their way from Liverpool.

THERE is a vast copper mine in Bristol, Ct., says the Hartford Whig, which is now worked by two hundred operatives. In the month of August, eighty-two thousand barrels of ore were shipped to the great metropolis.

Of the 6100 sailors who man the American navy, 960 are native Americans; the rest are chiefly composed of Irish and English emigrants.

MAJOR NOAH says that an invoice of cigars has arrived in New York, which sells at $1000 per thousand—a dollar a piece. They ought to be "some!"

SQUARE YEAR.—This year is the square of '43. We have not had a square year since 1764, and another will not occur until 1986. If every body will square up this year what a glorious time we shall have.

THE Liverpool Times says: "While the Americans have 600 or 700 ships engaged in whaling, the number of the English vessels is reduced to 17! The Americans, by some mode or other, have quite superseded us in this adventurous but profitable business."

THE total number of cases of cholera in Great Britain, since the first was reported, amounts to 1,215—the victims to 610; the recoveries have been 220, while 375 remain under treatment, or the result not stated.

THE population of Arkansas, by the Governor's estimate, is 300,000, which will give it three, in place of one member of Congress, in the next apportionment.

CHEAP BREAD.—A farmer in Genesee county, N. Y., states that his whole last year's crop of corn cost him but nine cents and three quarters a bushel, including the interest on the value of the land.

HARD OX.—The train from Boston to Salem ran against an ox the other night, which jarred the cars considerably, like a heavy sea striking a ship, but did no damage—the ox walking off with great dignity and composure.

THE town of Harper's Ferry was illuminated on the 17th, and the highest mountain top, about 800 feet above the village, was lighted up with an immense bonfire, and fireworks were let off from a convenient point. What for?

ETYMOLOGY OF CALIFORNIA.—We are informed by Professor Noodlekranz, that California comes from two old Indian words—Kali, gold, and fern-a-who, don't you wish you may get it.

FROM the recent report of the Post Master General we learn that 1309 new post offices were established during the last year, and 296 discontinued; giving a net increase of 1018.

THE misery in Ireland is very great. The cholera there is not increasing.

Scenes in the French Revolution.

ST. AMARANTHE.

From "Heroic Women of the French Revolution," a New Work recently published in London.

In one of the most sumptuous hotels in the center of Paris, recently built by the opulent philosopher Helvetius, lived a young woman of incomparable beauty, if she had not had a daughter of sixteen as beautiful and seducing as herself. This female called herself Madame de Sainte Amaranthe. Although she was said to be the widow of a gentleman slain in the affair of the 5th and 6th of October, while defending the door of the queen, at Versailles, and, though she affected the externals, the tone, and luxury of high life, a mystery and doubt hung over this woman, her origin, and habits, which caused opinion to float between admiration for her beauty, respect for her misfortunes, and the ambiguity of her position. Her house, attractive in so many ways, had assembled, by taste for the arts, play, and pleasure, from the commencement of the revolution, the eminent men of all factions: Royalists, Constituents, Orleanists, Girondins, successively. Mirabeau, Sieyès, Péthion, Chapelier, Buzot, Louvet, Vergniaud, had in turn frequented it. The graces of Madame de Sainte Amaranthe, and the seduction of her mind, had effaced all clouds in her vicinity, and filled up the abysses between their opinions.

She preserved, nevertheless, an ostensible attachment for the hopes and memories of royalty. She was allied with the royalists of the ancient aristocracy, and in her saloons she preserved the portraits of the king and queen, without much mystery. She did not disguise her veneration for those proscribed images of a better time. The prestige of her charms seemed to remove all danger from her, and nature defended her from the scaffold.

A young man of the extinct court, son of M. de Sartines, minister of police in Paris, had just married the daughter of Madame de Sainte Amaranthe. M. de Sartines had formed an intimacy with an actress of the Italian Theater, Mademoiselle Grandmaison. Although abandoned by her lover, this young actress still wrote to him. She informed him of the progress or suspension of the terror. Sartines, much touched with such constancy, came from time to time to Paris. He there saw his old friend in secret, and learned from her the political secrets. Mademoiselle Grandmaison picked them up from Frial, an actor at the same theater, a fiery patriot, and friend of Robespierre.

The hopes of clemency, conceived at the moment of the proclamation of the Supreme Being, had been a snare in which the royalists, the suspected, and the proscribed, were pleased to let themselves be taken. They conversed everywhere about the omnipotence of the new Cromwell, or new monk, of his attempts to quench the religious persecutions, of his wishes to abolish the scaffold, of his genius to reconstruct order, and of the leaning to royalty, or for the restoration of royalty, which they imagined in him. The scattered remains of the religious and royalist party consoled themselves by these dreams. The popularity of Robespierre was greater, perhaps, at this moment, in the party of the victims, than in the party of the executioners. Madame de Sainte Amaranthe was dazzled by it. She wished to return to Paris, and re-open her house to feasts and pleasure in the midst of general mourning. She trusted to the genius of Robespierre; she burned with the desire of knowing him, seducing him, and drawing him over to her opinions. In vain Mademoiselle Grandmaison, trembling for her lover, wrote to M. de Sartines, that the moment was sinister, that the committees and Robespierre were at variance, that the axe of the guillotine was suspended between a hoped-for mitigation and a more active terror. Madame de Sainte Amaranthe listened to nothing but her illusions. She hurried away her daughter, her son-in-law, and a child of fifteen, her son, to Paris.

There she was more and more confirmed, by the conversation of some friends, in the dispositions she attributed to the triumvir. Undoubtedly, these very dispositions were insinuated in her by the agents of Robespierre, for he was seeking at this time to bring everything to his name; even royalists, by the currents of hope. M. de Quesvremont, formerly a dependant of the house of Orleans, and now intriguing for the friendship of Robespierre, caused Madame de Sainte Amaranthe to partake of his enthusiasm for the predestined man, as he said, who was only waiting the hour when his designs should be ripe, and who was only granting to terror what he was not yet permitted to take away from it. Fanatical disciple of Catherine Théos,* M. de Quesvremont spoke to Madame de Sainte Amaranthe of the new worship as of a profound conception of the restorer of order. He also inspired herself, her daughter, and her son-in-law, with the desire of getting initiated themselves. "It was," said he, "an act which would inspire confidence in Robespierre." A Marquise de Chastenaïs, an ardent royalist, and more ardent adept of the Mère de Dieu, finished Madame de Sainte Amaranthe's determination for this adoption. Sartines, his mother-in-law, and his wife were introduced, by night, into the loft of the Mère de Dieu. These two Sainte Amaranthes, handsome royalists, received upon their forehead the kiss of peace from the infirm sybil, which was to be so soon for them the kiss of death. Whether the condescension of these two young women really was a pledge in the eyes of Robespierre,—whether his mind was penetrated with the desire and pride of seeing the two most celebrated beauties of Paris bow themselves before his genius,—whether he wished to hold out, through them, a bait to the proscribed parties to attach them to the regular order which he meditated,—he consented to an interview with his two admirers. Frial, theater-man and common friend, conducted Robespierre to Madame de Sainte Amaranthe's. He was there received as dictator, who consents to let his designs be anticipated. He was seated at her table in the middle of a circle of guests chosen by himself. He breathed of enthusiasm. He let himself be gently blamed for the excesses he had suffered too long. He spoke as a man who would turn upon the real criminals that guillotine which was still striking so many innocents. He opened his designs, to let hope shine in. Whether through the indiscretion of his host, or the infidelity of the guests, the committee of general safety got scent of these interviews and these demi-confidences. Vadier had already introduced one of his agents, Senart, into the meetings of the Mère de Dieu, to observe there the thoughts, and to note down the principal adepts. Vadier knew that Robespierre was her idol, and supposed him her instigator. He suspected him, since the 26th of Prairial, of wishing to draw the people to him by superstitions, and to caress the superior class by presages of clemency. Vadier wished to catch Robespierre at once in ridicule and in treason. He dared not find fault directly with a name which repelled suspicion, and which disconcerted aggression; but he hoped indirectly to pour upon this name a ridicule which would reflect upon his power. It was, at most, a daring enterprise to show at once to the Convention that the friends of Robespierre were not pure, and that his followers were not inviolable.

The committee of general safety, secretly agreeing with the majority of the committee of public safety, and with the conspirators of the Tallen reunion, ordered the arrest of Catherine Théos and her principal adepts. The committees ordered, at the same time, the arrest of the Marquise de Chastenaïs, of M. de Quesvremont, of M. de Sartines, and all the family of Sainte Amaranthe, without excepting the son, who was scarcely sixteen. They also arrested Mademoiselle Grandmaison and her servant Biret. They resolved to confound all these accusations, strangers to one another, in the grand indictment that Elie Lacoste was drawing up against L'Admiral and Cecile Renault, under the generic and vague name of foreign conspiracy. Vadier had been charged with drawing up the previous report against the sect of Catherine Théos. They had referred it to the malignity of this old man to give to the puerilities of Don Gerle* the dark colors of a conspiracy, and a varnish of ridicule which would stain even the name of Robespierre.

The name which everybody knew to be at the bottom of this affair was to be so much the more visible as it would be less expressed by Vadier. Robespierre had felt the blow advance; but the dagger was enveloped in respect. He could not openly take the defense of these sectarians, at a moment when they accused him of wishing to revive the superstitions, to sanctify his dictatorship. He had tried his utmost to get the reading of the report of Vadier to the Convention adjourned, under pretext of contempt. Vadier had been inflexible. He had found it necessary to undergo, in silence, the sarcasms of the reporter, the smiles of the auditory, and the malicious insinuations against his part of Mahomet. Ridicule had but slightly touched this terrible name, suspicion had thrown its shadow over its incorruptibility. The friends of Robespierre had felt it. They confidently advised him to beware of Vadier—a sort of Brutus, feigning churlishness to disguise hatred. "Do all you can," wrote Payan to Robespierre, "to diminish, in the eyes of opinion, the importance which they wish to give to the affair of Catherine Théos, and to convince the people it is only a childish juggle, which deserves but the laughter and contempt of serious men." In fine, soon after, Elie Lacoste made a report of the decree, which proposed to send to the revolutionary tribunal all the accused. They saw there, joined to the assassin L'Admiral and to Cecile Renault, the father, mother, and even the brothers of that young girl; M. de Sartines; Madame de Sainte Amaranthe; Madame de Sartines' daughter; her son, who had not arrived at the age of crime; MM. de Laval-Montmorency; de Rohan-Rochefort; the Prince de St. Maurice; MM. de Sombreuil, father and son, who had escaped the assassins of September; M. de Pons; Michonis, municipal of the Temple, guilty of compassion and decency towards the captive princesses; Madame de Lamartinière, widow of Epréménil; and, lastly, the actress Grandmaison, punished for the love of Sartines, and even the servant of this actress, punished for attachment to her mistress. They added to these sixty accused persons the porter of the house where L'Admiral had attempted to assassinate Collot-d'Herbois, and the wife of the porter,—both guilty, said the accuser, of not having been sufficiently transported with joy, when the assassin was arrested.

Robespierre, on hearing the names of Madame de Sainte Amaranthe and her family, was silent. He was afraid of appearing to protect the counter-revolutionists. He well knew it was his name they were striking at; but he timidly withdrew this name, not to appear struck himself—deplorable situation of men, who take popularity instead of conscience, as arbiters of their policy! They cover themselves with the body of innocent victims, instead of shielding themselves with their own intrepidity.

These sixty-two pretended accomplices saw each other, for the first time, before the Tribunal. L'Admiral was firm; Cecile Renault, genuine and affecting. She asked pardon of her father, her mother, and her brothers, for having drawn them, by her volatile conduct, into the appearance of a crime she had never conceived. She affirmed, before her death, that her pretended project of assassination was only curiosity to see a tyrant.

The Montmorencies, the Rohans, the Sombreuils, preserved the dignity of their innocence and their names. They did not belie the nobility of their blood before death. They died as their ancestors fought.

Madame de Sainte Amaranthe fainted away in the arms of her children. Sartines, in passing before Mademoiselle Grandmaison, bathed the hands of the actress with his tears. He begged of her to pardon him the death into which her attachment for him had drawn her. His wife surpassed her years by her resignation, and her beauty by her tenderness. She rejoiced to die with mother, husband, and brother. She pressed them by turns in her arms. She did not even repulse Mademoiselle Grandmaison, whom a cruel fate had associated in their misfortune. All jealousy and distance disappeared before death. The dying form but one family.

In order to strike the eyes of the people with a greater appearance of criminality, they had, for the first time since Charlotte Corday, put on all the condemned the red woollen chemise costume of assassins. An escort of cavalry, and some guns loaded with grape, preceded and followed the cortège, which was formed by eight tumbrils. In the first, they had made Madame de Sainte Amaranthe and Madame d'Epréménil take their seats on the front bench; and on the second were Madame de Sartines and Mademoiselle Grandmaison, two victims of one affection. In the next cart came M. de Sartines and his young brother-in-law, M. de Sombreuil and his son. The three others carried along, with the Montmorencies and the Rohans, the poor and faithful servant of Mademoiselle Grandmaison; who wept not for himself, he said, but for his mistress. The march was slow, the scaffold distant, the sky vernal, the crowd enormous. All eyes were centred on that group of female heads, so soon to be struck off. The warm reflection of the red gown set off the whiteness of their necks and the beauty of their complexions. The multitude were enchanted with the splendor of the charms about to be extinguished. The victims exchanged sad smiles, words in whispers, and looks of mutual commiseration. L'Admiral was indignant, lamenting over the fate of his so-called accomplices. "Not one," he exclaimed, "not one knew of my design; I wished alone to avenge humanity." Then turning towards Cecile Renault, who was praying with fervor, "You wished to see a tyrant: well, then, look—there are hundreds beneath you."

The march lasted three hours. The most obscure were put to death first; then Cecile Renault, Mademoiselle Grandmaison, L'Admiral, Madame d'Epréménil, the gentlemen of the ancient monarchy, and the young St. Amaranthe. His mother and sister saw the decapitated body tossed into the basket: their turn approached; the mother and daughter embraced, with one long, last kiss, which the executioner interrupted—the head of the daughter joined that of her young brother. Madame de Sainte Amaranthe died last but one; Sartines the last. During three-quarters of an hour's torture, he had seen the heads of his mistress, his brother-in-law—loved like a son—and his mother-in-law, and his wife fall. He was dead already, in all his feelings here below, long before the fatal knife touched him.

[This cowardice in Robespierre, who, for fear of risking his position, suffered them to die, did not save him. When does cowardice save a man? His weakness—his enemies knew they were striking him secretly—inflamed their hopes, and led to those concerted attacks which overthrew him. Had no other demerit attached to his name, this base abandonment of so many innocents who depended on him, was crime enough to condemn him.]

TO MAKE A MATCH.—Catch a young gentleman and lady in good condition:—let the gentleman be green and the lady tender. Place them at the dinner-table, and baste the gentleman with a good quantity of wine. While he is soaking, stick in a word now and then about Miss; this will help to make them boil. When he begins to change color and turn red, take him into the drawing room, set him and the lady side by side, stuff them with sweet cakes, and strong green tea. Then place them at the piano, and blow the flame till the lady sings; when you hear the gentlemen sigh, it is time to remove them, as they are warm enough. Now put them by themselves in a corner of the room, or on a sofa, and there let them simmer together for the rest of the evening. This sort of game is not cooked at one dressing, but if repeated two or three times, care being taken to keep them together as much as convenient, they will be ready for matrimony whenever they are wanted.

N. B.—After marriage they will require looking to now and then, as they are apt to become sour.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A GENTLEMAN?—"Halloo, you man with a pail and frock," said a British officer, as he brought his fiery horse to a stand in front of Gov. Chittenden's dwelling, "can you inform me whether his honor, the Governor of Vermont, resides here?"

"He does," was the response of the man, still wending his way to the pig sty.

"Is his honor at home?" continued the man of spurs.

"Most certainly," replied the man of the frock. "Take my horse by the bit then," said the officer, "I have business to transact with your master."

Without a second bidding, the man did as requested, and the officer alighted and made his way to the door, and gave the pannel several hearty raps with the butt of his whip—for he it known in those days of republican simplicity, knockers and bells, like servants, were in but little use. The good dame answered the summons in person: and having seated the officer and ascertained his desire to see the Governor, departed to inform her husband of the guest's arrival; but on ascertaining that the officer had made a hitching post of her husband, she immediately returned and informed him that the Governor was engaged in the yard, and could not very well wait upon him and his horse at the same time! The predicament of the officer can be better imagined than described.

IRISH MODE OF SHEEP STEALING.—A fellow named Terence M'Manus, having been arrested for sheep stealing, wrote the following to a friend: "As we wished to have some mutton with our turnips for supper, we went to Squire Carrell, who had more sheep than his neighbors. They were very wild, and the pasture very large, and we were obliged to take a new way to entice them by force to come near us, and as this may be of some service for you to no, I think it my duty to tell you of it. Pat Dougan an me rapped ourselves up in hay, and as the sheep came round to ate it we cut their throats; but a sarch being made, five hind quarters belonging to two of 'em was found in my cabin."

"I had rather not take a horn with you," said the loafer to the mad bull—but he insisted upon treating him to two, and the loafer got quite high.

Facts and Scraps.

VALUABLE INVENTIONS.—We understand that the Rev. Charles Brooks, of Boston, has communicated to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences three plans—one by which the hours of time may be struck, at the same instant, on every public bell in the city, and in every private dwelling; another, by which the alarm of fire may be given at the same moment, throughout the city, and the place of the fire indicated at each of the engine houses simultaneously. A third plan is one by which all the lamps in the streets may be lighted or extinguished together, at any given moment.—[Journal.]

PIGEON EXPRESS.—We are requested by the agent of the British and North America mail steamships to state, that hereafter no carrier pigeons will be allowed on board these ships, for the purpose of expressing any news on the approach of the vessels. This order has resulted from a correspondence with the proprietors of the line, who are disposed to afford every facility in their power for the dispatch of intelligence for the public, and who feel bound to exclude the method alluded to, from its liability to abuse, and the impossibility of giving similar privileges to all who may have an equal right to demand them.—[Boston Post.]

A MR. START, of Smyrna, says the Delaware Gazette, has made an improvement in manufacturing wagons, which will certainly be a great advantage to the farmer, inasmuch as it will effect a great saving in labor. The bed of the wagon is placed on small rollers, fixed in the frame work on which it rests, and in front is a fixture for a lever, by which a lad can run the wagon-bed back, and shoot its contents on the ground.

CANAL TO THE PACIFIC OCEAN.—We see, by the New Orleans Commercial Bulletin, that the English house of Manning & Mackintosh have obtained control of the Mexican route to the Pacific, at the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and already commenced preliminary operations for making the canal.

JUSTICE TO MEXICO.—The Newport News is informed by a friend lately from the battle-field of Palo Alto, that, though the battle had been fought nearly two and a half years, there was a line of bones extending more than a mile across the field, and about fifteen feet wide, as true as a line could be drawn, where the Mexicans stood in the contest, proving the steady valor with which the Mexican soldiers sustained the deadly storm of iron and lead from the American troops.

THE CHEAPEST WAY TO CHINA.—It is said that the cheapest way to China from London is via America. A passage from England to China now costs nearly $600. By the American route, according to the Philadelphia Ledger, passengers can be conveyed from London to China for $400, and the trip, with our improvements in steam navigation and a better road over the Isthmus, may be made in thirty-five days, beating the English mail twenty-five days.

THE INHABITANTS of the south of France, Savoy, and a part of Italy, live almost exclusively on chestnuts during fall and the early part of winter, making them into bread and puddings in place of flour. Nuts abound in vegetable oil, and of course in carbon, and also in glutine and fibrine, three of the most important elements required for sustaining life. Yet they should be dried or cooked.

NEW YORK has two hundred and thirty-eight places of worship; Episcopal, forty-two; Baptist, thirty-eight; Presbyterian, thirty-four; Methodist Episcopal, thirty-one; Roman Catholic, eighteen; Dutch Reformed, sixteen; Jew's Synagogues, ten; Congregational, nine; Universalist, six; Lutheran, five; Unitarian, two, &c.

A HIGH compliment has been paid to our gallant navy by the German Confederation, in selecting Commodore Parker, and Commanders Dupont, Buchanan and Barton to organize their new marine force.

PENNSYLVANIA COAL TRADE.—There was transported over the Reading Railroad, during the week ending Nov. 30, 22,142 tons of coal. The whole amount carried over the road during the year, up to Nov. 30, is 1,164,288 tons.

A MAN was lately brought before a magistrate, charged with stealing a dead sheep; the magistrate dismissed the complaint, observing that there was no such thing, as when a sheep died, it became mutton.

CALIFORNIA wine, brought by the new Mexican Minister to Washington, is pronounced equal, if not superior, to the best sherry.

GRAND MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,

NO. 127 CHAMBER-STREET NEW-YORK. FOR the Treatment of all Diseases in Men, Women and Children; whether Acute or Chronic; whether Local or General—whether Scrofulous, Syphilitic, or Epidemic—or all Maladies belonging to the line of Medicine and Surgery.

I. Cases of all kinds will be examined every day in the week from 7 o'clock A. M. till 7 P. M. Sundays excepted. II. No CHARGE made for EXAMINATIONS, or for our OPINION in any case.

III. Patients will find our examinations unlike those of any others which they have ever known or heard, and if we do not tell them more about their case, without their telling us any history of their disease, than they have ever known or learned before by their own observation, or that of any of their Doctors, we advise them not to submit to our treatment.

IV. All that Class of Diseases in which delicate and sensitive persons are exposed, by most Doctors, to Surgical and bloody operations, and to means and treatment which burn and torture, and confine the patient to the sick bed, are treated at this office without pain, exposure or confinement.

V. Patients will be convinced beyond all doubt, by our Examinations and Treatment, that their diseases in most and the worst cases, originated in their childhood, or were inherited from their parents, or arose from a great variety of causes, which neither they nor their doctors ever imagined—and though they may seem to have a dozen different diseases, that in nearly every case they all spring from one root or cause, and will be driven out together by very simple means.

VI. Those Diseases of certain parts of the human system, which are almost universally treated in the first state with Balsam of Copaiba, Capsules, Cubes, by Injections of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead Water—Yellow or Black washes; with Blue or Mercurial and other Ointments; with Bougies, Catheters or Syringes— or in the second state, with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate for Corro-sive Sublimate; with Hydriodate of Potash, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like slops—we say before heaven and earth, that by such treatment and such means, as are generally used, we know and can demonstrate, that these diseases have never been and can never be healed. They deceive the patient—they drive the disease into the system, and to other and more important parts—they produce Strictures, Callouses, Piles, Abscesses, Ulcers, Fistulas, Catarrhs, Dropsies, Rheumatic pains, Diseases of the Bones, of the Liver, Kidneys, Lungs, Throat and whole system; and either render the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of these Quackish, Ruminous and Swindling remedies, we promise to every curable case we treat, a permanent and radical CURE FOR LIFE by very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell—which neither purges or vomits—nor hinders from business—nor exposes the patient in any way whatever, and which is only to be taken every other night. We can furnish patients with References to Terrible Cases which have been carried out of the Broadway Hospitals as incurable, to die, whom we have raised from the gates of the grave, after all other means have been used in vain.

VII. Knowing, as we do, that most Medicines in the hands of Apothecaries and Druggists are adulterated, and for various other reasons are not to be relied on; we have, therefore established a CHEMICAL LABORATORY, where we manufacture all our Medicines—for this reason we can warrant that our medicines shall do all that we promise in every case.

VIII. In every case in which we promise a cure, if we fail to effect this, the money paid for medicine will be returned. To all who wish we will furnish names and residence of patients in the city and country, whom we have treated for all forms of disease, who will give them all the facts in their case—the nature, extent, and duration of their sickness, and the success of our treatment.

We therefore invite all sufferers however afflicted, or however hopeless their case may appear, to give us a trial—put our knowledge to the test in an Examination of their case—it will cost them nothing—and they will find beyond doubt that ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which are called Consumption, Spinal disease, Cancer in the Womb, or elsewhere, &c., &c., are totally mistaken—there being nothing of the kind. This we have demonstrated in hundreds of cases.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

TO MY FRIEND, W. D. SNOW.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY O. RUSSELL CLARKE.

From what Antarctic, or forbidden shore,
Was this thy frigid name transported hence?
No doubt it came from overhead of you;
But who may claim the cold inheritance?
Perchance some Royal Russian was its sire,
Or berry-fed Kamtschadale (what a word!)
Some sunless, bleak Siberian by his fire,
Or lone Laplander, lean and thickly furred;
It matters little tho' what shiv'ring race
Or ice-clad zone may claim the honor first,
Since he who wears it last, by Fortune nurs't,
May boast a gen'rous heart—a comely face.
Faultless in rhyme! in checkers surer still!
My subject melts—as all such subjects will!

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY ALLIE VERNON.

EDWARD RAINSFORD lay at the feet of his gentle bride, while she sang in low, sweet strains, her dark eyes gleaming with love, true passionate love, the while:

"I am thine, and thine for ever
Care and woe can part us never,
Thine to share thy joy and gladness,
Thine to kiss away thy sadness
Love's bright flowers around me twine,
For I'm thine, and only thine.

Thou art mine, art thou not dearest?
Best beloved, kindest and nearest,
Thine to look upon and bless me,
In my hours of grief caress me
As I'm thine and only thine,
Thou art mine, and only mine."

'Thine, aye, thine for ever, my own sweet one,' passionately exclaimed the young man, as she bent and pressed her warm lips to his noble brow. 'Though grief cloud thy bright face, though sorrow cast its shadows upon thee, but that can never be,' he continued, as he drew her close to his heart; 'this bosom shall ever be thy home, this arm ever shield thee. And thou shalt win Fame, my own dear Eva.' A shade of sadness passed over the young bride's face, but Edward noticed it not. His dark eyes lighted with enthusiasm, his whole face beaming with the proud dreams he cherished, he went on. 'Yes, thou shalt be famed, dearest, and when the world bows down in homage to the being whose magic thoughts and beautiful sentiments thrill their souls, I can call thee mine. There is that within thee that can bring thee glory. Thou art not of the same cold nature as others of this dull earth, thou art gifted with a heavenly power. The world shall feel it, shall know it, shall bow down to thee, my beautiful one; thy fair brow shall be encircled by the laureate wreath. Thou wilt strive for my sake,' he continued in a calmer tone, as he noticed the sad expression that lingered on her sweet face, 'thou wilt win Fame.'

'I will,' was Eva's reply, but her tone was sad as the sigh of a fading flower.

'And now farwell, sweet one, for a while. Be glad and joyous, little one, while I am absent. I will return ere long and claim another song from those dear lips,' and he bent, as he spoke, and pressed his lips fondly to her own, and then left her.

Edward Rainsford spoke truly when he said his bride was unlike the cold hearted beings of this world. A creature more beautiful, more angelic cannot be imagined. Her hair, brown in the shade and gold in the sun, fell in rich masses almost to her tiny feet. Her eyes, large, soft, and dreamy, save when strangely lighted up by some passionate feeling, were shaded by long black lashes, which rested upon a cheek pure as the stainless snow. Her mouth, oh! more than beautiful, spoke all the emotions that swayed her, now scornful, now firm, now decked with smiles of joy, or serenely calm and sweet. Eva was a being to be worshiped, for her mind was as heavenly as her person. The spirit of poetry filled her soul, and animated her young heart, and ever and anon she poured forth her feelings in witching strains that enchanted all who listened to them. She loved, nay more than loved, her husband. He was young, handsome and wealthy, and possessed a heart as affectionate as her own, but pride was mingled with the love he cherished for his young bride.

'Methought I should cast aside all thoughts of fame, and dream only of love and happiness,' murmured Eva, as Rainsford left her apartment. 'Why, why did he strive to awake the fiend ambition in my soul? But his wish shall be gratified. He shall have cause to be proud of her he has taken to his bosom. For his sake I will win the laurel wreath.' But even as she spoke she pressed her small hand tightly upon her burning brow, as though she felt a painful weight there. 'Alas! why was not Edward Rainsford satisfied that his wife was beautiful, talented and admired? Why did he destroy her gladsome dreams and fairy visions by awakening longings in her soul for that which destroys peace and tranquillity—Fame!'

'Eva, dearest, 'tis past the midnight hour. Nay, my own one, listen to me. Your cheek is pale, your eyes gleam with a strange wild light. Come, dear one, leave your desk.'

The only answer Rainsford received was an impatient movement of the head, as his wife bent over her manuscript again. But as he turned away in an agony of spirit, she looked up with a sweet, sad smile, and said, 'Only a few moments, Edward, and I shall be with you.' A few moments! Morning's pale light found Eva still at her task. She had won her way to the highest pinnacle of fame. She had been flattered, lauded, universally admired; but still she toiled on. Her husband, he who worshiped her, had awakened the demon in her soul, but he had not the power to bid it rest again. His dreams had been realized; his proud wishes gratified, but the hue of health had fled from the face of his once joyous, light-hearted Eva. Night after night found her writing, still writing. The soft dreamy expression forsook her large dark eyes, and in its place gleamed an unnatural brilliancy. Eva was fading as a beautiful flower that rears its head high above its companions, yet is the first to die.

Edward Rainsford stood by the side of her who had been all the world to him—his earthly idol, his richest treasure. The same sweet light that beamed upon her joyous face when first she sung to him, his young and blooming bride, lingered there again, but her cheek was paler than the pure lilies that were lying beside her in her coffin. Her coffin? Ay, Eva the famed, the beautiful, was dead.

With crushed heart and clouded brow the husband cursed the ambition that prompted him thus to sacrifice his loved one, and as he wildly pressed his lips to the marble brow, he murmured,

'Ere long I will be with thee, my prized, my cherished Eva.'

He spoke truly, for but a few short months passed by, and they laid the husband in the grave where the wife already slumbered.

A LION IN LOVE.*

BY FREDERIC SOULIE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH, FOR THE GAZETTE AND RULE.

CHAPTER III.

UP to this moment, notwithstanding the solicitations of Prosper Gobillon and of Mr. Laloiné, Sterné had resolved, in petto, not to remain a moment after the ceremony of signing at the church. All Lise's grace, all her beauty, though they engrossed his thoughts, had not tempted him to encounter the tedium of a wedding in humble life; for he was perfectly well aware that it could lead to nothing more than his admiring for a few hours longer, this beautiful being.

But it seemed to him that Lise's phrase conveyed a sort of leave of absence; he thought, and rightly enough, that it was not he who was about to get rid of an encumbrance, and was unwilling to suffer himself to be thus dismissed; he therefore said in reply to Lise:

'I experience no annoyance, mademoiselle, in the performance of an act which was requested of me by Prosper, and which appears to have been acceptable to him; if it has not been equally so to others, the fault lies not with me, but with your brother-in-law, who alone should be blamed for my presence here.'

Again was Lise secretly vexed at having drawn upon herself this retort, spoken in a tone politely serious, and to which she had no chance of replying, for Léonce immediately bowed to her and retired to a corner of the vestry. Lise concealed herself among her youthful companions, without paying any attention to their tattle; she was wholly wrapt in thought, when another young girl touched her elbow, saying:

'Do look!'

She did look, and saw Léonce signing his name.

'He has taken off his glove!' added her companion, exultingly, as if to congratulate Lise upon the success of the lesson she had given the handsome Marquis.

Léonce, who had overheard the remark, lifted his looks to Lise, and caught her eye, which seemed uneasy.

Lise felt, as if by an indescribable instinct, that something was going on between her and that young man that was not exactly proper; and when it came to her turn to sign, her eyes were suffused with tears, her hand trembled, and when her mother, who was near her, asked her what was the matter:

'Oh, nothing, nothing,' said she; 'tis only fancy,—and taking advantage of her mother's alarm she caught hold of her arm:

'Take me into your coach, marmama,' cried she in the tone of a child that is frightened and asks for protection.

'Come, come, my poor Lise,' cried her mother, kissing her and leading her to a corner. While the greybeards of the party gave each other a knowing wink, the younger portion knew not what to make of it, and Léonce said to himself:

'I shall most certainly return to the dinner and the ball.'

All the party withdrew, and Lise looked at Sterné as he got into his carriage. His coachman, ashamed of having so long been in the low company of hacks, began to make his horses rear and plunge as if they were going to break everything to pieces, and then drove off with rapidity. Lise heaved a deep sigh, and going into a coach, she, for the first time that morning, felt at ease, and began to talk about the handsome dress she was to wear that evening. But in the midst of this important discussion, she suddenly carried her hand to her neck.

'God heavens! I have lost my locket,' exclaimed she; 'I had it on, I am sure.'

'Perhaps you dropped it at the mayor's office; perhaps in church, perhaps in some coach.'

'Ah,' cried Lise, 'I only hope it is not in Mr. Sterné's carriage.'

'Why so?' asked her mother; 'he will find it and bring it back.'

'He is coming back, then?'

'He promised he would.'

Lise made no further remark, but she became sad and silent, and thought that her dress, with which she had at first been so delighted, could not be as handsome as she imagined. But she was neither of an age nor a temper for such thoughts to trouble her for any length of time, and she had no sooner reached home than she discarded all such foolish fears, saying to herself:

'Ah! no, no! this day I am resolved to be gay,' and without being obliged to have recourse to any profound reasoning on the subject, she laid aside all thoughts of the handsome marquis, resolving to amuse herself under his very eyes, just as if he were like any other young man.

As for Léonce, as soon as he was alone, he hesitated about returning to the wedding, when he perceived on the carriage seat, a small golden locket attached to a hair chain. This locket exactly resembled in shape the golden plate on Lise's ring. Like the ring, it bore a motto, and this motto was:

'Have the will, and you have the power.'

What! a young girl from St. Martin's Street dares to assume for her motto that Will is Power, and he, lion as he is, had not resolution enough either to will or to do.

'By heavens!' thought he, 'I have the will, and I shall have the power.' And as the clock struck six he alighted at the Blue Dial.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN he reached there, no one had as yet arrived except the bridegroom and Mr. Laloiné, who came to hasten the arrangements for the wedding dinner. At first Prosper wished to leave Sterné in company with Mr. Laloiné; but Léonce begged them so earnestly to take no notice of him, that they both went about their business.

He was, therefore, left alone in the saloon adjacent to the great banquetting hall, while Mr. Laloiné and his son-in-law went to give a look at the ball-room. But, it will be asked, can this be Léonce Sterné you are talking of; the lion, who knows so well all the advantage to be derived from a late entrance, who makes his appearance before the dinner hour, like a shop-boy, or a man of letters invited by some great lord? Yes, indeed, it is Léonce Sterné, and the most untameable of his species, too; and do you know what he is doing during the absence of the guests? Why, he walks around the table, reading the name on each card, in order to know where he will be seated; and having ascertained that he has been placed between Madam Laloiné and some strange lady, he changes the place of his name, and substitutes it for that of Mr. Tirlot, in order to be seated by the side of Lise.

As success atones for the worst actions, and almost for ridiculous ones, Léonce was in the right, for he succeeded.

All the guests are assembled; they salute each other, and converse together; it is time to order up the dinner. That duty devolves upon Gobillon, while M. Laloiné is obliged to remain in the parlor to welcome the guests. But no doubt Lise must be inquisitive; she will probably wish to know where her seat is, and she will be surprised when she finds it out. The lion, therefore, frosts himself at the door opening into the dining hall, well knowing that Lise would not venture to pass by him; and when she arrived with her mother and her sister, Madam Laloiné said very gravely to Sterné:

'How! already here, Monsieur le Marquis?'

And he replied, looking at Lise:

'It is enough to have committed one fault today.'

Lise, who had come there exulting and happy, felt the reproach, and retired in vexation to a corner of the room. Never had any one spoiled her pleasure so perseveringly as M. de Sterné had done, and for so little reason.

Léonce appeared to her intolerable; and when it was time to take a seat at the table, a very amusing little comedy was enacted. Léonce, who knew very well where his place was, went up to it and stationed himself behind his chair, while Lise was looking about for hers on the opposite side.

'There, there!' cried Prosper to her, pointing to the side where Léonce was standing, and whom he was surprised to find in a range with his finger's end.

Prosper exchanged looks with M. Laloiné, who pursed up his mouth, as much as to say: 'My son-in-law is a fool.'

On the other hand, Madam Laloiné, who had depended upon the company of the Marquis, stood aghast at the sight of M. Tirlot, who, proud of the post of honor which had been assigned him, took possession of it with a triumphant air.

Lise kept advancing timidly, not knowing what course to pursue, for she had noticed the whole of this imperceptible dialogue of looks. As for Léonce, with his eyes fixed upon the ceiling, he saw nothing, paid no attention to any thing, and appeared totally unconscious of what was going on.

However, this awkwardness was put an end to, for he heard M. Laloiné say to his daughter: 'Come, Lise, why don't you take your seat?'

The tone with which these words were spoken, argued a forced resignation to the consequences of Gobillon's bad management, and Léonce was convinced that every one blamed Prosper for what had happened. But when he removed his chair to make room for Lise, she bowed to him so very dryly that he saw at once she was well aware that her brother-in-law was innocent of the fault.

After the very first words he spoke, Léonce perceived that Lise was resolved to answer him only in monosyllables; but he had full two hours before him, and that was more time than was necessary for him to get the better of her resolution.

In the first place, he gave the young girl a chance to recover her usual temper, and to resume her self-possession; for which purpose, he took no further notice of her. But he was all attention to the fat gentleman who was seated on her other hand, and who was no other than the respectable grocer who had taken him to task upon the sugar question.

Sterné bravely resumed the debate, which had to be carried on either before or behind the young girl, but always in such a manner that she did not lose a single word of it. It was enough to tire the patience even of a Deputy. At length, Lise could not help showing her impatience by sundry very significant starts. But Sterné was inexorable; to such a pitch of enthusiasm did he work himself and his adversary, on the subject of trade and importation, that M. Laloiné, who saw them discussing it so hotly, said:

'What are you talking about, gentlemen?'

'About the beet-root and sugar-cane,' said Lise, with a vexed air.

'Ha!' cried M. Laloiné; and, satisfied with the propriety of such a conversation, he paid no further attention to it.

But he was wrong; for, just then, Léonce, thinking it high time to commence his attack, said to his antagonist:

'Really, sir, I am afraid that our conversation must have proved very tiresome to the young lady; we will resume it hereafter.'

'Very willingly,' said the other, who perceived that he had allowed the whole of the first course to pass off without partaking of anything, and who was anxious to make up for lost time.

Lise, however, made no remark, and the fat grocer added, after swallowing a mouthful:

'Your mother is very right, Mademoiselle Lise, to say that men have lost all gallantry. Here are two of us, seated on either side of a young beauty, and we have nothing more interesting to talk about than molasses, instead of whispering to her a parcel of sweet things. There is some excuse for me, who am the father of a family; I have forgotten all about such things; but this young gentleman must have a lot of them at your service.'

'Come, sir, say something pretty to the ladies,' thought Léonce, who, not knowing what to say to her, and perceiving her pouting with some disdain, offered to fill her glass.

She accepted his offer, thanked him, and there the conversation stopped.

'Upon my word,' thought the lion, 'I am as stupid as a flag-stone. I am sure Mr. Tirlot would behave more creditably than I do.'

He made an attempt; it was a desperate, though common-place one; it was necessary that he should talk about himself, in order to occupy her thoughts, and he said:

'Really, mademoiselle, I am very unfortunate.'

'In what respect, sir?'

'It is but twice that I have had the honor of seeing you, and I have already managed to incur your displeasure, three or four times.'

'Mine, sir!' said Lise, with a look of astonishment.

'Yours, madam. First, by arriving too late this morning; then, at the mayor's office, by not taking off my glove; and here, again, perhaps,' added he, in a lower tone, 'by coming too soon, and by—'

Bravo, noble lion! by not trying to be too cunning, you have succeeded better this time. Lise had, in fact, understood his meaning.

'Well, and by—' echoed she, fixing her eyes upon him.

'And,' added Léonce, with the truthful expression of a young man, 'by cheating M. Tirlot out of his seat!'

Lise colored, but the blush was accompanied by a smile.

In the first place, she had guessed rightly, and that was flattering to her; and in the second, the Marquis had played a regular school-boy's trick, in order to get a seat near her, and that was no less flattering. But this time she had some grounds for alarm; for, what object could the handsome marquis have in view in trying to get near her? The smile had scarce parted her lips, when it vanished, and was succeeded by a lively confusion.

Lise was too pure-minded to suspect that he harbored any sinister plans; but as she was a young girl in humble life, and he one of the white kids of the aristocracy, she said to herself, 'He is trying to make sport of me;' and she thereupon assumed an air that was very prim and demure.

'You see,' said Leonoe, 'it is evident that I have displeased you.'

'Oh, sir,' replied she, 'you or Mr. Tirlot are all one to me.'

Leonoe winced; the equation was not very complimentary, and he added rather impertinently:

'I rather think not.'

'Ah, indeed,' said Lise who began too think him too self-sufficient.

'Surely I do,' replied Leonoe, skillfully extricating himself from the dangerous pass. 'I am sure you would prefer Mr. Tirlot.'

Lise made no answer.

'He is one of your relations, is he not?' asked Leonoe.

'No, sir.'

'A friend of yours, perhaps?'

'No, sir.'

'A friend of Prosper's, then?'

'Yes, sir.'

'So much the better; there will be some compensation, then; and Prosper's friend Sterny will be tolerated for the sake of his friend Tirlot.'

'Oh,' said Lise, 'you are not a friend of Prosper's.'

'And why not? I like him very well.'

'Oh, that makes no difference.'

'I am ready at all times to serve him.'

'I don't doubt it; but that is not what I mean.'

'And I think he is sincerely attached to us.'

'Of that I am certain,' said Lise; 'nevertheless you know very well that you are not friends.'

'But what makes you think so?'

'Because,' said Lise, 'you are the Marquis de Sterny, and he is Prosper Gobillou, dealer in feathers.'

'That is very wrong what you say, Mademoiselle,' said Leonoe, with a liberal air.

'Why is it wrong?'

'Is it not tantamount to saying that my title makes me proud, disdainful, perhaps impertinent?'

'Ah, sir.'

'It is as much to say that I am unable to appreciate the honor and integrity of those who have not a similar title; it is almost enough to make me regret that I was born in a high station, as if, in the days we live in, every one was not valued according to his merit and his works.'

Ah! lion, master-lion, what has become of the distinguishing attributes of your species? How! there you are giving utterance to sentiments worthy of the columns of the Constitutional, or the hero of a melo-drama—and in a serious tone, too!—oh! that your friends were but present to enjoy a hearty laugh at your expense, in which you would readily join if could only see yourself as you are. But you are actually serious in what you say?

And Lise replied affectionately, 'I thank you in Prosper's name for what you have said; he would have been gratified to hear it.'

'Oh, Prosper has long known me; we have been boys together: and he is not like you; he does not consider me a dandy, a lion.'

'What is the meaning of that, a lion?' asked Lise with a laugh.

'Why,' replied Sterny, 'it is a name given to those young men of the world who think they display their wit by sneering at everything, who pretend to despise all that does not appertain to their society, and whose chief occupation consists in idling away their time.'

The lion was forswearing his companion and his creed.

'Ah,' said Lise, 'I apprehend your meaning; but I beg you to believe that I had not so poor an opinion of you, Monsieur le Marquis.'

'Not quite so good an opinion of me; but still not a favorable one.'

'I can't say—I don't know,' said she hesitatingly.

'Oh, you owe me an answer; say what opinion have you of me?'

Lise still hesitated, but at length said, looking the lion full in the face with an expression of childish malice:

'Well, I will tell you if you will tell me why you took Mr. Tirlot's seat.'

Leonoe was puzzled; his answer might be decisive. He was lucky enough to think of a foolish answer and he gave it.

'I don't know,' said he.

Lise burst into such a fit of laughter that all the company turned to look at her.

'What's the matter, Lise? what's the matter, Mademoiselle?' were the questions asked from all quarters of the room.

'It is,' said Lise, 'because the Marquis—'

'Oh!' said Leonoe in a low tone to her, fearful that she was going to speak of the trick he had been playing, 'do not betray me.'

'What's the matter?' was re-echoed on all sides.

'Oh, nothing,' said she, moderating her laughter; 'it was merely a thought that struck me.'

'Why, Lise!' said her mother, with a frown that implied a whole lecture.

'Let her laugh as much as she pleases,' said Mr. Laloin; 'it is nothing more than natural at her age. The time will soon come when she will be serious enough.'

The time was come already. Lise felt that she had gone too far, when Leonoe whispered to her:

'I thank you for having kept our secret.'

'What secret, sir?'

'That of my stratagem to get a seat near you.'

'It was not worth taking so much trouble about,' said she, coldly.

'And yet it cost me a great deal of trouble,' said Leonoe.

And he forthwith proceeded to give her a graphic and amusing account of the manner in which he effected his stratagem, and of his alarm whenever he heard a noise at the door. Lise looked to him half laughing, half angry, and then asked:

'And you did all this without knowing why?'

'Oh, yes, I do know why, though,' said Leonoe with some emotion.

'Indeed!' cried Lise.

'Yes, but I dare not tell it you.'

'Not to me?'

'No, not to you.'

'You are trifling with me, Monsieur le Marquis.'

'If I tell it to you, will you be offended with me?'

'Why,' answered Lise, 'that is more than I can tell; it will depend very much on what you are going to say. Oh, never mind, I don't care about hearing what it was.'

Then it was clear that she knew all about it. But that was not what the lion wanted: he wanted to speak if it were only to be listened to; he therefore began in a whisper:

'You must know that this evening—'

'There, there,' cried Lise, interrupting him quickly, 'Mr. Tirlot is going to sing.'

'He is very ridiculous, that gentleman,' said Leonoe, very much vexed at finding himself cut short just as he fancied himself on the point of making a declaration of love.

'Ridiculous!' repeated Lise, with a dignified air, 'and why so, Monsieur le Marquis?'

Leonoe saw his fault; he had unconsciously relapsed into lion-hood; and, again embarrassed, he answered abruptly:

'I don't like Mr. Tirlot.'

'Why so?'

'I have a spite against him.'

'But for what reason?'

Leonoe laughed at himself, and getting clear as well as he could of the difficulty in which he had involved himself, he replied:

'In the first place, because he is groomsman, and because he had a right to offer you his arm this morning.'

'That right did not avail him much, I think,' said Lise smiling.

'In the second place, because he was given a seat next to you.'

'And he kept his seat very well,' said Lise in the same tone.

'And lastly, because he will dance the first quadrille with you.'

'Alas!' said Lise, 'he forgot to engage me.'

'Then I will dance with you in his stead.'

'How! you in his stead?'

'Oh,' said Leonoe with a frank gaiety, 'I am resolved to cheat him out of everything; and if I were close enough to him, I would slip away his plate and drink his wine.'

'Ah! that poor Mr. Tirlot!' cried Lise with true confidence.

'We dance the first quadrille together, don't we?'

'Since it is so settled,' said Lise.

'Poor Mr. Tirlot!' cried Sterny, carried away by the success of his gaiety, 'I should like to even cut him out of his song.'

'That would be difficult,' said Lise, 'for there he is going to begin.'

'Never mind,' whispered Sterny to her, 'I shall contest the palm with him.'

'You will?'

'You shall see.'

Mr. Tirlot began; there were four verses, which were defective neither in quantity nor in rhyme, and which celebrated:

- 1st. Madam Laloin;
- 2d. Monsieur Laloin;
- 3d. Miss Laloin, now Mrs. Gobillou;
- 4th. Gobillou.

Every one had a share.

The song was received with acclamation, and the most touching transports. Mr. Tirlot was triumphant; Lise felt some emotion, she applauded him and was sorry that she was going to deprive him of the first quadrille.

But Sterny was in a happy vein; he touched Lise gently on the elbow, and whispered to her,

'Say that I am going to sing too.'

Lise rose, held forth her pretty hand, and every one was silent, expecting her to favor them with some new song. But when she bespoke silence for the marquis, there were cries of astonishment and congratulations for his amiability.

Sterny was playing a desperate game: he might be ridiculous even for those people—he was so in his own eyes, and he felt it. He rushed headlong upon the danger in order to hasten the catastrophe.

'Excuse me, gentlemen,' said he, 'it is not a song, but some verses that seem wanting to complete the witty production of Mr. Tirlot.'

Mr. Tirlot bowed.

'Listen! let's have it!' came from all sides.

Sterny began to sing with almost as much confidence as Mr. Tirlot himself, first addressing Mr. and Madam Laloiné.

'The right divine, vouchsafed to few below,
'To fill the measure of another's joy,
Can warm the heart with a celestial glow,
And wrap the soul in bliss without alloy.'

'This night by you most surely is possessed,' (Pointing to Prosper Gobillon and his bride,)

'Since we behold this young and happy pair,
Whose mutual ardor you have fondly blessed,
Whose present bliss has been your chiefest care.'

(To Mr. and Madam Laloiné.)

'Your heavenly task is not quite yet achieved,'

(Turning to Lise,)

'For on seeing Lise it must be still confessed,
There lives, if this fond heart can be believed,
One mortal to be most supremely blest.'

Oh, lion! extempore verses from you, and at a wedding among shopkeepers! Ah, lion, how cheap you make yourself. Poor lion!

Léonce had no time to think of the consequences; for he had hardly ended his song when the whole table shook with applause, bravos, clapping of hands and stamping of feet. Lise, who was quite taken by surprise, concealed her blushes by inclining her head; Madam Laloiné, with tears in her eyes, rose from her seat to go and kiss her daughter, saying:

'That's true, Mr. Tirlot, you had forgotten my Lise.'

Mr. Laloiné, much moved, came in for his share in these embraces, and holding out his hand to Léonce, said with deep feeling:

'I thank you, monsieur le marquis, thank you, thank you.'

Then the mother thanked him, and he was congratulated on all sides. This created a momentary uproar, during which every one had risen from the table, while Gobillon cried out:

'To the ball room! There is already company in it.'

Léonce offered Lise his arm; she took it, but he felt that her hand trembled.

She experienced some confusion and awkwardness, but she appeared neither sad nor out of humor.

'Did I displease you with my song, too?' asked Léonce.

'Oh, no,' answered she gently, 'it gave pleasure to my father and my mother.'

'And to you?'

'I—I think it was very pretty,' said she with downcast eyes.

She then quietly disengaged her arm to go up to some of her young friends who were already in the ball-room, whom Mr. and Madam Laloiné had welcomed, and to whom they were explaining the cause of the enthusiastic applause which had shaken the Blue Dial to its very foundations.

'Is it true,' said the young girls, crowding round Lise, 'is it true that the handsome marquis sang some verses about you.'

Had this question been asked in an affectionate manner, Lise would probably have denied it; but the phrase 'handsome marquis,' was spoken so enviously that she replied with some affectation:

'Yes, it is true.'

'It seems you have made a conquest of him,' said one who was very ugly.

'And no doubt he has made a conquest of you?' said another.

'Who knows?' answered Lise, who began to think her young friends very impertinent.

'For my part,' said a third, 'I intend to be engaged the whole evening, so as to be able to refuse to dance with him.'

'You needn't take that trouble,' said the ugly one; 'those white kids never dance.'

'Pardon me, young ladies, they do, sometimes,' said Stern who had approached them unseen, from behind a group of men. He offered his hand to Lise, saying with an air of profound respect:

'I hope, mademoiselle, that you have not forgotten your promise to me for the first quadrille?'

'No, sir, no,' answered Lise holding out her hand to him.

That hand still trembled!

The music struck up the signal bars, and Stern and Lise took their places.

Lise was beautiful—beautiful as we imagine the angels to be, with the saint-like serenity of innocence, and the blissful repose of candor.

Her beauty had dazzled Stern, and he had long contemplated it, merely as an agreeable sight, and as an admirable attribute that exalted, as it were, the human form, by investing it with so much splendor and grace.

But at this moment, Lise, trembling by his side, seemed to him far more beautiful than ever. Her countenance—so pure!—wore an indescribable expression of happiness, of fear, and of surprise. The heart of this young girl experienced an unwanted emotion which at once delighted and alarmed her. Her bosom had throbbled with a strange pulsation, as if some portion of her being had hitherto remained dormant, and was now just starting into life.

The Creator has twice endowed woman with this unspeakable emotion: when she first finds that she is beloved, and when she first discovers that she is a mother. But no pencil can paint, no pen describe the tremulous ecstasy that irradiated the features of Lise; and Stern, while gazing on her, underwent its thrilling influence without being able to account for the singular fascination he experienced. He tried to speak to her, and his voice failed him; she attempted to answer, and hers died away.

Thus passed the whole of that quadrille between them, and it was not until he was leading her to her seat that he remembered that he was about to be separated from her; he therefore whispered:

'Do you waltz, Miss Lise?'

'Oh, no, sir, no,' said she with a motion of the head, which plainly meant that waltzing was a pleasure beyond her hopes, as a young girl.

'In that case, I must solicit the honor of your hand for another quadrille,' said Léonce.

'I am engaged for a great many,' said Lise; 'but . . . but mamma said I might dance the gallopade.'

'Shall it be the gallop, then?'

'Yes,' said Lise, 'the first. But, in the meantime you will dance with others, will you not?'

'With you alone!'

'With my sister, at least,—I beg of you,' said Lise in an uneasy and supplicating tone.

'With the bride?' said Léonce, 'you are right, and I thank you for reminding me of my duty.'

'And I thank you for consenting to perform it,' said Lise with a sweet smile of intelligence.

Léonce left her with her mother and withdrew to another room. In spite of himself, he felt happy. Happy! and why so? Because he had ruffled the peace of mind of that young girl!—A pitiful triumph indeed for a man before whose lion eye had quailed these women, the boldest of their sex, who were accustomed to laugh at everything, and to dare everything, even to brave scandal.

SCIENTIFICALLY OBSCURE.—The late Dr. Wilson, senior Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, though a very grave man himself, was fond of quizzing and puzzling the country folks who came to inquire after their relatives and friends in the college. One day seeing a man standing in the court, with a letter in his hand gaping and staring about, and not knowing where to go, he walked to him gravely and inquired what he wanted. The man answered: 'Sir can you tell me where I may find Dr. Delaunoy?' 'Yes,' said the doctor; 'do you see the building before you?' 'Yes.' 'Then crucify this quadrangle, and take the diameter of the plot beyond it, enter the opening before you, and ascend the ligneous grades; then turn to your left, and you will find him either peripatounding in his cubicle, dormitating in his lectory, or periscopounding through his fenestra.' The poor man, who understood nothing of all this, and not remembering one word but the last, said, 'And pray, sir, what is the fenestra?' To which the doctor replied: 'It is an orifice in an edifice to admit luminous particles.' 'Oh! thank you,' said the poor fellow, and walked off more perplexed than before.

A gentleman meeting an old friend, whom he had not seen for a long time, congratulated him on coming into possession of a large landed estate. 'There was such a report,' replied the other, 'but you may depend that it was quite groundless.'

ISADORE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

BY REV. BRO. NELSON BROWN.

FATE has doomed us now to part;
Yet with thee I leave my heart.

Isadore, Isadore—
Bleeding heart!—and ever thine,
And thy soul must be its shrine,
Evermore, evermore.

Vain, ah! vain, is our regret
That on earth we ever met,
Isadore, Isadore—
Yet in blissful memory
Our full love shall ever be.
Evermore, evermore.

Like a gentle star of night,
Like a ray of holy light,
Isadore, Isadore,
Shall that memory ever seem;
Mid life's darkness it shall beam,
Evermore, evermore.

Hope's bright star with us has set—(Thy sweet eyes with tears are wet,
Isadore, Isadore—)
Let us lift our thoughts on high;
Let us still in Heaven rely,
Evermore, evermore.

Fate has doomed us now to part—
Keep, oh, keep my bleeding heart,
Isadore, Isadore—
Let us kneel and humbly pray
Heaven to guide us on our way,
Evermore, evermore.

Solemn as a fun'ral knell,
Soon will sound the last farewell,
Isadore, Isadore—
O'er the wild and foaming sea
Where I go—remember me
Evermore, evermore.

Once again, before we part;
Lip to lip, and heart to heart,
Isadore, Isadore—
Wild the rapture!—but 'tis past—
Now farewell!—it is the last,
Evermore, evermore!

"All can do good"—each talent given
Is but a charge received from Heaven
For some good use; and each one must Return with interest full that trust.

Ye who have wealth, 'tis but a loan,
God never meant it all your own;
He gave it you, not to abuse,
But, for some purpose good, to use.

Look round and see the poor who need
Your kindly care,—them clothe and feed,
Relieve their wants, and let it be Done with fraternal sympathy.

Pause when you see a child of shame,
And try the wanderer to reclaim.
Christ did not hesitate to win
The erring Magdalen from sin.

He who's the Son of God by birth
Was ne'er an idler while on earth;
And He has said, "whatever ye
Do in my name ye do for me."

THE YOUNG QUEEN AND HER LOVERS.

A LEGEND OF OLD SPAIN.

BY THOMAS ROSCOE, ESQ.

AMONG Spain's earlier prose romances, whose name, like that of her plays and ballads, may truly be termed 'legion,' to say nothing of the lavish chronicles of her kings—so abounding in that most chivalrous and pugnacious of all European lands—we occasionally meet with a story which, while it strikes the fancy, lays claim to much of the interest as well as the tone of the gravity belong to a narrative of real events. One or two of the incidents, likewise, seem to bear so curiously upon the more modern young Andromache—the fight of princely men for the honor of a Spanish sovereign's hand—that we are compelled to give it royal precedence in our new invasion of the great storehouse of novel adventures and most wild national exploits.

Be it known, then, agreeably to the ingenious, if not altogether veracious record of our anonymous chronicler, that there once flourished a young princess of surpassing beauty, and the enviable heiress to all the states—how few or many we are left to conjecture—not then under the absolute dominion of that dreaded race of fiery eastern zealots, the ferocious and terrible Moor. The royal father of the fair Adeliza, who had resisted his enemies rather by ruse and stratagem, and by exciting the different chiefs and races against each other, than by any bold and open feats of arms, left her, from that very policy in which he was so wily a master, in an extremely dangerous position at the early age of ten years.

In such circumstances, and left under the guardianship of a still young and imperious mother—though empowered to contract a marriage at the age of fourteen with any prince or noble subject considered fully capable of defending her rights—there was perhaps more to be dreaded from the fierce competition of native daring and arrogance to compass royal favors, than even from the power of her swarthy and bigoted adversaries. Then the intrigues of the queen-mother, unlike those of her deceased consort, were calculated to embroil friends rather than enemies, and she was far too intent upon her own ambitious views and love of sensual pleasures to consult the real welfare of her royal daughter. Thus her heartless policy, instead of giving strength to her cause, tended to corrupt as well as to rule her. It was the surest means of perpetuating her own influence over the conflicting parties as they succeeded each other, whichever of them might succeed in gaining the ascendant. Her own pleasure and love of plunder were the actuating motives which, by the power of example, spread themselves through all classes and departments of the state, and, opening fresh inroads to the most wily foreign enemy, split the best defenders of the throne into the most deadly factions, which wasted their native dominions, in preference to attacking those of the enemy.

Such destructive and abandoned conduct, nevertheless, could not prevent several brave and determined suitors making their appearance when the fair heiress had barely attained her thirteenth year. Instead of discouraging their views the false queen, or, more properly speaking, step-mother, looked forward to intrigue, quarrels, and the early disposal of her daughter's hand, as a fresh source of her evil influence and means of obtaining a decided and irresistible power over the mind and will of the youthful queen. First among the brave accomplished chiefs who aspired to seize the prize, and to become the sire of a new and splendid dynasty, was a young noble of unsullied blood and worth, but neither wealthy nor of the highest family and titles. But his other qualifications were unexceptionable, especially in the eyes of a young, artless, and gentle girl, queen though she were; for the exploits of Don Estevan de Zuniga were equalled only by the lofty qualities of his mind, the graces of his person, and the rare captivation of his manners. Need we add that he was not without competitors, who vied with and hated him in proportion to his superior deserts, and most of all because the royal and beautiful Adeliza could not behold him with feelings of indifference. The most formidable of these rivals was Juan, the young King of Portugal, a prince of warlike character, who, sooner than resign the hope of a double sceptre, graced with the charms of so fair a bride, would dare to enforce his pretensions with the sword. Next to him ranked a young noble of high family, of distinguished bravery and worth, but considerably younger than either of his two more powerful rivals, having yet scarcely fleshed his maiden sword in the glorious wars against the Moors, and not yet attained his nineteenth year. Boasting higher and purer blood, Don Alfonso de Pacheco saw, with inexpressible feelings of scorn and hate, the evident partiality fast ripening into young passion, with which his lovely sovereign viewed his less high-born, but for all knightly accomplishments, far-renowned opponent.

Nor was Don Estevan himself blind to the lofty fortune, the glorious hopes, the ineffable charm, which opened to his view in the dawning love, the singular favor, evinced by the delight she took in his society; of her whose throne he of all pre-eminently upheld by his dauntless and successful valor. Alike incited by passion and by ambition, he fostered by every art, and fanned the youthful fire, as if to deter all approach, maintaining the advantage of the position he had won with a cautious jealousy and suspicion, which showed at once the extent of his ambition and of his fears. Still less he dreaded the threatening pretensions of the king than the fiery nature of the proud incensed Alfonso, and the secret favors lavished on him, and the open support given to his claim by the intriguing queen-mother. But in his ardent and vigorous mind all obstacles had only the effect of impelling him to bolder and greater enterprises; while in every field, no less than in the joust, in the bull-ring, and in all the most daring and dangerous encounters of the Moorish duel, he saw the proud Alfonso either at his side, or most frequently dashing headlong through the ranks before him, madly eager to snatch from him the palm of glory when just within his grasp.—Though others among the bravest and noblest shrank not from preferring their suit and pressing their claims with reckless hardihood at the feet of the royal beauty, yet they could not conceal from themselves that the grand chance lay between the three more powerful competitors mentioned. Thus they gradually drew aloof, like mere spectators, to observe the issue of the battle, or formed themselves into parties to advocate the superior merits of one or other of the rivals.

It was clear to them as well, that the fiery Alfonso now fast treading on his rival's steps—and often surpassing him in deeds of wild and extraordinary daring, striking terror to the hearts of the invading foe—would not long brook the ripening and avowed love of the young queen for his acknowledged rival. What added to his extreme hate and scorn was the lofty demeanor of Don Estevan, who treated his younger rival's pretensions with marked indifference or silent contempt.

As time wore on, and the success of Don Estevan, now esteemed the guardian of the throne, the jealous rage of the proud Alfonso knew no bounds. The period for the marriage of the young queen, directed by the will of the deceased monarch, was nigh at hand. Don Estevan was received and honored as her future consort; the fair Adeliza's early admiration of her lover had matured into a strong and fixed affection, and on that only point it was in vain that the wily queen mother passionately opposed and protested against it. She at once feared and hated the noble chief who aspired to her daughter's hand, for he had not concealed his opinion of her character and conduct; and she felt, that when elevated to the highest honor and position in the state, her reign of ambition and plunder, if not of pleasure, would be of short duration. Deadly in her resentments, the opposition to her will supported by a powerful party, headed by Don Estevan, was a blow to her ambition she could not tolerate, she resolved at whatever hazard to maintain her ascendancy, force the inclinations of the young queen, and rid herself by one decided blow of her dreaded enemy. She knew she could rely upon the deep hate fostered by Don Alfonso against his favored rival; but she was aware, also, of his noble and fearless nature, and that he might hesitate to secure the prize he coveted by any foul and unknighly deed. Neither his moral courage nor his qualities to command were equal to those of his competitor; she saw that he feared and hesitated, dreading to brave at once the power of the young queen and of a powerful rival and his party, supported by the people, by the commission of any outrageous act. No time, then, was to be lost; she summoned the indignant noble to a secret council, who, scorning while compelled by his own passions to be in league with her, hurried to the appointment, maddened by a thousand contending emotions.

On observing Don Alfonso's pale and haggard looks—he had just heard of another victory gained by his hated rival—she started at the spectre of disappointed love and ambition which presented itself. Then, far from showing sympathy, she exclaimed, in a voice of fierce concentrated passion:

'Are you a man, and not ashamed to appear thus before me? Go, I despise you, for I see you are already prepared by those submissive lacquy looks to become the puppet and the drudge—the subject of a subject.'

So biting was the tone of contempt, followed by the mocking fiendish laugh in which she thus vented her malignant pleasure, that, seized with sudden surprise, succeeded by an access of jealous rage, the mad Alfonso clapped his hand on his sword, and half drew it from its scabbard.

'Oh, brave knight,' she exclaimed; 'oh, man, ever worthy of thyself, ever fearing to strike thy equal, but ready by siege, or sap, or mine, to make woman thy victim, to kill where thou darest; and where thou darest not, to tyrannise over, to torture, neglect and insult her.'

This had the desired effect; the man was at her mercy; speechless, disarmed, and prepared to do her will; and he humbly craved her pardon. She granted it with a joyous and imperious smile—her sovereign pleasure was gratified. She had but to speak, and he was at her feet.

'You goad me to madness,' exclaimed Alfonso; 'spare me, I cannot bear your scorn! Speak, what can I do to escape it, and compass love and ambition?'

'Remove the obstacle, ere too late; there are a thousand ways where there is one will; if you love power—the hand of a queen—are you afraid to venture?'

'By heavens, no! Speak, shall I kill him?'

'You have said it,' she replied, with the coolest manner, 'not I; but it were better to act than to say. Yet if he die, why need it be by your hand? May not people die without any one divining the cause of death? How natural it is to die.'

'Ah!' exclaimed the noble youth, 'I comprehend you. Poison—the dagger—secret treason. Never, while I bear a sword, will I so dishonor myself, even for love and ambition—how much less for an enemy whom my soul abhors.'

'Then let him live and wed his pretty sovereign, and teach thee how to obey him.'

'Those words are his death-warrant,' replied the incensed chief; 'he or I will cease to exist within the hour; but one or both will fall with honor in open field.'

'Right,' returned the other; 'fools pass on and are punished. Embroil the world for a girl and a rival, when one quiet sign would remove every obstacle.'

'Thanks!' exclaimed the now really grateful youth; 'your highness has brought the matter to a crisis; it shall be done, but not in the mode you insinuate.'

'Beware! he has a sword. I cannot afford to lose you. You are very dear; at least you know you are useful to me.'

'That doubt,' returned the fiery soldier, 'at once decides me. You shall soon behold this sword stained with our arch-enemy's life blood—or see me no more.'

With these words, spite of her affected efforts to detain him, he rushed forth to seek the life of him who, as a chief and a soldier, he was bound to obey.

Well aware that should Don Estevan fall he would be compelled to take to flight, the first thing he did was to provide for his safety and support during a temporary banishment. He at once dispatched all his personal and available property, money, jewels, &c., to the nearest border town to await his arrival, and compelled to cross the frontier into France.

Then having arranged the most pressing of his worldly affairs, and provided for his friends and numerous dependents, he coolly proceeded towards the residence of his detested rival.

It was time; for the royal nuptials, unknown to him, had been already fixed upon; they were to be celebrated on the very day that he was himself destined to resume his command in a distant province. The appointment was just made. Of this, too, he heard upon his way; and almost the ensuing minute stood confronting the very being on whom his thousand imaginary causes of wrong were now concentrated.

The favored lover would have passed on with a smile, half scorn, half pity, which rendered the other speechless with rage and jealousy. He could only draw, and beckon to his laughing foe to do the same.

'Forbear!' cried Don Estevan, 'I do not wish to kill you. I have no cause to wish you ill; besides, you are younger, less experienced; I am yet your chief in war; you ought to obey me. Sheathe your sword, and spare your life.'

'Ah, craven villain! Low-born, presumptuous as you are, dare you pity me? Thou tremble for thy own vile life. Seducer! traitor! draw, or I will slay thee where thou stand'st.'

'What! art thou so tired of thy life, boy?' exclaimed Don Estevan; 'yet I will only punish thee by winning thy sword and granting thy life. Now, then!'

'And at it they indeed went,' says the chronicler, 'with right good will; the one attacking, the other parrying, with the skill of expert swordsmen, such as they were.' In the mad heat and fury of his onset, Don Alfonso, not yet cool enough to guard, almost beat down that of his brave opponent. The wish of the latter, who esteemed him for his many proofs of reckless daring and good service in the field, and felt for his extreme youth, was really to spare him, and became the cause of his own destruction. Acting coolly and cautiously on the defensive, he allowed Don Alfonso to exhaust the wild vigor of his attack, without once drawing blood, when, assuming the offensive, he succeeded in wounding him in the arm, and was making an admirable feint, so as to disarm him at the next pass, when his foot, slipping over the blood of his now faint, retreating foe, he fell forward, and ere he could recover himself the rapier of Don Alfonso had passed through and through him. Nay, he continued to stab his hated rival after death, as if his deadly rage and jealousy could never be satiated; and he stamped upon the quivering limbs, losing all sense of knightly honor, nor feeling that he had really committed the act of an assassin, owing his triumph to an accident, and thus involuntarily fulfilling the injunctions of the cruel queen-mother to take his foe at secret advantage. As his extreme rage abated, and he gazed on the noble features of the dead, a strange misgiving of the kind came over him; a strange and nameless terror at the idea of having stained his own fame, though no one saw, no one could know the unknighly deed of so stabbing a foeman on the ground, and at his mercy, and he felt, too, in consequence of that foe's own generous wish to save him. All flashed upon him like the sudden light of heaven upon a dark scene of murder—and he trembled. In the very hour of victory, in the fixed giant grasp of gratified love and ambition, he blushed for shame, and groaned in the remorse of his dishonored spirit, as he bore his dripping sword to gratify the cruel eyes of the queen-mother.

'Joy! joy!' she exclaimed; 'but you, too, bleed.'

'Would to God!' exclaimed the wretched man, 'that it were all my blood, or that I had shed his more fairly. You are too well obeyed.'

'Fool! you look like the vanquished, not the victor. But is he dead—quite dead?'

'He will trouble no one but myself more in this world,' he answered, sadly. 'Alas! I forgot it was he who first taught me the way to victory—who guided my youth—who encouraged, promoted, ay, and now I recall it, more than once shielded me in the hour of peril; the very mirror of our knighthood, the throne's guardian, and the glory of our land. Madman! what have I done!' and he sighed, and spoke, as if unconscious of another's presence.

'Are you a man to win a queen and throne?' exclaimed the queen mother with scorn. 'Away! you are in no mood to reap the fruits of victory; you must consult your safety for a time, and leave me to act for you.'

'You are right,' he replied, starting, as if out of a horrid dream. 'I will away to France; this ground will not bear—this air will stifle me; he will haunt my steps in battle; but there I can again face death, and love it.'

And he who had dreamed to crown all his hopes by a deed of blood, became a wanderer, self-banished, before he had heart even to challenge his fallen rival's place and fortune. He knew that he had been guilty of a base ungrateful act; it made him a coward; and, as if to fly from himself, he fled.

CHAPTER II.

THE fall of the consort-elect, the favorite alike of chiefs, soldiers, and people, was not an event to be concealed, even from her destined most to suffer by it in the loss of one whom she loved with all the enthusiasm of her country—whom she looked up to as the great champion of her crown. But the indignation of the sovereign equalled the keen sorrow of the woman, and perhaps enabled her to sustain the cruel blow, which, deprived of the power of retributive punishment, might have produced a fatal effect. As it was, she gave way to a degree of poignant grief and despair, that made all most faithfully attached to her tremble for her life. Her enemies were elated; they were freed from the two chiefs whom they most feared, and prepared to recover all the strong places of which they had been deprived. The friends of Don Estevan, likewise, supported by the people, cried aloud for vengeance; the author of the foul assassination, as it was denounced, was known, and his guilt attested by his flight. A heavy price was put upon the head of the traitor; every means of discovering his retreat, and bringing him to punishment, was adopted, but still without effect. Since his sudden flight he had never once been seen nor heard of, either in Spain or France, and many concluded that he had been set upon by robbers—entered the service of the Moors—nay, in his rage of disappointed love and ambition, perhaps put a period to his own days.

As time flew, and the grief of the young queen became somewhat mitigated—though not the desire of revenge, which for such an offense never yet slept in a royal bosom—she adopted other and more effectual means. It was made a public decree that the man who should bring the assassin of her betrothed lover, dead or alive, from that hour became the partner of her throne and bed—a resolution which proved that, however a first love may be ineffaceable, there reigns a yet stronger passion in woman's breast. Vengeance for outraged love and power at once has no rival.

It is astonishing what a degree of energy and activity this singular decree infused into all the authorities, chiefs, magistrates, soldiers, police—all but the women were quickly upon the alert—till there was hardly a hole or corner of all Europe that escaped a search. More time elapsed, but no traitor Don Alfonso turned up. Assuredly had he not adopted a most ingenious disguise, passing under the name of Pedro of Arragon, and little dreaming then of becoming the founder of a dynasty, he must have been captured a hundred times, and equivalent to being hanged, drawn, and quartered, shot to death, as a vile renegade traitor, in the back.

By means of previously transferring the property to which we have alluded, Don Pedro—we must now call him—contrived to live in comparative ease and affluence for a Spanish refugee.

While thus picking his teeth for about six years, and watching the course of events, the old Moors were making terrific inroads upon the conquests before wrested from them by the brave cavaliers. Since their disappearance there had been a sad lack of true knightly spirits "without fear or reproach;" the sudden loss of two such chiefs, and the advantage taken of it by the enemy, having so cowed all minds, that to believe a cotemporary chronicler, "there hardly appeared a single true knight in Spain for the space of those six years. Nor was this the worst of all, for presuming upon the defenseless state of the young queen—she was hardly yet more than twenty—the jealous and ambitious lover of her dominions, her neighbor—King of Portugal, resolved to lay siege to her in her capital, and extend his sovereign power over all Spain—as fast, at least, as it was unoccupied by the Moors. Embassies, and presents, and prayers, had proved alike vain, and his chief rivals being removed, he conceived he had a paramount right both to the young queen and to the country, and consequently a right royal right 'to do what he would with his own.'

At all events, King Juan raised a most formidable power, that especially for one so fat and lazy, who had never wielded lance since his father chased out the Moors, made both Christians and infidels marvel at the new prodigy, and what might be about to happen. Sitting down before old Toledo, then Spain's capital—and he occupied a large seat—there he quietly waited, till, by dint of low diet and cutting off every lady-like comfort whatever, the fair prey should fall into his own huge maw of its own accord.

But true to Don Estevan's memory, the young queen was resolved rather to die than to surrender at discretion to such an uncourteous lover. In reply to his repeated summons she issued her former decree, adding, that he must first go and bring her the head of Don Alfonso before she could consent to accept him as her consort, and raise him to a Spanish throne. But at length, as provisions ran short, and she began to experience all the 'désagrémens' of a real siege, she conceived such an invincible dislike to that style of making love and to the barbarian lover, as to wish and pray that some one would come to raise the siege, though it might be the hated Don Alfonso himself. Nay, a visit from the Moors would have been almost welcome, if to free her from the persecution of so uncourteous a neighbor, who, besides, being horribly fat and ugly, had a hateful knack of imprisoning his wives, and, worse than Bluebeard, never permitting them to consult their taste except in the choice of a bowl, a dagger, or a bowstring.

Now, in this dilemma, it so fell out that the false Don Pedro, who had full leisure to observe the progress of affairs, was sieged with a lively compassion on hearing the sufferings of his sovereign lady and the invasion of his native land. Having expiated his crimes by a painful pilgrimage on foot to the Holy Land, and laid many a villainous Paynim low, love and ambition began to reanimate his breast. With the same fervor of soul which first plunged him into misfortune, he was resolved to show what a single spirit could achieve in a great cause, when spurred on by desire of fame and honor. To effect the deliverance of the fair sovereign he still adored before he appeared in his real character, was his favorite project. Nor could he easily be recognised. He had increased in stature, had suffered his beard to grow to an enormous length, and looked at least twenty years older. He appeared half Mahometan and half Frenchman, speaking the French tongue with fluency, and adopting the costume of a French officer. He had amassed considerable wealth by his two years' campaigns in the East, and, with the aid of some nobles and princes of his adopted land, succeeded in equipping a fine army, composed of the adventurers of different nations, the head of which he rapidly crossed the Pyrenees. Advancing by forced marches towards Toledo, he sent forth scouts, followed by flying columns, to give notice to the besieged town that succor was at hand. Upon taking up a position within a league's distance from the Portuguese power, he dispatched a letter by a winged messenger—then most frequently employed in emergencies of love and war—a carrier-pigeon, belonging to the queen's palace. This letter contained a request to know the sovereign's will, and whether she would grant him a commission to attack the king's army and raise the siege, and, as matters seemed rather pressing, by the return of the pigeon-post. Imagine the delight of the beleaguered young beauty, when she just began to despair of saving her honor and her crown. In reply she assured 'the gallant cavalier that, whoever he might be, he appeared to her an angel of light; and the sooner he became the destroying angel of the rude invader and his army, the better she should be pleased.' Don Pedro, equally gratified, set about this agreeable task with the most consummate skill and prudence. His metamorphosis as a chief had been complete; he was now, after his experience with the wily soldans of Asia, one of the most cool and calculating of commanders; and, instead of rushing headlong at once into all kinds of peril, he began, the better to mask his real object, by negotiating, and offering almost submissive terms to the fat king. The ruse took; the conditions were all but signed, when Don Pedro secretly conveyed to the queen his resolution of attacking on the ensuing day, conjuring her to let the garrison at the same time make a spirited sortie. Accordingly, ere daylight broke, the trumpets sounded, the tambours beat, and with the speed of light the simultaneous onset was commenced, and the terrified king and his slumbering camp found themselves enclosed between two fires; all was rout and confusion, and death confronted his victims in whatever direction they sought to fly. The insults and sufferings borne by the queen were amply avenged; and in the din and havoc that ensued, it was impossible that so fat and unwieldy a personage as the king should escape. Besides, it was a point of honor with Don Pedro to capture him, and to present him as a 'bonne bouche,' in order to ingratiate himself once more with his fair sovereign. So he carried his royal captive, bound in golden chains—at his own special prayer not to appear as a vulgar prisoner—into the presence of the victorious queen, to sue in another form—no longer dictating dishonor at the point of the sword, but an abject slave and prisoner. Who shall depict the grateful rapture of the liberated sovereign lady at the sight of her heroic deliverer? Far from recognising him as the assassin of her beloved Don Estevan, she lavished upon him every expression of praise and honor that a beautiful woman, just set free from the impending maw of an immense ogre, may be conceived capable of. The happy victor, on his side, assuming the name and character of a French noble of high rank, was careful to foster this agreeable delusion till he should be in a position to declare himself without risking her dreaded displeasure. The claims of the Sieur Bertrand de Lys (so he styled himself then) being so irresistible, he was at once advanced to the highest post in the kingdom, and finally made generalissimo of the queen's armies. With the ransom of King Juan he equipped a splendid host, recovered all the royal possessions, and carried terror into the most puissant strongholds and fastnesses of the invading Moors. Having subsequently leisure to play the courtier, he improved the occasion so well, that it soon became evident, had he only brought with him the head of the traitor Alfonso, the fair Adeliza would have felt little objection to comply with the terms of her own decree.

The impression likewise made by the young queen upon the noble Bertrand could not be disguised even from herself. In this difficulty she had recourse to her former governess, a person of distinguished merit—for happily the queen-mother had taken her departure, or rather eloped after the obese and burly monarch, who, as he was foiled in obtaining the daughter and a new kingdom, revenged himself by marrying the mother, imprisoning, and finally dispatching her on a very distant mission—an honor she had by no means coveted. The sage lady of the bed-chamber, considering the solution of so knotty a point too much, as well as dangerous, for a single person, prudently summoned a council of matrons to confer upon the most eligible steps to be pursued, and how to relieve her majesty from her vow to wed only the avenger of her lost lover. Need we say what was the result; that spite of consulting books of saints and codes of laws applicable to the question, they were still inclined 'to lean to mercy's side,' nay, advised the queen to wed her liberator without delay. Still the the vow, strengthened by the public decree, would not permit the sovereign lady to view the subject in so pleasant a light; and the royal confessor, not having yet received sufficient reasons for going over to the lady-majority, confirmed her majesty in her religious and conscientious scruples. What was to be done? Here was a pretty 'imbroglio' of things, of questions of intricacy, and wheels within wheels, sufficient to employ the wit of popes, synods, and casuists of every school for two or three centuries to come. What a pity, then, that Don Alfonso—he is about to appear under his old name, though in a new character—should so rudely cut the Gordian knot, which, by closer raveling, might have furnished ages with rich scholastic efforts and most ingenious theories of solution. Having been delicately made aware, through at least a thousand public channels, of the important nature of their private deliberations, he no longer hesitated; but inviting himself to the next privy council, at which the queen herself presided, bolder than a Clodius at the Mysteries, he thus boldly and openly addressed them:

'Most royal and adorable Adeliza, and all you noble and gentle dames, you are well aware, by bitter experience, how, for the space of six years there has not been seen a knight worthy of the name throughout all Spain; how the Moors have wasted and plundered, and even the Portuguese invaded and insulted our country. This was the will of God for the wickedness of the people, and of one most of all which now has been fully and thoroughly expiated. You know, likewise, how I rescued your majesty and my country at the last hour, not only from one, but from two most vindictive and potent enemies. I brought you a king in chains, and the heads of fifty Moorish chiefs, which now decorate the walls and temples of our beloved capital. But though such services may be thought to merit the highest and most glorious guerdon that a sovereign lady can confer upon a subject, yet far, my adored queen and noble ladies, be the thoughts of that subject from advising his sovereign lady to violate the lady vow she has uttered—to speak a lie and recall a public decree which pledged her hand and throne to the man of knightly order who should lay before her the head of him who slew in duel the famed and honored chief Don Estevan de Runiga. Let no such disloyal wish stain the breast of a loyal subject; rather let me adjure my royal mistress, by every bond of truth and honor, to adhere most firmly to a vow so taken, and to fulfil to the very least condition, in letter and in spirit, the full meaning of that decree in favor of the happy man who shall lay at her feet the head of the long banished and unhappy Don Alfonso. Here is the happy man who alone has succeeded in accomplishing the feat—in fulfilling all your wishes—I have brought you the hated head of the traitor. I lay it lowly at my sweet and ever-loved and adored sovereign's feet, to await her dread pleasure for weal or for woe. Strike, if it be your royal will,' he cried, presenting his sword, and baring his breast scarred with wounds, 'but let me perish by your own hand. Do you hesitate? Do you weep? Then, on the faith of your own vow and dread decree, I claim that hand. Oh, believe me, it was only the excess of my passion for you—to be first and greatest, as I have proved, in my power to serve you, defend you, and strike terror to your enemies—that stinging me into madness, led me to commit a deed which I ceased not to deplore, and have more than expiated by suffering and remorse.'

The queen had loved before she recognised Don Alfonso, and it is not difficult to surmise the rest.

'I was reduced to despair,' she replied; 'you rescued me from infamy, and my kingdom from destruction; you have won me fairly in the open field, and you have complied moreover with the strictest terms of the decree—you have brought me the head of Don Alfonso—I still see it at my feet. I am bound by my vow, and am yours now and for ever.'

THE LUXURY OF LUXURIES.

BY W. HURTON.

Go, thou, and wipe away the tear which dims the widow's eye
Be a father to the fatherless, and still the orphan's sigh;
Help thou thy brother in distress with open hand and heart;
But do thou this when seen by none, save him who dwells apart.

Rejoice with those of spirit glad, upraise the drooping head,
And to the wretched let thy words bring back the hope long fled;

Forgive us as thou wouldst be forgiven, and for thy fellows
Be happy in the happiness thou canst to others give. [Live
These are the heavenly luxuries the poorest can enjoy;
These are the blissful banquets of which men never cloy.
Rich and poor, old and young, know this as ye should—
The luxury of luxuries is that of doing good!

THE GOLDEN RINGLET.

HERE is a little golden tress
Of soft, unbraided hair,
The all that's left of loveliness
That once was thought so fair;
And yet, though time has dimm'd its sheen,
Though all beside hath fled,
I hold it here, a link between
My spirit and the dead.

Yes, from this shining ringlet, still
A mournful memory springs,
That melts my heart, and sends a thrill
Through all its trembling springs;
I think of her, the loved, the wept,
Upon whose forehead fair,
For eighteen years, like sunshine, slept
This golden curl of hair.

Oh, sunny tress, the joyous brow
Where thou didst lightly wave,
With all thy sister tresses, now
Lies cold within the grave;
That cheek is of its bloom bereft,
That eye no more is gay;
Of all thy beauties thou art left
A solitary ray.

Four years have passed, this very morn,
Since last we fondly met—
Four years, and yet it seems too soon
To let this heart forget—
Too soon to let that lovely face
From our sad thoughts depart,
And to another give the place
She held within the heart.

Her memory still, within my mind,
Retains its sweetest power;
It is the perfume left behind
To whisper of the flower.
Each blossom, that in moments gone
Bound up this sunny curl,
Recalls the form, the look, the tone
Of that enchanting girl.

Her step was like an April rain
O'er beds of violets flung;
Her voice a prelude to a strain,
Before the song is sung:
Her life, 'twas like a half-blown flower,
Closed ere the shades of even,
Her death the dawn, the blushing hour
That opens the gates of Heaven.

A single tress! how slight a thing
To sway such magic art,
And bid each soft remembrance spring
Like blossoms to the heart!
It leads me back to days of old—
To her I loved so long,
Whose locks outshone pellucid gold,
Whose lips o'erflowed with song.

Since then, I've heard a thousand lays
From lips as sweet as hers;
Yet, when I strove to give them praise,
I only gave them tears;
I could not bear, amid the throng
Where jest and laughter rung,
To hear another sing the song
That trembled on her tongue.

A single shining tress of hair
To bid such memories start!
But tears are on its lustre—there,
I lay it on my heart.
Oh! when in Death's cold arms I sink,
Who, then, with gentle care,
Will keep for me a dark brown link—
A ringlet of my hair?

MAUCAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

CROMWELL'S PURITAN ARMY.

THE army which now became supreme in the state was an army very different from any that has since been seen among us. At present the pay of the common soldier is not such as to seduce any but the humble class of English laborers from their calling. A barrier almost impassable separates him from the commissioned officer. The great majority of those who rise high in the service rise by purchase. So numerous and extensive are the remote dependencies of England, that every man who enlists in the line must expect to pass many years in exile, and some years in climates unfavorable to the health and vigor of the European race. The army of the Long Parliament was raised for home service. The pay of the private soldier was much above the wages earned by the great body of the people; and, if he distinguished himself by intelligence and courage, he might hope to attain high commands. The ranks were accordingly composed of persons superior in station and education to the multitude. These persons, sober, moral, diligent, and accustomed to reflect, had been induced to take up arms, not by the pressure of want, not by the love of novelty and license, not by the arts of recruiting officers, but by religious and political zeal, mingled with the desire of distinction and promotion. The boast of the soldiers, as we find it recorded in their solemn resolutions, was, that they had not been forced into the service, nor had enlisted chiefly for the sake of lucre, that they were no janissaries, but freeborn Englishmen, who had, of their own accord, put their lives in jeopardy for the liberties and religion of England, and whose right and duty it was to watch over the welfare of the nation which they had saved.

A force thus composed might, without injury to its efficiency, be indulged in some liberties which, if allowed to any other troops, would have proved subversive of all discipline. In general, soldiers who should form themselves into political clubs, elect delegates, and pass resolutions on high questions of state, would soon break loose from all control, would cease to form an army, and would become the worst and most dangerous of mobs. Nor would it be safe, in our time, to tolerate in any regiment religious meetings, at which a corporal, versed in Scripture, should lead the devotions of his less gifted colonel, and admonish a backsliding major. But such was the intelligence, the gravity, and the self-command of the warriors whom Cromwell had trained, that in their camp a political organization and a religious organization could exist, without destroying military organization. The same men who, off duty, were noted as demagogues and field preachers, were distinguished by steadiness, by the spirit of order, and by prompt obedience on watch, on drill, and on the field of battle.

In war, this strange force was irresistible. The stubborn courage, characteristic of the English people, was, by the system of Cromwell, at once regulated and stimulated. Other leaders have maintained order as strict. Other leaders have inspired their followers with a zeal as ardent. But in his camp alone the most rigid discipline was found in company with the fiercest enthusiasm. His troops moved to victory with the precision of machines, while burning with the wild fanaticism of crusaders. From the time when the army was remodeled, to the time when the army was disbanded, it never found, either in the British Islands, or on the Continent, an enemy who could stand its onset. In England, Scotland, Ireland, Flanders, the Puritan warriors, often surrounded by difficulties, sometimes contending against three-fold odds, not only never failed to conquer, but never failed to destroy and break in pieces whatever force was opposed to them. They at length came to regard the day of battle as a day of certain triumph, and marched against the most renowned battalions of Europe with disdainful confidence.

Turenne was startled by the shout of stern exultation with which his English allies advanced to the combat, and expressed the delight of a true soldier, when he learned that it was ever the fashion of Cromwell's pikemen to rejoice greatly when they beheld the enemy; and the banished Cavaliers felt an emotion of national pride, when they saw a brigade of their countrymen, outnumbered by foes and abandoned by allies, drive before it in headlong rout the finest infantry of Spain, and force a passage into a counterscarp which had just been pronounced impregnable by the ablest of the marshals of France.

But that which chiefly distinguished the army of Cromwell from other armies was the austere morality and the fear of God which pervaded all ranks. It is acknowledged by the most zealous royalists that, in that singular camp, no oath was heard, no drunkenness or gambling was seen; and that, during the long dominion of the soldiery, the property of the peaceful citizen and the honor of women were held sacred. If outrages were committed, they were outrages of a very different kind from those of which a victorious army is generally guilty. No servant-girl complained of the rough gallantry of the redecoats. Not an ounce of plate was taken from the shops of the goldsmiths. But a Pelagian sermon, or a window on which the Virgin and Child were painted, produced in the Puritan ranks an excitement which it required the utmost exertions of the officers to quell. One of Cromwell's chief difficulties was to restrain his pikemen and dragoons from invading, by main force, the pulpits of ministers whose discourses, to use the language of that time, were not savory; and too many of our cathedrals still bear the marks of the hatred with which those stern spirits regarded every vestige of Popery.

MONMOUTH.

CHARLES, while a wanderer on the continent, had fallen in at the Hague with Lucy Walters, a Welsh girl of great beauty, but of weak understanding, and dissolute manners. She became his mistress, and presented him with a son. A suspicious lover might have had his doubts; for the lady had several admirers, and was not supposed to be cruel to any. Charles, however, readily took her word, and poured forth, on little James Crofts, as the boy was then called, an overflowing fondness, such as seemed hardly to belong to that easy, but cool and careless nature. Soon after the Restoration, the young favorite, who had learned in France the exercises then considered necessary to a fine gentleman, made his appearance at Whitehall. He was lodged in the palace, attended by pages, and permitted to enjoy several distinctions which had until then been confined to princes of the blood-royal. He was married, while still in tender youth, to Anne Scott, heiress of the noble House of Buccleuch. He took her name, and received with her hand possession of her ample domains. The estate which he acquired by this match was popularly estimated at not less than ten thousand pounds a year. Titles, and favors more substantial than titles, were lavished on him. He was made Duke of Monmouth in England, Duke of Buccleuch in Scotland, a Knight of the Garter, Master of the Horse, Commander of the first troop of Life Guards, Chief Justice of Eyre south of Trent, and Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. Nor did he appear to the public unworthy of his high fortunes. His countenance was eminently handsome and engaging, his temper sweet, his manners polite and affable. Though a libertine, he won the hearts of the Puritans. Though he was known to have been privy to the shameful attack on Sir John Coventry, he easily obtained the forgiveness of the country party. Even austere moralists owned that, in such a court strict conjugal fidelity was scarcely to be expected from one who, while a child, had been married to another child. Even patriots were willing to excuse a headstrong boy for visiting with immoderate vengeance an insult offered to his father. And soon the stain left by loose amours and midnight brawls was effaced by honorable exploits. When Charles and Lewis united their forces against Holland, Monmouth commanded the English auxiliaries, who were sent to the Continent, and approved himself a gallant soldier, and a not unintelligent officer. On his return he found himself one of the most popular men in the kingdom. Nothing was withheld from him but the crown: nor did even the crown seem to be absolutely beyond his reach. The distinction which had most injudiciously been made between him and the highest nobles had produced evil consequences. When a boy he had been invited to put on his hat in the presence chamber, while Howards and Seymours stood uncovered around him. When foreign princes died, he had mourned for them in a long purple cloak, which no other subject, except the Duke of York, and Prince Rupert, was permitted to wear. It was natural that these things should lead him to regard himself as a legitimate prince of the house of Stuart. Charles, even at a ripe age was devoted to his pleasures and regardless of his dignity. It could hardly be thought incredible that he should at twenty, have gone through the form of espousing a lady whose beauty had fascinated him, and who was not to be won on easier terms. While Monmouth was still a child, and while the Duke of York still passed for a Protestant, it was rumored throughout the country, and even in circles which ought to have been well informed that the king had made Lucy Walters his wife, and that, if every one had his right, her son would be Prince of Wales. Much was said of a certain black box, which, according to the vulgar belief, contained the contract of marriage. When Monmouth had returned from the Low Countries with a high character for valor and conduct, when the Duke of York was known to be a member of a church detested by a great majority of the nation, this idle story became important. For it there was not the slightest evidence. Against it there was the solemn asseveration of the king, made before his council, and by his order communicated to his people. But the multitude, always fond of romantic adventures, drank in eagerly the tale of the secret espousals and the black box. Some chiefs of the opposition acted on this occasion as they acted with respect to the more odious fable of Oates, and countenanced a story which they must have despised. The interest which the populace took in him whom they regarded as the champion of true religion, and the rightful heir of the British throne, was kept up by every artifice. When Monmouth arrived in London at midnight, the watchmen were ordered by the magistrates to proclaim the joyful event through the streets of the city; the windows were illuminated; churches were opened; and a merry peal rose from all the steeples. When he traveled, he was everywhere received with not less pomp, and with far more enthusiasm, than had been displayed when kings had made progress through the realm. He was escorted from mansion to mansion by long cavalcades of armed gentlemen and yeomen. Cities poured forth their whole population to receive him. Electors thronged round him, to assure him that their votes were at his disposal. To such a height were his pretensions carried, that he not only exhibited on his escutcheon the lions of England and the lilies of France, without the baton sinister under which, according to the law of heraldry, they were debruised in token of his illegitimate birth, but ventured to touch for the king's evil. At the same time he neglected no art of condescension by which the love of the multitude could be conciliated. He stood godfather to the children of the peasantry, mingled in every rustic sport, wrestled, played at quarterstaff, and won footraces in his boots against fleet runners in shoes.

☞ A person in a public company accusing the Irish nation of being the most unpolished in the world, was answered mildly by an Irish gentleman that 'it ought to be otherwise, for the Irish meet with hard rubs enough to polish any nation upon earth.'

☞ 'Ho! Gold Diggers,' is the head of a long California article in one of our exchange papers. Some of them, we guess, will find it necessary, when they reach the land of promise to hoe corn.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1849.

THE PRISONER'S FRIEND—TREATMENT OF THE FALLEN.

THERE is published in Boston, a monthly periodical called the "Prisoner's Friend." It is conducted by Rev. Charles Spear, an eminent and unwearied philanthropist. We refer to this periodical now, and in this place, for the purpose of offering some remarks on the important object it proposes to accomplish. It cannot be denied that much might be done for the improvement of criminals by mild and judicious measures; and in many instances, we doubt not, they might be reclaimed. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy," is a saying uttered by the Infinite Wisdom, and yet how little is it regarded by society in its treatment of those who have fallen from virtue, but who are nevertheless struggling upward toward the pure light of Heaven, and longing for the communion of the good.

To a man or woman—young or old—who has overstepped the bounds of prudence, or the strict line of innocence, society holds out no inducements to virtue, no motives for repentance. It first brands its victims, then degrades them to the dust, and then—what then? It hurls them into the pit of hell! Read the history of crimes in this or other countries, and what is it but the history of the struggles of poor, broken and despairing hearts?—hearts which might have been ennobled with the brightest virtues, but which society has bound to sin with a chain as inexorable as fate.

A youth of tender age for some petty crime is sent to prison. He had been virtuously educated, and innocence and happiness were the companions of his early life. But temptations assailed him, and he fell, without perhaps being conscious of the nature of his acts. In the solitude of his prison he comes to himself. A golden vision of virtue and happiness visits him in his dungeon. He feels all his loss, sheds those tears angels rejoice at, and which they bend down to kiss away, and resolves, when he regains his freedom, to bring back those radiant hours, by the practice of a virtue so lofty, that all the world will see it, and confess it. The day, the great day of his expectations at length comes. The prison doors roll upon their hinges, a pure sky arches over him in loving embrace, and sympathizing Nature invites him forth. He stands free in the world. O, never before had the sun appeared to him so brilliant and fair, never were the heavens so serene and balmy, and never did the sweet summer winds, which played upon his blanched and sunken cheek, seem to him so soft, so fragrant, so invigorating. A firm resolution of virtue sat on his brow, hope shone in his eyes, joy sang in his heart. With gentle visions floating before him, he hastens to the home where he was nurtured, to the companions of his childhood. His home stands there still, his companions are there—all as ever? No; O, God, no! Rejected from the embraces of the one, and expelled from the society of the other, he now learns that he is damned for ever—a cast-away, a thing of pollution, worthy to be met only with withering scorn, or to be ground into the dust, or crushed as a worm. Repulsed, where he had reason to expect sympathy and encouragement, he flies, in horrible despair, from the presence of his former associates, and only two alternatives, terrible alternatives, are possible to him now—he may die alone, and broken-hearted, or, seeking the companionship of thieves and robbers, and sinking deeper and deeper in guilt, he may perish on the scaffold a MURDERER! And for all this is Society responsible. Even his blood, guilty as he is, will, like that of Abel, call unto God for vengeance. He wished to reform, he aspired to virtue, and to a life of honesty, and with a contrite spirit and honorable hope, he worked his way upward, through sorrow and tears, toward the gates of Heaven; but the world, cruel and faithless closed the doors against him, and hurled him down again into that abyss, from which he had well nigh escaped.

This picture is no fancy sketch—would to God it was—it is the literal history of two-thirds of our criminals. They are made what they are by the unchristian policy of Society. If it be a crime to injure the temporal interests of men, to trespass on their rights and privileges, how much more criminal is it to discourage a repentant soul—to drive back the returning prodigal to his degradation, his husks and his despair. O, far better would it be for us, to be cast into the sea with a mill-stone hanged about our necks, than so terribly to disappoint a crushed and suffering, but heaven-aspiring Soul. Let Society show mercy here, let the wealthy and powerful give their countenance and support to these poor victims of sin, who wish to reform, and thousands will be redeemed and made happy, who now, having no inducements to reform, are running swiftly to perdition.

THE CALIFORNIANS.

IN our last we made mention of several of our friends who are on the point of leaving us for the Golden West. J. Winchester, Esq., Daniel Norcross, Esq., Caleb Lyon, Esq., and J. B. Devoe, Esq., have long been associated with us in various relations. May peace and plenty attend them. To-day we add another name to this list of pilgrims to the land of gold. We speak of Dr. James Ashley, formerly one of the proprietors, and assistant editors of this journal. He goes out as surgeon of the Apollo. He is a gentleman of great industry, enterprise and perseverance, and being a well-instructed and judicious physician, will no doubt reap a rich harvest in California. The Doctor takes out with him a large assortment of medicines, complete sets of surgical instruments, in short, every thing requisite to combat the numerous diseases of that climate with success.

Dr. Ashley is accompanied by another of our friends, S. G. Colby, Esq., of the firm of A. Travers & Co., Maiden Lane, New-York. Once more, we wish all these fortune-seekers success, and dismiss them with our sincerest benedictions.

NEW YORK FINANCES.—From Governor Fish's message, we learn that the public debt of New York on the 30th September last, was $23,087,238 63, including $1,233,905 60, of contingent liability. The revenues of the State for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1848, were $3,833,954 40, of which $3,204,707 16, were from the canals. The payments during the fiscal year were—to the Canal Debt Sinking Fund, $1,800,000; to the General Debt Sinking Fund, $350,000; to defray the necessary expenses of Government, $200,000; expenses of collecting tolls and keeping the canals in repair, $355,850 64; total, $2,705,850 64, leaving a surplus of nearly $500,000 for the Erie Canal Enlargement, &c.

MARRIAGE.

THE great ties, by which society is held together, are love and marriage. These are the germ and the fruit of human happiness and misery—at least they form in a society constituted like ours a woman's destiny in life. In a former article, we alluded to the mode in which matrimonial alliances are conducted abroad. The choice is left to the parents and guardians—inclination is little consulted—love in the incipient stage of wedded life is almost unknown. The parties make solemn vows, and assume responsibilities; duty yields obedience, but the heart is withheld.

With us it is widely different. Woman, in her holiest development, is unshackled—she rushes into the arena of the world with all her inexperience and glow of feeling round her—she is the mistress of her actions, and, what is a higher privilege, she wields her own affections. There is no one to dictate the charms she shall wear—she is the artificer of her own fortunes: she selects for herself.—What is the result under the two systems? Are marriages happier here than in Europe? At the first glance, one would decide that they are. Universal opinion so decides. But, on a near view into the subject, it is doubtful whether this freedom of choice may not sometimes lead to abuse; whether young heads have the cool judgment of old ones; whether the impulses of passion, the warmth of imagination, and the caprices of a youthful fancy, are to be trusted in so important a transaction of life. In short, whether parents, who are supposed to have the interest and happiness of their children at heart, who have more experience, tact and knowledge of the world, and who are far safer negotiators, are not better arbiters of their children's destiny than themselves, as far as marriage is concerned?

We know that among us we have seen on our side—the current of opinion is all the other way. Yet, we are constrained to say, that after a long survey, there seems to us as many ill-assorted and injudicious marriages among us as in European society. The heart adapts itself to its position, its views and impulses arise materially from it, and its hopes and aspirations are bounded by it. And, if abroad, so much is not anticipated or hoped for, if life is not pictured with so many blessings in the married state, perhaps less disappointment is apt to ensue, and more solid happiness is often experienced.

We shall pursue this subject farther. We have to remark, in closing this article, that there is a compensation in the moral as well as the physical world, and that human happiness is much the same in civilized and refined life in all countries, though the customs are variant, and the institutions by which they are modded differ so widely.

THE CHOLERA.—There is now no cholera in New York. Its disappearance, however, should not cause us to relax any of our sanitary precautions, for it will undoubtedly reappear, with the warm weather. Lodges should prepare for it by husbanding their resources.

REMOVAL OF THE CAPITAL.—The Herald of Sunday contained an article advocating the removal of the seat of government from Washington to Cincinnati, and offers certain reasons for the removal, which, we think, quite unsatisfactory. The seat of government ought unquestionably to be removed from Washington, but not to Cincinnati. New York is the metropolis of the country, and should be the capital. The chief city of a country ought always to be the capital, otherwise the capital has no moral power or influence.

THE BACHELOR'S HEBREW BENEVOLENT LOAN ASSOCIATION.—A ball in aid of this association took place on Tuesday evening last, at the rooms of the Chinese Museum. It was attended by the beauty and fashion of the city.

NEW CONSTITUTION FOR SUBORDINATES.

THE following is the New Constitution for Subordinate Lodges recently adopted by the R. W. Grand Lodge of New-York. It is now in force. We believe the Standing Resolutions have all been abrogated.

PREAMBLE.

For the purpose of effecting uniformity in the administration of the privileges, honors, and benefits of the Order within this jurisdiction, THE GRAND LODGE OF THE STATE OF NEW-YORK, (acting under a valid, unreclaimed Charter from the Grand Lodge of the United States, Independent Order of Odd-Fellows,) the supreme tribunal of Odd-Fellowship within its limits, without whose sanction and control no Lodge can exist, ordains the following Articles as the Constitution of Subordinate Lodges:

ARTICLE I.

This Lodge shall be constituted by at least FIVE members, including one qualified to preside at its meetings, and shall be hailed and entitled — LODGE, No. —, Independent Order of Odd-Fellows of the State of New-York, and shall possess the full powers and privileges of a Subordinate Lodge, holding a legal, unreclaimed Charter, duly granted and formally presented by the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York.

ARTICLE II.—OF MEMBERSHIP.

FIRST SECTION.—ADMISSIONS, ETC.

Clause 1.—No candidate shall be proposed or initiated unless he be a free white male, of sound health, of good moral character, of the age of twenty-one years, and a believer in a Supreme Being, the Creator and Preserver of the Universe: He must be a resident of this State, and actually reside within this county, and shall pay a fee of not less than — dollars.

Clause 2.—The name of a person offered for initiation must be proposed at a regular meeting by a member, in writing, stating his age, residence, and business; which must be entered on the record, and the subject referred to three brothers for investigation, who shall report at the succeeding regular meeting, when the candidate shall be balloted for, with ball ballots, and if not more than two black balls appear against him, he shall be elected, but if three or more appear, he shall be rejected, and so declared.

Clause 3.—A Brother of the Order wishing to become a member, shall present his card from the Lodge of which he was formerly a member, which shall be referred to a committee of three, and in other respects disposed of as provided by Clause 2, for other applicants; and on being admitted shall pay a sum of not less than one dollar.

Clause 4.—An Ancient Odd-Fellow, whose card is out of date, or may have been satisfactorily ascertained to be lost, can be admitted by referring his application to a committee, and and disposing of it in other respects as is provided for other applicants in the foregoing Clauses, and on his paying into the Lodge Fund a sum not less than five dollars.

Clause 5.—When a candidate for initiation has been rejected, notice thereof shall be sent without delay to all the Lodges in the same and adjoining counties; and no person so rejected in this or any other Lodge, shall be again balloted for during the space of six months.

Clause 6.—No suspended or expelled member of the Order can be received in membership in this Lodge.

Clause 7.—Any member of this Lodge having been regularly expelled or suspended indefinitely, may be reinstated to his former condition, by being duly proposed therefor, at a regular meeting, by a member, and his case referred to a committee of three brethren, who shall report at the next regular meeting, when, if two-thirds of the members present are in favor of the reinstatement, it shall be made; Provided, that in the case of an expelled member, the vote for reinstatement shall not be final until approved by the Grand Lodge.

Clause 8.—No proposition for membership can be withdrawn after it has been referred to a committee. Nor can an unfavorable ballot be reconsidered under any circumstance; but a new ballot may, at any time previous to the admission of the candidate, be ordered by the Lodge where the former one has been favorable.

SECOND SECTION.—CONTRIBUTIONS AND BENEFITS.

Clause 1.—The regular contributions to the Lodge Fund shall not be at a less rate than six and a quarter cents per week, to be determined by the By-Laws, as well as the amount for Education Fund and Funeral Tax; and the Lodge shall suspend all members who neglect or refuse payment, of the sums so determined for twelve months; Provided, nevertheless, any member who may be in the Naval Service of the United States, or engaged in the Commercial Marine sailing to foreign ports, shall be allowed twelve months in addition to the time above specified.

Clause 2.—Every bona-fide member, who shall be qualified as required by the By-Laws, shall, in case of sickness or disability, be entitled to and receive such weekly benefit as may be fixed by law, from the funds of the Lodge.

Clause 3.—In case of the death of a Brother, who shall be qualified as provided in Clause 2, there shall be allowed from the Lodge, a sum not less than thirty dollars, to defray the expense of burial, which shall be paid over without delay to the deceased Brother's nearest of kin. In the absence of competent relations, the Noble Grand shall take charge of the funeral, and render an account of the disbursements.

Clause 4.—On the demise of the wife of a Brother, qualified as provided by Clause 2, he shall be entitled to a sum not less than fifteen dollars, for the purpose of assisting in the funeral expenses.

THIRD SECTION.—PENALTIES.

Clause 1.—Any member who shall violate any of the principles of the Order, or offend against these Articles or By-Laws, shall be subject to be fined, reprimanded, suspended, or expelled, as the By-Laws may direct, ancient usage require, or the Lodge determine.

Clause 2.—Any member being convicted of heinous offense against the laws of the land; or of habitual drunkenness; or of feigning himself sick, with a view to abuse the benevolent intentions of the Order, shall be expelled.

Clause 3.—Any member who shall be concerned in organizing, or shall give countenance and support to, or shall visit any Lodge in the State of New-York, purporting to be Odd-Fellows, and not possessing a legal, unreclaimed, and valid Charter, duly granted and presented, or confirmed by the Grand Lodge, shall be deemed unworthy of fellowship; and such Brother, upon satisfactory proof, shall be suspended or expelled, at the option of the Lodge. Any Brother so suspended or expelled, shall not be reinstated, unless the Grand Lodge assents thereto. Nor shall any person who has been in membership in any spurious or illegal Lodge, be received as a member, without the consent of the Grand Lodge.

Clause 4.—Any member who shall expose or exhibit any of the emblems of the Order as a sign, in connection with his business, shall be suspended or expelled, as the Lodge may determine.

FOURTH SECTION.—TRIAL, ETC.

Clause 1.—Every member shall be entitled to a fair trial for any offense involving reprimand, suspension, (except for nonpayment of dues,) or expulsion; but no member of this Lodge shall be put upon trial unless charges duly specifying his offense, so as fully to set forth the nature thereof, and enable him to prepare for his defense, shall be preferred to the Lodge, in writing, by a Brother of the Order, in good standing.

Clause 2.—When charges have been preferred against a brother in proper manner, the complaint involved shall be referred to a committee of five members, who shall, if possible, be chosen from among the peers of the accused; such committee shall, with as little delay as the case will admit, summon the parties and try the case, they shall keep full minutes of the evidences, and their proceedings, and report the same to the Lodge, with their decision on the charges. Should such decision be one of acquittal, it shall be final without other action on the part of the Lodge. Should the decision be one of conviction, the committee shall also determine what punishment to recommend the Lodge to inflict; and should a specific penalty be provided by law for the offense, they shall report the same, or should the determination be in favor of the expulsion or suspension of the member, they shall submit a resolution for the purpose to the Lodge for action.

Clause 3.—When a committee, provided for in Clause 2, shall have reported adversely to the accused, the Lodge shall fix a time, not less than two weeks distant, at which to take final action on concurring in the report, and adopting the recommendation or resolution of the committee, of which time ample notice shall be given to the accused. At the time appointed the Lodge may proceed to consider the matter whether the accused be present or not; but the accused shall not be present when any vote is taken affecting the report and recommendation or resolution of the committee.

Clause 4.—When the Lodge proceeds to consider the report and recommendation or resolution of the committee provided for by Clause 2, it shall first determine the following question: 'Will the Lodge concur in the decision of the committee?' Should this question be sustained by a majority of the members present, it shall be adopted; and then the question of penalty, as submitted by the committee, will be before the Lodge. If a specific penalty be provided by law for the offense, the N. G. shall enforce it: otherwise, the Lodge will decide on the penalty in the following form: 'Will the Lodge adopt the resolution submitted by the committee?' During the consideration of this question, the Lodge is fully competent to amend the resolution by reducing the penalty, but in no case can it increase the same, except by substituting expulsion for suspension. The vote on the expulsion or suspension of a member shall be taken by ballot—two-thirds of the qualified members present voting in favor of the resolution, it shall be adopted.

Clause 5.—Any Brother feeling aggrieved by the decision of the Lodge against him in any matter of grievance, or by the deprivation of a right, honor, privilege or benefit, may claim a review of the proceedings had in his case by a committee of Past Grands; and if the award of such committee of Past Grands should be rejected by the Lodge, such brother has an appeal to the Grand Lodge, as provided by Article IV, of the By-Laws of the Grand Lodge.

Clause 6.—When any matter of grievance between brothers shall be brought before the Lodge, it shall be referred as is provided for charges in Clause 2. Such committee shall summon the parties, and examine and determine the matter in question, and if no appeal be taken from their decision to the Lodge, it shall be final without the action of the Lodge.

Clause 7.—When the decision of a committee appointed under Clause 6, shall not be satisfactory to all parties, either of those interested shall have the privilege of an appeal to the Lodge; and at the time appointed for trying the appeal, the committee shall present to the Lodge in writing, the grounds on which their decision was founded, and the parties shall have the privilege of being heard before the Lodge; and the Lodge shall determine the correctness of the decision of the committee by a majority of the votes present.

Clause 8.—If an accused member refuse or neglect to stand trial, when duly summoned, the committee shall report him guilty of contempt of the Lodge, which report shall be conclusive, and the punishment shall be expulsion.

Clause 9.—Any brother having been suspended or expelled, notice thereof shall be sent to all the Lodges, Degree Lodges, and Subordinate Encampments in this and the adjoining countie Clause 2.—All Elective and Appointed Officers shall have attained to the Scarlet degree previous to installation.

Clause 3.—Nominations for the Elective Officers shall be made only at the two meetings immediately preceding those of the elections, except when the nominees for an office all decline.

Clause 4.—No past Elective Officer shall be qualified to be a candidate for the office past when other nominations are before the Lodge unless he has been one full term out of such office, except the Treasurer and Permanent Secretary.

Clause 5.—Officers shall be elected at the last regular meeting in each term, and shall be installed at the first meeting in the succeeding one.

Clause 6.—Any officer absenting himself for three successive meetings, his seat may be declared vacant by a two-thirds vote of the Lodge; all vacancies shall be forthwith filled in the manner of the former selection, to serve the residue of the term: Officers so serving shall be entitled to the full honors of the term.

And should this Lodge continue to fail in making its returns for the period of one year, it shall thereby forfeit its

MISS JANE STUART, ARTIST, 20 EAST 14TH ST.—We have seen many portraits painted by Miss Jane Stuart, a daughter of the celebrated Gilbert Stuart, so well known by the great works of art he has left behind him. Miss Stuart has, in her profession as an artist, the advantage, besides inheriting much of the talent of her father, of having benefited by his instructions. She has attained a high degree of excellence, and her portraits are distinguished by their striking likeness, their correct drawing, their admirable coloring, and, more particularly, by their flesh tone, which she has carefully studied, and which is always true to nature. She has pursued her profession heretofore at Newport. She has now opened her rooms as above in this city, and we most cordially recommend her to the patronage of our friends. We have to add, that Miss Stuart met with great success during last winter in this city.

MANY articles are crowded out for want of room.

ADDRESS OF D. D. GRAND MASTER MORSE.

On the occasion of the installation of the officers of Algonquin Lodge, No. 71, New Brunswick, N. J.

OFFICERS AND BROTHERS: I have often heard Algonquin Lodge spoken of in terms of high commendation. Your hall is fitted up and arranged with a scrupulous regard to taste, beauty and convenience. You have unquestionably felt a laudable pride in doing the work of the Order with promptness and correctness in every minutiae. Perhaps you have aimed, from the commencement of this new Lodge, at making it one of the best—the model Lodge of the State. Such a high aim is indeed commendable, and certainly within your reach. As far as external appearances go toward such an object, you have done well. On this point, I will not offer a word.

I consider it appropriate, however, at this time, to call your attention for a few moments, to the grand object—the great purpose—the high, the supreme mission of Odd-Fellowship. Have you sufficiently thought of this subject? Strive as a Lodge, strive as individuals, for the attainment of this grand object, and in proportion as you succeed, you will in reality excel.

What, then, is the grand object of Odd-Fellowship? Is it to relieve each other in the struggles and trials incident to human life? If either of you ever thought that such was the main object of Odd-Fellowship, you had scarcely crossed its threshold, ere you was taught to undeceive yourself. To visit the sick, relieve the distressed, to bury the dead, and educate the orphan, are imperative duties enjoined by Odd-Fellowship; but these daily ministrations are but a tithe of the intrinsic virtues of our beloved Order. There will not be a dissenting opinion when I affirm the grand object of Odd-Fellowship to be, to lead man to the cultivation of the true fraternal relation designed by the Great Author of his being; to teach him the doctrine of human equality; to teach him to behold in every man, from the monarch on his throne to the beggar in his rags, the image of God, and the evidence of human equality; to recognise all men as brethren, and to do unto others as he would that others should do unto him.

Such is the high aim of Odd-Fellowship. That it has already accomplished much in this great work, I fully believe. The world, however, was not made in a day; large bodies move slowly; the progress of nations must of necessity be gradual; we have every reason for encouragement and rejoicing, if, through Him “in whom alone we live, move, and have our being,” a little has been accomplished in so great, so divine a work as that contemplated by Odd-Fellowship.

Throughout earth's wide domain, changes are occurring, revolutions transpiring, of the greatest importance to humanity. Monarchs are dethroned, or totter upon their thrones. Usurpation—the one-man power, everywhere trembles with fear of overthrow. The sovereign people assert their rights, and endeavor to attain their true position; and as a consequence, new doors are opened for the admission of truth—of God's word, which is truth.

To the bringing forward of the recent changes, and struggles for liberty in Europe, in France especially, I doubt not that the so-called secret societies, the Free-Masons, Illuminati and others, have contributed in no small degree. Not by encouraging conspiracy, or exciting to revolution; but by acknowledging the great truth of human brotherhood; by cultivating the doctrine of human equality—a doctrine which finds deep root in the human heart—a doctrine enjoined by God himself, when he commanded us to love our neighbors as ourselves.

Our own happy, prosperous, and peaceful nation, but a few months since was involved in war—a war deplored by the great majority of the nation, and still deeply deplored and lamented by the widows and orphans, and near and dear relatives of the gallant officers and soldiers who were sacrificed on the battle-fields of Mexico.

What are, what will be the results of this war?

A vast territory on the Pacific has become ours by undisputed sovereignty. It has been discovered that extensive deposits of gold exist there. Thousands upon thousands are flocking thither from all parts of the United States and other countries, with the expectation of making their fortunes in a short space of time. Our commerce in the Pacific has suddenly received an extraordinary impetus. The long talked of, and much wished for, more direct and easy communication with the Pacific, by means of steam power, is on the eve of accomplishment. Our great and powerful nation is about to exercise a greatly increased, and most potent influence upon surrounding nations and the world. We have great reason to hope that this influence will be eminently good; that truth will be disseminated, and the condition of nations, less advanced than our own, greatly improved. We have also to fear, in connection with this subject, the deleterious influence of love of gold—the love of money, which is the root of all evil.

The present era, then, is an important and interesting one; especially so to this nation. One which will be regarded with deep interest by all lovers of human improvement; by all who seek progress and the elevation of human character; by all who endeavor to cultivate and promulge Friendship, Love and Truth; by all good and true Odd-Fellows.

The Order of Odd-Fellows has an especial reason for taking a deep interest in the recent movement toward the newly discovered El Dorado. A large proportion of those who have departed, and are about to depart for this great field of enterprise, are members of the Order. These members are probably about to be placed in circumstances requiring a more signal and active exercise of the high offices of Odd-Fellowship than any in which they have heretofore been placed.

During a long and perilous voyage, and in a country as yet devoid of definite laws and established forms of government; where avarice, selfishness and deprivation are likely to exist in no slight degree, and where so much depends upon the character and influence of those who first enter this new field of enterprise, they will be doubly called upon to exercise toward each other, and toward all, brotherly kindness; and always as individuals, and as a class, to cast their influence in favor of justice, forbearance, peace, unity and equality.

In contributing their quota to the mighty influence to be exerted by this new movement, they have a mission to perform in accordance with the teachings they have received from the Order. They are to be the representatives of Odd-Fellowship in the heterogeneous community which will be formed in California.

It will be the duty, and the high privileges of Lodges, in taking leave of California—destined brothers, to give them such counsel, and to hold such communication with them as circumstances indicate, and as will place vividly before their minds the great truths and high principles sought to be inculcated by the Order, and which should govern them in their new position.

Suppose the mission of Odd-Fellowship to be accomplished, when man shall understand the true relation to his fellow, which was designed by the Great Author of his being, and shall act upon the great principle of Universal Love, which goes behind all distinctions, recognises all men as brethren, and bids us do unto others as we would that others should do unto us. What then will be the state of society? Persecution, fraud, illiberality, oppression, and all the social evils that afflict mankind, and disturb the general harmony, and which all issue from a pervading selfishness, will be done away. Man's eyes will be opened to the fact that his own comfort and welfare are interwoven with the well-being of the great aggregate of men. The state of society will be changed, and its millennial glory appear. For such a great and glorious event, the daily and hourly prayers of Christendom are offered up in the words taught by Christ himself: "Thy kingdom come—thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." How such events will be brought about, we are not taught; but if we judge the future by the past, if we judge from experience, we shall come to the conclusion that they will not be brought about without the use of means. Hence, it is the important duty of Christians to add to their prayers diligent study and action, in regard to the means necessary to bring about the fundamental changes in existing forms and ceremonies, which must take place previous to this second advent, which will eclipse the first, as did the Mosaic ritual excel the patriarchal. In this work do I believe Odd-Fellowship to be engaged. Indeed, it is professedly so.

But while holding up to your view the chief aim of our Order, I would not be understood as undervaluing in any way, the ministrations of Odd-Fellowship, which I referred to, viz: visiting the sick, relieving the distressed, &c.; for we are told that, when the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, and shall sit upon the throne of his glory; and all nations shall be gathered before him, and he shall separate them one from another. Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, "Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was hungry, and ye gave me meat—I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink—I was a stranger, and ye took me in—naked, and ye clothed me—sick, and ye visited me—in prison, and ye came unto me—for inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." These kindly offices, therefore, have a most exalted character, even to be the title to Christ's kingdom. Yet while Odd-Fellowship performs these offices among its members, its chief aim is to lead all men to the knowledge of their true relations, so that the performance of such duties may follow as the natural result.

Let us always bear in mind, as a fundamental principle of conduct, the law of divine wisdom and love, "Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you;" having our hearts warmed with the love which, St. Paul says, is forbearing, obliging, not envious, not arrogant, is not proud, is not rude, or selfish, or irritable, or slanderous, has pleasure in truth, and not falsehood, is content with all, confides in all, trusts to all, bears with all. The highest rank, the profoundest learning, are, without this, nothing; the greatest performances and accomplishments in literature and science, without it, are vain as a jingling cymbal. So mote it be.

FINE ARTS AND TAILORING.

It will appear impossible to many of our readers that on the corner of Cherry and Catherine streets, there is the largest tailoring establishment, not only in the United States, but in the world, where more than one thousand five hundred persons find a respectable and profitable daily living, and are better compensated than by many who herald, "wanted, 500 or 600 sewers." This large establishment, which is an ornament to our city, belongs to four brothers, who transact business under the name of H. & D. H. Brooks & Co., and with their father have occupied this site for more than thirty years. The lower part of this house is kept for sailors' clothes; other rooms contain garments for mechanics and laborers, and the upper part forms an immense depot for the most elegant and well-cut clothes, far superior to those made in Paris and London. What is great and imposing at the first sight, as you ascend the staircase, is the quantity of clerks that you meet, all of a genteel appearance; here any one, even the most difficult gentleman, will find cutters and sewers who will make for him, at the shortest notice, a coat that will suit his taste.

But we were not aware, at least in New York, that fine arts could go together with a tailoring establishment. We have visited Florence and Rome, and we saw in those famous places some simple shops decorated with frescos of the best Italian painters; yet Messrs. Brooks are certainly the first Americans who have introduced this beautiful specimen of art in a goods store in the United States. From the clerks' hall, we were taken to the room of fashion, of beauty, and of fresco painting, where Parisian looking-glasses, gilded chandeliers, and twenty tables, a la renaissance, form a fine ornament to the decorated walls. This modern temple of Italian painting is embellished with frescos executed by the skillful and artistical pencil of Signors Molini and Allegri, the best fresco painters in our country. The various scenes represented on the walls, recalled to our memory the fine views of Venice and Genoa, with the majestic far sight of the blue Italian sea, and the delightful terraces, which are to be found only in the palaces on the Mediterranean shores. We were pleased that Signors Molini and Allegri had succeeded in introducing fine arts, not only in the temples of God and the Muses, as at the Astor Place Theater, but also in a commercial place; and we wish that other merchants would follow the example of Messrs Brooks, and use the artistical talent of these two Italian painters. In this elegant room there is a staircase which, like an amphitheater, takes the visiter on a gallery around the hall, where he can cast a glance on the immense depot of summer clothes. We desire a good success to Messrs. Brooks, and we hope to see Molini and Allegri produce a revival in our city in the beautiful art of Italian fresco painting.

THE NEW YORK AND NEW HAVEN RAILROAD.—Of all the avenues of travel which modern enterprise and science have opened to this great metropolis, none is more important or more tending to results than this extended work. It is now a successful operation, and notwithstanding the obstructions which a rival corporation have thrown in its way, it is thronged beyond the accommodations it offers. It is evident that, for the facilities and conveniences it affords, for its security at a season when travelers are subjected to heavy gales on the sound, from the many towns through which it passes, it must be the preferable winter route—and in summer, it will divide the travel with those who like the variety of land and water, who have business at the east, and who are lovers of picturesque and agreeable scenery. It opens, also, the avenue of trade and travel, through an extensive country on the north as well as the east, and will be highly productive of beneficial results to New York. Mr. Schuyler, who is the President of this Company, is himself a guaranty for its success. Under his management and control, many of the railroad stocks which had become greatly depressed, and some in a ruinous state, have been resuscitated and become flourishing. And to his energy, experience and good judgment, we may look in this instance for the advancement of the interest of stockholders, and the accommodation of the public. We shall treat in another number more in detail on this subject, as to the advantages of this route; and the objects which it has in view, as a connecting link to a widely extended, fertile and wealthy country.

NEW YORK.—The Legislature of New York met in Albany, on Tuesday the 2d inst. In the Senate, Lieut. Gov. Patterson took the chair as President. The Assembly was organized by the election of A. K. Hadley, of Rensselaer, as Speaker, and P. B. Prindle as Clerk. Gov. Fish, who was installed into office on Monday, 1st inst., sent in his first message at 12 o'clock on Tuesday. It is decidedly the shortest (and therefore the most sensible) message from a Governor of this State within our recollection. It occupies between four and five columns of our small dailies.

COMMON SCHOOLS OF NEW YORK.—There are in this State 10,821 Common School Districts, in which 775,728 children were taught during the past year. The capital of the School Fund is $2,211,475. The amount paid to teachers during 1848, was $1,106,628. With such facts before us, there is small danger of our free institutions ever being overturned.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, December 23, 1848.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: It has been sometime since I had the pleasure of holding a converse with the Order through your invaluable periodical, "The Gazette and Rule."

I am pleased to see the improvement which you speak of in your paper—a feature which the Order, if they support themselves, are in honor bound to support—which has dignified the Fraternity, and made it honorable, and thus has the greatest claim upon every Odd-Fellow.

We are on the eve of Christmas, the day among all other days that stands the most transcendently related to that great state dispensation which brought the love of heaven down to earth—a season of good cheer and hilarity—a renewing of old associations and reminiscences.

With the annual election in our Grand Lodge you have been already apprised. Our G. M. and D. G. M., without any disparagement of other affairs, I think I may safely say, are the most devoted men belonging to this jurisdiction. Any Grand Lodge having such a "Stuart" for G. M. and so "Rich" an one for D. G. M., need never fear of success. They have been baptized in the purer days of the Order, in its most virgin font—they are the Boanerges of the Order here. Like Atlas of old, who was fabled as supporting the globe on his shoulder, so they, with one or two others, uphold the entire superstructure of Odd-Fellowship in this District; give it life and character, and are ever blowing in its dying nostrils new breath of life. The supporters of the Order here find themselves, as Gen. Washington was once, between two fires—that of his enemy and his friends. There is a great deal of opposition here from without, and more dangerous enemies within. For instance, we have in our particular Lodge No. 16, some 150 or 200 members, and yet we have the whole heat and burthen divided among some 10 to 20—and the case of my own Lodge is not an isolated one. Members are being suspended on all hands for non-payment of dues. Some NEVER attend, and those that do wish they were out again—for the purpose, I suppose, of gadding about the hotels, at the Faro, Billiards, bowling saloons or drinking-houses—always restive when in the retreat of Odd-Fellows.

The period for semi-annual elections has again rolled around, and there is a little more "business in hand" than there is on customary occasions.

The Grand Master has all his installing officers selected, and the business will be done in "ample" and "full" form.

In the matter of elections, the greatest judgment should be exercised—a due regard should be had to qualification as well as merit. Much depends on the official standing of a Lodge.

Yours in F. L. and T., T. W. J.

MAGNOLIA LODGE, BROOKLYN, N. Y.—It gives us pleasure to be able to say that this Lodge has been re-instated. The majority in favor of the legitimate Grand Lodge was even greater than we before stated it to be. D. P. Barnard, Grand Master of the New Constitution party, Issachar Reed, G. Patriarch of the illegal G. Encampment, and T. A. Ward, G. Treasurer of Mr. Barnard's G. Lodge, are members of Magnolia Lodge. The two latter gentlemen were present when the Lodge voted to return. Nassau Lodge, also of Brooklyn, has been re-instated. There are now only two Lodges in the District of Kings—Fulton and Eagle—which recognise the New Constitution party. So, gradually, all the wanderers are returning.

ISLAND CITY LODGE, No. 331, NEW YORK.—On Tuesday evening last, the following officers were installed for the ensuing term: Aug. C. L. Arnold, N. G.; R. Mowbray, V. G.; Wm. Torboss, Sec.; G. W. Underwood, Treas. This Lodge is little more than a year old, and numbers nearly 90 members. It commences the year with very flattering prospects.

A REMARKABLE FACT; OR A MAGAZINE WITH SOMETHING IN'T.—There are few events, in these days of startling circumstances, which more clearly indicate the transition state, or mark the absolute progress of the times, than the issue of a very neat and beautiful periodical, bearing the name of "THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S JOURNAL OF SCIENCE, LITERATURE AND ART." It is published by S. B. Brittan, No. 235 Broadway, and edited by that gentleman in connection with Prof. N. Brittan and Mrs. F. D. Green—the gifted Fanny Green whom our readers will remember as one of our contributors. If enterprise, industry and genius can make a thing go, it is pretty evident that this will not stand still.

Here the scholar will find familiar truths in a new and more agreeable light, and those who would become scholars, may learn many valuable things with small expense, either of time or money. The first Department contains systematic readings in the physical sciences generally. In the Literary Department we find several beautiful poems, biographical sketches, history, letters, &c.; and in the second number, the first act of a new drama entitled SAUL. It is from the sacred history, and is worth the price of the year's subscription—only one dollar—to say nothing of the history of the arts, Letters from a Hollow Tree, and translations of Demonstee's letters on Mythology—each of which is a series of papers full of vivacity, truthfulness and originality of conception, such as will hardly be found in any other place. While reading the articles in this work, we could not forbear wishing that they had a self-multiplying and self-diffusive power, that they might fertilize some of our many waste places. Here is indeed a work for the PEOPLE. It will suit the mechanic, the artizan, the scholar, the teacher and the man of taste. It cannot be otherwise than greatly popular, and those who examine it for themselves, will at once discover that there is no work better calculated to administer to the pleasures and necessities of the times, than the "Young People's Journal."

☞ "THE FLAG OF OUR UNION," comes before us this week, decked with an entirely new suit. It is refreshing, in these days of small type, and eye destroying print, to meet with a specimen of typography, truly artistical in every point, and we feel sure that its readers will duly appreciate it. The superior typographical appearance of this excellent family paper is only equaled by its contents, which are contributed by Park Benjamin, A. J. H. Duganne, Mrs. Frances S. Osgood, T. S. Arthur, Lieut. Murray, and a number of other ladies and gentlemen of acknowledged literary reputation. A $1000 prize story commences with the new year, and the general contents of the paper are such as must insure to the publisher a rich return for his enterprise.

ST. CHARLES HOTEL, TROY, N. Y.—This splendid house having been enlarged and newly furnished, has passed into the hands of Bro. R. D. McDonald, who is now sole proprietor. The hotel is situated at the Eastern, Western, and Saratoga Railroads, and is a few steps from the steamboat landing. We have been at this excellent hotel, and know its merit, and therefore recommend it to all our friends who may chance to travel that way.

TO PREVENT CHOLERA.—It seems to be universally admitted that constant cheerfulness and good humor are among the best preventatives of this disease. Gentlemen who shave themselves, will be much aided in promoting this desirable attainment, by purchasing one of Chapman's best razor strops, with a supply of his shaving cream, with which, even on these cold mornings, the shaving operation is a rich treat.

THE BABE OF BETHLEHEM.—This beautiful mezzotint Engraving, by Doney, has just been published by E. Anthony, 205 Broadway. The price is $1.60, not half its value. It is a work of superior excellence.

Theatricals and Amusements.

THE amusements for the holidays have been characterised by their usual variety; but it must be acknowledged that there is at our theaters more than the usual talent at this season. The competition is great, and the stock companies here are, in general, composed of a high order of dramatic ability. Ordinary actors will not draw. Light vaudevilles, and satires on prevailing manners are in vogue, and very clever they are, too; and they require very clever acting. Such are found at the Olympic and at Burton's. The Bowery is full of that kind of attraction which always delights its patrons. It abounds in scenic displays and gorgeous effects—in stock plays of a sentimental cast, and in the humor elicited by the farces of the day. Its stock company is excellent, and must be so to meet the public taste.

At the BROADWAY THEATER, is Andrew's splendid drama of the "Count of Monte Cristo," got up with great magnificence, as to scenery and costume, and with great tact as to stage effect. Lester has sustained the leading character, Edmond Dantes, in a manner which has added to his high and well merited reputation. He has shown great versatility of talents, and powers of a high order. The piece abounds in interest.

At the BOWERY, to Miss Wemyss, a clever and pretty actress, has succeeded a new historical drama, styled Boadicea, and a most brilliant and gorgeous piece it is, abounding in military displays, combats, processions and tableaux truly superb and picturesque. It will draw immensely.

At BURTON'S, Dombey and Son, California Gold Mines, and the new farce of Slasher and Crasher; the latter admirably played, and full of humor. This house maintains its popularity and success.

THE NATIONAL.—Many of the best actors of the Park are here; among others, Chapman and Clarke, both excellent. Wacousta, an interesting drama, has a run here this week, and a variety of popular pieces. It is filled nightly.

At the OLYMPIC, are Slasher and Crasher, and the Invisible Prince, which are given in Mitchell's best style. He is always catering to hit the popular vein.

NEW ORLEANS SERENADERS.—These artists have gone to the Society Library Rooms, after having delighted the society in the opera vicinity. They merit all patronage and success. They are good actors, good musicians, and possess a rich fund of chaste humor.

At the MUSEUM, are Mr. Hales, the English giant, and a prodigy greater than Tom Thumb, in Major Littlefinger. Great Western, too, the Yankee comedian, is there. The burlesque opera of the Sleep Walker is full of amusement and cleverness.

Of the CHINESE MUSEUM, we shall speak in our next.

A HEALTHY CITY.—Our neighboring City of Brooklyn, in whose prosperity we take a deep interest, enjoys the enviable reputation of being one of the healthiest places in the Union. With a population little short of 100,000, the deaths for the week ending December 30, 1848, amounted to only twenty-six! We doubt whether any other city can show so small a bill of mortality in so large a number of inhabitants.

SELLING OFF.—Our friend J. W. Brown, of 111 and 113 William-street, corner of John, offers his entire stock of new and desirable woollen and cotton hosiery, comforters, shirts and drawers, at a large discount, to close the business previous to Feb. 1, (after which date his store is to let). A rare chance is offered to dealers in such goods.

DEATH OF A NABOB.—Peter C. Brooks, said to be the richest man in New England, and reputed to be worth ten millions, died in Boston on the 2d instant, aged 81.

Choice Miscellany.

COMMON THINGS.

The sunshine is a glorious thing,
That comes alike to all,
Lighting the peasant's lowly cot,
The noble's painted hall.

The moonlight is a gentle thing,
It through the window gleams
Upon the snowy pillow where
The happy infant dreams.

It shines upon the fisher's boat,
Out on the lonely sea;
Or where the little lambkins lie,
Beneath the old oak tree.

The dew-drops, on the summer morn,
Sparkle upon the grass;
The village children brush them off
That through the meadows pass.

There are no gems in monarch's crowns
More beautiful than they;
And yet we scarcely notice them,
But tread them off in play.

Poor Robin on the pear-tree sings,
Beside the cottage-door;
The heath-flower fills the air with sweets
Upon the pathless moor.

There are as many lovely things,
As many pleasant tones,
For those who sit by cottage hearths
As those who sit on thrones!

NAMES; WHAT'S IN THEM.

NAMES are as old as man himself. The first man had a name, and the last man will have one also. But the first names were individual names only. Family names, or surnames, are of later origin. Some say that family names only date from the Crusades. There may be some truth in this. That is, they may have begun to be universally used by all ranks and classes about that time. But we find traces of them among the Greeks and Romans, and other ancient nations. Thus the family of the Gracchi—Caius Gracchus and Tiberius Gracchus, the family of the Cæsars, &c., show that great families, possessed of landed property and civil rank and power, distinguished themselves and preserved their genealogy in this manner. And the very laws of the Republic divided the citizens into gentes and familie, or races and families, for the sake of distinction.

In Greece the family names are less perceptible, although we find there also the Heracidae and Eumolpidae, &c. But the great names of Greece, like Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, and Aristotle, come down to us as names of individuals, without any surname attached to them. Whereas, the illustrious Romans, such as Cicero, Virgil, and Cæsar, are known by more names than one, as Marcus Tullius Cicero, Publius Virgilius Maro, Caius Julius Cæsar. Therefore Cicero is sometimes called Tully, and Virgil is sometimes called Maro, and the month of July was named after Cæsar.

Farther back than Greece in the stream of time there are no traces whatever of family names, unless we regard in this light the old Jewish predilection for calling men by the name of some illustrious ancestor, or the names of the father, as in Arabia to this day. David was often called the son of Jesse, and the descendants of David very naturally reminded the world of their origin by calling themselves children of David. The father's name was the substitute for the surname, as James the son of Alphaeus, Simon son of Jonas. But in later times, when Greece and Rome had penetrated with their philosophical, political, and social habits and customs the principal portions of the civilized world, surnames began to be common even among the Jews, as Simon surnamed Peter, Judas surnamed Iecariot; though we are not aware that there is any evidence to prove that these surnames were family names transmitted by descent, but merely additional names for individual distinction. Such hereditary names, however, must have been common enough for some time previous, as in the case of the Macbean family.

It is, however, probably true in the main, that the use of surnames as a universal custom in Europe takes its date from the period of the Crusades, as until that time it seems to have been only local and partial.

All names had, originally, a meaning, and the farther back we go the more meaning they have. The Jewish names are peculiarly expressive: Abraham means the father of many nations; Isaac means laughter, for his mother laughed when she was told that she would have a son at ninety years of age; Jacob means a deceiver, because he cheated his brother out of his birth-right; David means beloved, and the character which he enjoyed of being a man after God's own heart seems like a play upon the meaning of the word; Solomon means peace or peaceable. There was peace in his day. He was a type of the Prince of Peace. Such names look prophetic, or the individuals seem to have been chosen to office in part for the names which they bore. Many have founded on this fact an objection to the truth of the history, because the name was given in youth, before the character and destiny of the individual was realized. But less ancient and less suspicious names than those are sometimes prophetic. Thus Cæsar's name, a family name, means one who has been born by the Cæsarean operation. This was the mode of Julius Cæsar's birth after the death of his mother, and he is the head of the Cæsar family. But his father was a Cæsar as well as himself. The name also seems very expressive of the Roman Imperial Power, which attempted to give birth to a universal reign of peace by cutting with the sword, as if to force out life from a dead subject unable to bear it. Napoleon means the Lion of the Thicket. Three thousand years ago a prophecy said, "The Lion is come up from the thicket, the Destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way." The Lion of the Thicket, therefore, has long been identical with a great conqueror. A modern critic of the sceptical school might infer from this that there was no such man as Napoleon; that the name is imaginary, or assumed after his advent to power.

Rome is a most appropriate and prophetic name for a city. It means strength, physical force; the very force employed by the city both in her political and ecclesiastical government to obtain the ascendancy over the world. She was also called Valentia by the Romans. This was the secret or ineffable name of the city, which no private Roman was permitted to pronounce, lest an enemy should discover it, and employ divination or sorcery against it. Valentia has the same meaning as Rome. It means might and power. What wonder was it that might and power should rule the world. The destiny of Rome is the destiny of her name. Jerusalem, the prophetic name of the Capitol of the Universal Kingdom of Peace, means the habitation of peace. The name of the capital of the Kingdom of Peace, therefore, must be Jerusalem, wheresoever it be placed. The French, or Franks, are Freemen, or Socialists, by name, and they have taken the lead in the furtherance of a system of liberal and equal government in the civilized world. German means the Universal man, and no name can be better appropriated, for Germany represents every species of government and system that can be imagined. It contains an empire, kingdoms, principalities, dukedoms, electorates, republics, and free cities; and its ideas are as multifarious and heterogeneous as its forms of government. It is a miniature of the world. No nation better deserves the name of Alle-man, or All-man, than this; and this had received it long before its destiny was so developed as to render it appropriate. England is the name of the land of the Angles or Angeli, the messengers, or couriers, or travelers or merchants; for merchants are travelers among the nations. This also is very appropriate, and this name belonged to that country long before its destiny could have been anticipated. Ireland is very expressive of wrath and misery; for though the ire is supposed to have been once ier, holy or sacred, it makes little difference, since holy lands are notoriously subject to become lands of curse for a season, though reserved for a splendid deliverance at the end of that ordeal of wrath to which they are mysteriously doomed.

That some names are good and some bad, some fortunate and some unfortunate, has been believed by men in all ages of the world, but superstition has misled men upon this subject as upon a thousand others. Mothers are always more influenced by traditionary notions than fathers, and maternal fear has often refused to impose a name upon a child for no other reason than this, that the last of her kin who bore it was unfortunate, died in youth, came to a violent end, or dragged out a life of painful suffering amid poverty and infirmity. Fathers are not without this superstition, and prosperous names are generally chosen in preference to unfortunate ones. Perhaps it is even from a superstitious desire of combining the luck of a great variety of names, or neutralising the bad luck of one by the good luck of another, that princes and princesses, like the Duchess de Montpensier's infant daughter, are supplied with a score of names, like so many charms against evil planets and wicked spirits, at the baptismal font. But even the popes themselves, who choose their own names, notwithstanding their infallibility, have never been able to distinguish the best from the worst. John was evidently a favorite among the popes for a long time, and yet it was a most unlucky one. There is no greatness attached to it on the Papal throne, but much baseness, and at last deposition in the twenty-third of the list. Twenty-three Johns among the popes, beside Pope Joan! and not a single James, nor even a Peter, though they all profess to be the successors of Peter. What could be the cause of this preference? It was severely punished. With few exceptions, their reigns were very short, only a year or two, and now we are not likely ever to have another, for the last Pope John was deposed more than four hundred years ago. Gregories are lucky on the papal throne. Gregory the Great and Gregory the Seventh may be called the founders of the papacy; and Gregory the thirtieth was the reformer of the calendar, the new style, which goes by the name of the Gregorian Calendar. It is an appropriate name, the shepherd of the flock, without much pretensions. John means the grace of God, and the Pope Johns have been particularly remarkable for the want of that grace.

William seems a remarkable name on the English throne. The founder of the monarchy and aristocracy was William the Conqueror; the founder of the Protestant constitution was William the Third; and William the Fourth, the sailor king, was the leader of modern reform, which is likely to prove as remarkable an epoch as any which has preceded it. No other names among the English sovereigns can boast of a triple celebrity equal to this in marking the epochs of English history.—[Family Herald.]

THE MODEL ACTRESS.

SHE rises very early. Her first thought is to look at the newspaper, and see if her name is mentioned in the criticism of the new piece. Not a word! She dresses very quickly, and takes her breakfast standing, studying her new "part" all the while. At ten, she is in the theater, in a black atmosphere, ruled with long white lines of daylight, pouring down from the different skylights. The whole place is redolent of cobwebs, orange-peel, and the stale smoke of last night's blue-fire. She attends the reading of a new play. She then listens to the "cutting" of the new piece, and proceeds to the rehearsal of it. Her "part" is clipped to two lines: still, she does not murmur, but is secretly thankful it is not taken out altogether. She waits behind the scenes, lingering about the musty corridors till one o'clock, when there is a general rehearsal of the grand new burlesque. The managers, however, does not arrive till two—then the properties are not ready, the daubs of scenes are not set, the stage-manager has "just stepped round the corner," (a delicate figure for the public-house, very popular in theaters,) and the young author is flirting in front with one of the ballet-girls. At last, the rehearsal begins. Each dance is repeated two or three times, the military ones especially; and the author is very proud about his jokes, and will not have them murdered. This makes it four o'clock before the rehearsal is over. The actress rushes up stairs to see about her dress: this is a matter of great importance, and half an hour soon flies before the looking-glass. As she is running out of the theater, she is called back by the musical conductor, "to try over her song quietly by herself." So she leaves the theater almost as the box-keepers are coming into it, too lucky if she is not detained at the door by a loud cry of, "Ladies and gents, the last act, if you please, once more." She gets away, however, before the big chandelier is lighted, astonished to find the sun is shining in the streets.

She runs home, and sinks in an arm-chair quite worn and spiritless. The dinner is cold; she has no appetite; she longs to sleep, but is afraid to lie down. Besides, she has not a moment to lose. She has to get perfect in her new part, to try on her new dress, (she dresses and undresses about ten times a day,) to arrange her hair, sew some ribbons on her cap, and be at the theater again a little before seven.

Then the business of her day commences. She is an empress in the first piece, blazing with mock diamonds, drinking "property" champagne, and giving away millions of tin roubles. She is a saucy maid in the farce, with her gay cap, boxing her mistresses' ears, and being kissed, alternately, by the smart groom, the young Captain, the old Uncle, and the Yorkshire coachman. She is the Fairy Barleysugarina in the last piece, and has to dance, and sing negro songs, and fight a grand sword-combat for ten minutes, and to dress up in hussar, Amazonian, and policeman's clothes; besides being suspended by a rope in the last scene. It is full one o'clock before the performances are over. She has to undress and dress again, and to see the stage-manager before going, probably to be reprimanded for her petticoats not being short enough. She gets home between one and two. It is too late for supper. The beer is flat; the fire is out; and she is too glad to get into bed. She is in a hurry to sleep, and yet cannot. The "bravos" keep ringing in her ears, and the manager's reprimand worries her. She lays awake, thinking of to-morrow, for there is generally a "call" at ten, and she is afraid of not being up, so that sleep comes slowly to her heavy eyelids.

This is the life of the Model Actress in the summer time. It is not pleasant, then; but it is worse in the winter. The hot-house then is changed into an ice-well. The stage, with its numerous side-scenes, traps, and staircases, is one immense collection of draughts, as if they had been put there purposely, like those in a chemist's shop, to benefit the doctors. The little fire in the green-room is blocked up by big men, in low necks and fleshings, just as cold as herself. She shivers in a corner, with an old shawl round her shoulders. She has a cough, probably; and a thin gauze dress, with spangles, is not the best thing to cure it. It rains, perhaps, but she must brave it. She has no shillings to bargain for cabs. The Fairy Barleysugarina thinks herself well off if she has a pair of clogs and an umbrella; and bleat, indeed, if she gets a lift, half-way home, in some Gisel's Brougham.

This is the daily life of the Model Actress throughout the year. She is not married, and it is a blessing for her. How could she nurse a crying child when she got home? How could she attend to a baby at rehearsal, or rock the cradle at the wings? A husband, too, would only be in the way at a theater; and she is never at home. Her lot is bitter enough without any such additional anxieties. Her whole time and thoughts must be devoted to the "house" where she is engaged.

She cannot always call the Sunday her own. She has frequently to attend at the theater "after Divine service." Her only holiday is Passion-week, and then she gets no salary; and the same when the theater is closed, by the caprice of the Mosaic manager, on account of "bad business." Her only chance of existence then, is to "star" at the Grecian Saloon, or, when it comes to the worst, to take the round of the musical public-houses, and collect what she can.

Sometimes she goes into the country, and joins a "circuit" in some far-off county. Her prospects do not brighten with the change. Her salary becomes a chance—in town it was, at least, a certainty. The receipts are generally divided among the company, and the women do not invariably get the largest share. She comes back poorer in purse than ever.

And what is her salary in town? Some twenty to thirty shillings a week; and this again is at the mercy of that despotic tyrant, the stage-manager. It is perilled, also, by the loss of her good looks. Each night's illness, likewise, is deducted on the Saturday. But, somehow, the Model Actress is never fined—she never misses a rehearsal—she never keeps the stage waiting—and, most luckily for her, is rarely ill. She not only lives on her salary, but finds her shoes, stockings, and numerous articles of dress, out of it. Sometimes, too, she supports an old mother. "Impossible! absurd!" cries the reader, but it is true, nevertheless. "Then she falls?" Perhaps she does—but more frequently she doesn't. And if the Actress does fall a victim, shouldn't we rather pity than condemn her? Look to her wants—look to her temptations!—vanity being by no means the weakest among them.

How she lives is a mystery! How she can appear gay, and laugh, in the evening, after the cares and fatigues of the whole day, is a mystery still greater!

How she can go on for years running backward and forward, from morning to night, from night to all but morning, in such a dreary, hopeless cul-de-sac, it is impossible to tell! But it is not altogether hopeless with the Model Actress. Hope is the secret of her existence—it is the talisman that lifts her over the sharp flints and stones of her career. She struggles valiantly, believing in her heart that one day she will be a Mrs. Siddons, or a Mrs. Nisbett. Without this charm, she could not act. She has little sources of pleasure, also, unknown to us. A bouquet thrown to her makes her happy for a week. Two or three little paragraphs of praise in a paper—a smile, a kind word, or a look of encouragement, from Mr. Macready or the manager—two or three little compliments dropt in her ear by some great man about the theater, are enjoyments that she never forgets. And then the applause! Each round is as good as a day in the country to her, and an "encore" puts her in good humor for a week; and a lucky hit in a small part throws such a glorious sunshine over her path, making her future appear so bright, that she has no eyes for the gloom about her. These are the simple enjoyments that frequently turn the REALMS OF DESPAIR into the BOWELS OF BLISS in the dingy scenes of the life of the MODEL ACTRESS.

A DUTCHMAN, up at Schaghticoke, by the name of Kendrick, had a son by the name of Jacob, or Yaupy, as the Dutch usually call it, with whose education he had taken much pains, instructing him in all the rudiments of good breeding, &c., until he became satisfied that his boy Yaupy was a perfect pattern of obedience and good manners; and he took every occasion to show off Yaupy's accomplishments, and sound his praise among his neighbors. He said that "Yaupy had more larnin' den most all the boys in de school; he can read all trough despelling-pook, and spell all trough all reading-pooks, and could tell all de pictures in de pig Bible."

Kendrick was visited one day by his dominie, who called to inquire into the state of his moral and religious affairs, and to give instruction to his family. Kendrick, thinking it a good opportunity to show off his paragon of a son, and wishing at the same time to be kind and civil to his dominie, called out to his boy in an adjoining room:

"Yaupy, you go down in de cellar and draw de tominie a bitcher of citer; but—"

"Go to the devil, father," said Yaupy, "and draw the cider yourself; you know where it is as well as I do."

This was rather a stumper to poor Kendrick; but, being unwilling that his dominie should go away with an unfavorable impression of Yaupy's manners, undertook to apologize for him.

"Tominie," said he, "dat is von of de pest little poy I ever seed in my life, but he has got a very pad cold now!"—[Sunday Atlas.]

THE majority of readers seem to think that nothing can be more easy or pleasant than to edit a paper; but of all the different employments by which men make their bread and butter, there is none, we firmly believe, that so taxes the mind, time, temper, and flesh, as that of editing a paper. There is none that requires a nicer tact, a sounder judgment, a more constant application, a quicker wit, or a kinder heart. Whoever succeeds tolerably well as an editor, is something more than an ordinary mad, let his cotemporaries say or think of him as they will.

THERE is a very singular circumstance in Shelby county, Texas, of a well that has been burning about twelve months, at the former residence of Judge Lusk. It does not give a very agreeable feeling to the visitor; for it is neither sublime nor beautiful; but from the deep rumbling noise that is heard—the sulphurous smell, and the dark cloud of smoke that is continually rising, a beholder is forcibly convinced that there is actually fire and brimstone in the subterranean regions.

A MAN with an enormous large mouth, called on a dentist to get a tooth drawn. After the dentist had prepared his instrument, and was about to commence operations, the man of mouth began to strain and stretch his mouth till he got it to a most frightful extent. "Stay, sir," said the dentist, "don't trouble yourself to stretch your mouth any wider, for I intend to stand on the outside."

"I WONDER what makes my eyes so weak?" said a loafer to a gentleman. "Why, they are in a weak place," replied the latter.

MR. ETHAN SPIKE'S FIRST ICE CREAM IN PORTLAND.—I puts my hands into my pockets, an' walks into a shop kinder careless, and says to a chap standin' behind the counter, "Do you keep any ice creams here?" "Yes, sir," says he, "how much'll you have?" I considered a minit, says I, "A pint, sir." The young feller's face swelled out—"Did you say a pint, sir?" "Sartin," says I; "but p'rhaps you don't retail, so I don't mind takin' a quart." Wall, the feller handed me the stuff as perlit as could be. Wall, I tasted a mouthful, an' found it cool as the north side o' Bethel hill in January. I'd half a mind to spit it out, but, jest then I seed the confectioner chap grinnin', which riz my spunk. Gall smash it all, thinks I, I'll not let that white-liver'd monkey think I'm afeard—I'll eat the plaguey stuff if it freezes my inards. I tell yer what, I'd rather skinn'd a bear or whipp'd a wild cat, but I went it. I eat the whole in about a minit. Wall, in about a quarter of an hour I began to feel kinder gripy, an' kept on feelin' no better very fast, till at last, the chap as gin me the cream, who had been lookin' on snickerin', says he to me, "Mister," says he, "what ails yer?" "Ails me!" says I, "that ere stuff o' your'n is freezin' up my daylight," says I. "You eat too much," says he. "I tell yer I didn't!" screamed I, "I know what's a nuff and what's too much without askin' you, an' if you don't leave off snickerin' I'll spile your face." He cottoned right down, an' said he didn't mean any hurt, an' asked me if I hadn't better take some gin. So I took a purty good horn, an' left. "I haint," said Mr. Spike, in conclusion, "I haint bin to Portland since, but if I live to be as old as Mathusalem, I shall never forget that all-fired ice cream."—[Boston Messenger.

A DRUNKARD'S SOLILOQUY.—"It would be a comfortable thing if I knowed just where I was bound for. Up street's got mixed with down street, and there's no such thing as cross-streets at all. The moon's cross-eyed, and keeps winkin' and blinkin' as if she had her eyes full of Macaboy. Now, what am I to do? If I stand still there's a very pleasant chance of going to sleep standing. If I go to stir, hang me if I know which way I am travelin'."

THERE are cares and troubles enough in the married state, without the aggravation of bad temper.

GRAND MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,

NO. 127 CHAMBER-STREET NEW-YORK.
FOR the Treatment of all Diseases in Men,
Women and Children; whether Acute or Chronic; whether Local or General—whether Scrofulous, Syphilitic, or Epidemic—or all Maladies belonging to the line of Medicine and Surgery.

I. Cases of all kinds will be examined every day in the week from 7 o'clock A. M. till 7 P. M. Sundays excepted.

II. No CHARGE made for EXAMINATIONS, or for our OPINION in any case.

III. Patients will find our examinations unlike those of any others which they have ever known or heard, and if we do not tell them more about their case, without their telling us any history of their disease, than they have ever known or learned before by their own observation, or that of any of their Doctors, we advise them not to submit to our treatment.

IV. All that Class of Diseases in which delicate and sensitive persons are exposed, by most Doctors, to Surgical and bloody operations, and to means and treatment which burn and torture, and confine the patient to the sick bed, are treated at this office without pain, exposure or confinement.

V. Patients will be convinced beyond all doubt, by our Examinations and Treatment, that their diseases in most, and the worst cases, originated in their childhood, or were inherited from their parents, or arose from a great variety of causes, which neither they nor their doctors ever imagined—and though they may seem to have a dozen different diseases, that in nearly every case they all spring from one root or cause, and will be driven out together by very simple means.

VI. Those Diseases of certain parts of the human system, which are almost universally treated in the first state with Balsam of Copaiba, Capsules, Cubes; by Injections of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead Water—Yellow or Black washes; with Blue or Mercurial and other Ointments; with Bougies, Catheters or Syringes—or in the second state, with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate for Corrosive Sublimates; with Hydriodate of Potash, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like slops—we say before heaven and earth, that by such treatment and such means, as are generally used, we know and can demonstrate, that these diseases have never been and can never be healed. They deceive the patient—they drive the disease into the system, and to other and more important parts—they produce Strictures, Callouses, Piles, Abscesses, Ulcers, Fistulas, Catarrhs, Dropsies, Rheumatic pains, Diseases of the Bones, of the Liver, Kidneys, Lungs, Throat and whole system; and either render the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of these Quackish, Ruinous and Swindling remedies, we promise to every curable case we treat, a permanent and radical CURE FOR LIFE by very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell—which neither purges or vomits—nor hinders from business—nor exposes the patient in any way whatever, and which is only to be taken every other night. We can furnish patients with References to Terrible Cases which have been carried out of the Broadway Hospitals as incurable, to die, whom we have raised from the gates of the grave, after all other means have been used in vain.

VII. Knowing, as we do, that most Medicines in the hands of Apothecaries and Druggists are adulterated, and for various other reasons are not to be relied on; we have, therefore established a CHEMICAL LABORATORY, where we manufacture all our Medicines—for this reason we can warrant that our medicines shall do all that we promise in every case.

VIII. In every case in which we promise a cure, if we fail to effect this, the money paid for medicine will be returned.

To all who wish we will furnish names and residence of patients in the city and country, whom we have treated for all forms of disease, who will give them all the facts in their case—the nature, extent, and duration of their sickness, and the success of our treatment.

We therefore invite all sufferers however afflicted, or however hopeless their case may appear, to give us a trial—put our knowledge to the test in an Examination of their case—it will cost them nothing—and they will find beyond doubt that ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which are called Consumption, Spinal disease, Cancer in the Womb, or elsewhere, &c., &c., are totally mistaken—there being nothing of the kind. This we have demonstrated in hundreds of cases.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

All DR. BEACH'S BOOKS AND MEDICINES for sale at this office. JAMES McALLISTER & Co. Proprietors, 3m235 No. 127 Chambers-st. New-York.

NO CURE NO PAY.

DR. CULLEN'S Indian Vegetable Remedy, warranted to cure or the money returned. This medicine is prepared from an Indian receipt obtained from one of them in the Far West. Those who have been familiar with the Indians, know that they can and do cure certain diseases without the knowledge of Mercury or Balsam. The afflicted have now an opportunity of being cured without the danger of Mercury, or the unpleasant use of Balsam. This medicine is pleasant to the taste, and leaves no smell on the breath.

Original Poetry.

I CALL TO THEE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY ALLIE VERNON.

By all the vows that thou hast ever breathed,
By all our joyous and most happy hours,
By Love's pure bond that once for us was wreathed
With brightsome gems and rich and fragrant flow'rs,

I call to thee.

By all our dreams, our wild and beauteous dreams,
By all our burning kisses, fond and true;
By the remembrance of Hope's glowing beams,
That o'er our early days a radiance threw,
I call to thee.

By all the cares we've borne—by all our fears,
By all our visions of Futurity;
By all our woes and joys—our smiles and tears,
By all the passion thou hast sworn to me,
I call to thee.

By all thy hopes of mercy upon high,
By all thy hopes of peace and rest below,
And by that strange mysterious spirit-tie
That binds our hearts wherever ye may go,
I call to thee.

TO C.....

"Weeping may endure for a night, but Joy cometh in the morning."

Though thy path in life looks dreary,
Do not harbor sorrow;
Though thy drooping soul is weary,
Hope for a happier morrow;
Though the storm-clouds darkly lower,
Look forward still for a brighter hour.

The heaviest storm must pass away,
The sky grow more serene,
And lovelier then is the sun's bright ray,
For the clouds that have passed between:
When past the gloom of Sorrow's night,
Joy's radiant beams will shine more bright.

But should life's roses perish,
Hope's visions fade away,
Should the dreams you fondly cherish,
Fade like the evening ray,
Still faith can look beyond the tomb,
Where Affection's flowers live in changeless bloom.

MARY.

LINES.

"The Memory of the Past is a Sigh."

Like the sweet melody which faintly lingers
Upon the wind-harps strings at close of day,
When gently touch'd by evening's dewy fingers,
It breathes a low and melancholy lay—

So thy calm voice of sympathy me seemeth—
And when its magic spell around me cast,
My spirit in its cloister'd silence dreameth,
And vaguely blends the Future with the Past.
But vain such dreams! for pain my bosom thrilleth,
And mournful memories around me move—
E'en friendship's alchemy no balm distilleth
To soothe the irremediable wound of love!

Oh! well thou know'st this truth; for thou hast taken
The draught which leaves such bitterness behind;
Thou e'en in life's glad spring hast idly wasted
Feeling's sweet perfume on the unconscious wind.
Alas! alas! Passion to soon exhaileth
The early freshness of the heart's young flowers;
We water'd them with tears, but nought availeth,
They wither on, through all life's later hours.

HYMN TO THE STARS.

O! THERE ye glitter, far and wide,
High in the shaded vault of Heaven;
As moonbeams sparkle in the tide,
When by a gentle zephyr driven;
And there ye glide, from time to time,
Thro' space unmeasured in the skies,
Revolving in your course sublime,
Like jewels of resplendent dyes.
Do happy spirits unconfined,
In bands exulting visit ye?
They only can your boundaries find,
And traverse their immensity:
Could I on eagle's pinions soar
Unto your palest sphere of light,
Still myriads would ascend before,
In distant splendor on my sight.
What order, and what concord too,
In ye, did your Creator show;
Tho' from this earth's degenerate view,
Ye all in mix'd confusion glow!
As ye each other's rays excel
In brighter beams of ambient light,
So will the blest in glory dwell,
Array'd in robes divinely bright;
But in their crowns of happiness,
Will more resplendent gems appear,
Than ye, that grace the dark abyss
From night to night—from year to year.

French Novelle.

A LION IN LOVE.*

BY FREDERIC SOULIE.

CHAPTER V.

It would have been useless to ask Leonce why he felt happy; he would have been unable to answer the question; for this emotion was as new to him as to Lise, and he thought neither of analysing nor resisting it. He felt happy as he was, he looked upon everything with an indulgent eye, and if he now and then perceived a want of refinement in the manner of those around him, he found in them a degree of sincerity which alarmed him,—those good people seemed to enjoy themselves heartily.

He endeavored to keep away from the room where Lise was; but, spite of himself, he was attracted toward it, and glanced his eye between two men who were standing in the door.

Lise was dancing, but she was not thinking of the figures; she either kept her eyes down-cast, or cast around the room a quick and furtive glance.

Whom could she be seeking?

Leonce was afraid that it might not be himself; but when he perceived that since he had taken his station at the door, she seemed no longer in search of any one, he experienced a sensation of rapture so exquisite, that he, in turn, was ashamed at the keenness of his emotion.

This alarm could not be allied to uncertainty in the heart of Léonce, as it was in that of Lise; he called himself to account for what he experienced, and blushed for himself.

'Come, come,' said he to himself 'I am playing the child and making a fool of myself. Their adulterated wines have got into my head; I'm drunk, the devil take me if I'm not; it can't be otherwise.'

And to satisfy himself that he was not a man to be overcome by the feelings of a boy, he set about watching Lise.

Lise was dancing with a handsome young man, as handsome as the lion himself; remarkable for his elegant simplicity of dress, and who was speaking to his partner with perfect ease, on subjects that were doubtless sufficiently interesting for her to listen to with attention, and well enough expressed to elicit from her some marks of assent.

At sight of this, a total revolution took place in the lion's heart; he drew a comparison between himself and some one else; for instance, with a dealer in cotton goods, and he was fain to confess that nothing insured his superiority over such a man.

* Continued from page —.

Léonce experienced a much more cruel disappointment, when he saw Lise's face so tranquil and so happy. Poor child! all her happiness consisted in having caught Léonce's eye fixed on her, and in experiencing therefore, a degree of joy and pride and rapture that no longer alarmed her, since he was not at her side, and since the tone of his voice no longer made her timid.

A strange doubt penetrated the heart of Stern: 'What if this artless being should turn out to be a mere coquette of the counter?'

'Ah, really, you are too ambitious, my beauty; you are pretty, but your views are too extravagant!'

As, with such thoughts in his mind, he looked at Lise, his face assumed an expression of arrogance and disdain, and the sweet creature having glanced at him at that moment, was so astonished at seeing him gaze upon her thus, that she turned pale, and her eyes, riveted on his, seemed to say:

'What is the matter? what have I done to you?'

And thereupon she no longer listened to her partner, and made three blunders in dancing.

Léonce saw all this, and wished to ascertain whether she was not merely acting a part. He would not let it be said that a man like himself was the dupe of a designing flirt.

Accordingly, when the dance was over, he assumed his most natural air, the most indifferent and most lion-like, and, coming up to Lise and her mother, he said to Madame Laloin, but without looking at Lise:

'I have many apologies to make for my neglect, madam. As I was returning home, I found in my carriage this locket and hair-chain; they doubtless belong to some one of your guests, and I had forgotten to return them to you.'

At the words 'some one of your guests,' Lise looked at Léonce, as if to say: 'Did you not know they were mine?'

Madame Laloin thanked Léonce, and said to Lise:

'You see I was right, when I said that the marquis would bring them back to you.'

'Ah, they belong to mademoiselle?' said Léonce, coldly, handing the trinket with a supercilious air.

'Yes, sir,' said Lise, extending her hand to receive it, and looking at Léonce, as much as to say: 'Have I my right senses?'

Léonce handed it to her with the tips of his fingers.

'Give it to me,' said her mother, 'and let me fasten it round your neck.'

'Not just now, mamma,' said Lise, with a degree of impatience, which she could hardly repress.

She wrapped it in her handkerchief, which she strained in her clasped hand.

Lise was pale, her hands trembled.

Léonce was satisfied with his experiment, and resumed with an affectation of politeness:

'Mademoiselle Lise has not, I hope, forgotten that she promised to be my partner in the first gallop?'

'I know not,' answered Lise, painfully, 'if mamma has no objection—'

'With the Marquis? certainly not,' said Madame Laloin.

The band struck up the first bars of a galopade.

Lise gave her hand to Léonce; they rose and walked round the room, while the crowd was clearing the way for the dancers.

'Why,' said Stern to her, 'did you refuse to put on your pretty chain and locket?'

'Oh, pretty!' said she with an effort, 'you do not mean what you say; but I think a great deal of it.'

'It is a souvenir, I suppose?'

'Ah, yes!' answered she, with uplifted eyes; 'it is an excellent souvenir!'

'And the motto inscribed on it reminds you of it, no doubt?'

'Yes, Monsieur le Marquis,' replied Lise, with a sweet dignity.

'Have the will, and you have the power, says that motto.'

'Yes, sir, we can do all we are resolved to do,' replied Lise with a sigh she was unable totally to repress.

'It requires great confidence in the strength of one's resolution to adopt such a motto,' added Léonce.

'Thus far, that confidence has never betrayed me, and I trust it never will,' replied Lise with extreme emotion.

'Do you stand in need of it?'

'We do not dance, sir,' said Lise.

Léonce entwined one arm round the waist of the beautiful girl, and took hold of the hand with which she still clasped her talisman.

Thus they danced together, heartedly gazing on her, she with downcast eyes and serious countenance.

On a sudden, a tear rose to Lise's eye, trembled on its lashes, and trickled slowly down her cheek. Léonce experienced a thrill of pain, and, leading her into an adjoining room in which were some card tables, he said to her:

'I have offended you, mademoiselle?'

'No, sir, no.'

'But why then are you in tears?'

'I am not in tears, sir.'

'Hear me, mademoiselle,' cried Léonce in a tone of sincere frankness; 'I know not what I may have said or done to wound you, but if such, unfortunately, has been the case, I beg your pardon, and protest that any intention of the kind was far from my heart.'

'Lise looked at him attentively, and answered him with a sad smile:

'Oh, sir, I beg of you, pay no attention to what I say or do. The truth is, that when a child, I was always so feeble and delicate, that all my faults were permitted to remain uncorrected; and among them is to be found a degree of sensibility which is very foolish, very ridiculous.'

'But in what way have I wounded this sensibility?'

'Do not inquire, sir; let us proceed with our dancing; I am not angry with you for it. I assure you I am not,' added she with a nervous motion and an expression of pain.

They ended their galop, and Léonce once more left Lise by the side of her mother.

Mr. Tirlot almost immediately afterwards came forward to claim the hand of Lise; but she said, with a tone of gentle entreaty:

'Not just now, Mr. Tirlot; I am quite unwell. I am very nervous; I suffer greatly; I am very cold.'

Stern looked at her; she was pale, and her lips trembled with a convulsive vibration.

Her mother, at sight of this, appeared quite alarmed, and whispered to her:

'Come, come with me, my darling.'

'Yes, mamma,' said she, falteringly.

And she slowly left the room, leaning upon her mother's arm.

'But what is the matter with her?' asked Léonce of Mr. Tirlot.

'Oh, good Lord!' said the latter in a tone of sincere pity, 'the old complaint! Those terrible palpitations of the heart; the least fatigue is injurious to her, and a violent emotion would be enough to kill her.'

'Kill her!' was the mental response of Léonce, 'and I who can say? Perhaps when I looked upon her so disdainfully, when I so stupidly returned that trinket which I knew could belong to no one but herself, and which she never asked for, knowing that it was in my possession; perhaps I cruelly hurt the delicate feelings of a heart that was gaily enjoying her girlish triumphs. Ah! poor, poor child! If I were only sure that it is so. My stupidity and brutality have been too shameful!'

Léonce was angry with himself. It might be all pleasant enough to trifle with the vanity of some silly prude of a shop-girl, but to unnecessarily wound the tender sensibilities of a beautiful being, whose sincerity, ingenuousness and worth were sufficiently attested by the affection of those who surrounded her; it was odious! Léonce confessed that he was guilty, inhuman, brutal; he was in a rage with himself. It was, therefore, with unfeigned interest, that he remained in company with several others, watching at the door of the room in which Lise had taken refuge with her mother.

The young girl presently returned, still pale indeed, but calm and serene:

She encountered the agitated looks of Léonce, and gently placing one hand upon her bosom, she pointed out to Léonce the golden trinket, which she now wore, and her gesture implied: 'We can, what we resolve.'

The smile that accompanied this action was so full of resignation and sweetness that Léonce was deeply affected by it.

She had suffered—greatly suffered, and doubtless both for him, and through him.

Stern could have wished to entreat her forgiveness, on his bended knee and with a prostrate heart, that she might be sensible of the humiliation and the grief he felt for having afflicted her.

Lise was seated by her mother's side, and, as she was to dance no more that evening, Léonce had no pretext for approaching her for her sake alone. He was ill at ease. The crowd annoyed him; not that he looked upon them as a collection of droll caricatures, in which light he probably would have viewed them the day before, but they seemed a barrier to the feelings of his heart. At that moment, he would have been glad to be able to cry aloud, and would willingly have given vent to tears.

This feeling was so intense that he was on the point of withdrawing.

But to go, without offering his apologies and the tribute of his repentance to the feeble and delicate creature, of whose sufferings he had been the cause, was out of the question. Advancing toward Mrs. Laloin, and speaking with a serious air:

'Madam,' said he, 'had I been merely an invited guest, I might have allowed myself to withdraw without paying you my respects; but I was a witness on the part of Prosper, and I beg you to accept my thanks for having admitted into your family a worthy man, whom I might almost call a relation of my own.'

'I thank you, sir,' said Mrs. Laloin, greatly moved, while Lise kept looking at Léonce with a sweet rapture. 'I thank you, for it can only be your regard for Prosper which has prompted you to make use of language so flattering to humble people like ourselves.'

'I speak sincerely, madam,' said Léonce, 'and I entreat you to believe in the heartfelt respect I entertain for yourself as well as every member of your family.'

So saying, he turned toward Lise, and bowed profoundly, but without lifting his eyes to hers; he could not, therefore, perceive the radiant look that illumined her countenance, but he noticed an involuntary motion of her hand, as if she had been on the point of taking his, to thank him.

He then withdrew, without trusting himself with a look at Lise, it was not until he had reached the opposite end of the room, that he turned toward her. Her hand was resting upon her bosom, and she was looking at him, he fixed his eyes on hers. Lise did not turn away her gaze; for a long time they thus looked at one another, both forgetting where they were, both feeling as if they could read each other's hearts. Mrs. Laloin spoke to her daughter, Lise seemed to awake from a dream; but before she turned to reply to her mother, a gentle motion of her head expressed to Léonce:

'Farewell!' and 'thank you!'

Away went the lion; he was out of his senses, perfectly crazy; he tried to laugh at himself, but could not succeed.

The image of Lise, so candid and so pure, rose incessantly before him, exclaiming:

'Infatuated man! why treat me as you have treated me? Why sneer at all that you have found good, holy and exquisite in my nature, as you have sneered at my joy?'

CHAPTER VI.

NEVER was man more at a loss than Stern to find some suitable pretext for seeing Lise again. In the language he had addressed to Mrs. Laloin, he had taken, as it were, final leave of a family, which formed no part of his society, and with which it was impossible for him to keep up an intercourse without exciting its surprise. Strictly speaking, he could pay them a visit of etiquette, but that was the utmost he could pretend to. It is true, he thought of meeting Lise at church, but in an age so little remarkable for piety as ours, it is not very surprising that a man like Leonce should rather wish to be excused from such a profanation.

He might meet Lise at Prosper's; but going to Prosper's house was just as bad as calling at Mr. Laloin's.

However, during several days, and without coming to any settled conclusion as to the nature of his hopes, Leonce broke through all his habits of life—he took a walk in the garden of the Tuileries.

'It is the usual walk of the Parisian citizen,' said he to himself, and he thought it just likely that he might there meet Lise.

That same evening, he went to three or four of the minor theaters, which, as he fancied, must be the favorite resort of the shopkeepers of the Rue St. Denis; but all he gained by it was the bore of the thing. It was the season for the exhibition of paintings, there he met all the world, except Lise.

'Really,' said he to himself, 'this is mere folly. What are my hopes? I have none, and I don't want to have any.'

He repeated this to himself day after day, and every day his yearning desire to behold Lise became more intense; when one morning, (it was not quite ten o'clock, but he was already up and dressed; for on that day he was to go to a stupendous breakfast at Marly, to be followed by the decision of a most eccentric wager, the whole to conclude with a crashing supper and furious play,) his valet handed him a card. It was Prosper's.

'Prosper!' exclaimed Stern; 'let him come in—show him up.'

But, Monsieur le Count,—I told him you were out!

'Out!' cries Stern in a rage; 'how dare you to take such liberties with my friends? who told you to say I was out?'

'Why, Monsieur le Count, I thought—'

Stern was raving mad.

'Stupid fool!' cried he.

'But the gentleman can hardly have reached the foot of the staircase.'

'Go after him; beg him to come back;—run!—fly!'

No sooner was the servant gone than Stern was conscious of his excitement. In fact, his hands trembled, and he experienced a suffocating sensation. He found time to recover himself while his valet was running after Prosper, and compelling him, in a measure, to return; Leonce could, therefore, accost him with perfect calmness.

'I beg your pardon, my dear Prosper,' said Stern to him, 'if I have made you return; but I wished you to know that it was not by my orders that you were told that I was not at home to you.'

'Ah, Monsieur le Marquis, it is I who regret having disturbed you.'

'Had you really disturbed me, Prosper, I should have told you so, without ceremony; but hearing that I was not at home, you might have thought that I was unwilling to see you, which certainly is not the case.'

He then added, laughingly:

'We are not quite so important as we are said to be, or as we appear, thanks to the conduct of our servant. But take a seat, Prosper.'

'Thank you, Monsieur le Marquis;—the fault was partly mine, for I was not very pressing in my inquiries. I am paying some wedding visits with my wife. She is below, in the carriage with my mother-in-law and Lise, and I have but little time to spare. We are to meet a party at the Railroad Depot, to go to St. Germain on a pleasure excursion.'

'Ah!' said Stern, 'are the ladies below? It would have been kind in them had they done me the honor to walk up.'

'Ah, Monsieur le Marquis!' cried Prosper.

This exclamation clearly implied: 'They dared not, because you are a nobleman; and they ought not, because you are single, and have a reputation for gallantry.'

'Nonsense!' replied Stern; 'do present my respects to them, will you? But, now I think of it, I was just going out; I'll step down to their carriage;—come along!'

And without waiting for Prosper's answer, he took his hat, and went down. His carriage was under the arching; and when Stern made his appearance, his coachman set his horses a prancing, at the same time crying out to the driver of Prosper's hackney coach to clear the way. At the window of this coach, appeared an angel face, intently gazing upon Stern's splendid carriage. At sight of Stern who, followed by Prosper, was advancing towards it, the face drew back. It was Lise. Leonce approached, caused the coach door to be opened for him, and, standing on the steps, he bowed to Mrs. Laloin, to Prosper's wife, and to Lise, who occupied the back seat, while Mr. Laloin and Mr. Tirlot, the groomsmen, were seated opposite them. The presence of this young man, in the midst of Prosper's family, irritated Stern: He was a suitor, most probably. However, Leonce was as self-possessed as possible, while he addressed Mrs. Laloin:

'I was unwilling, madam, to lose the opportunity of repeating my thanks to you for Prosper's happiness; and, had I not been deterred by the fear of being importunate, I should have called on you to offer my father's acknowledgments.'

'Your father's?' said Mr. Laloin.

'Yes, sir,' replied Stern; 'it was my father whom I represented at Prosper's wedding, and it was my duty to render him an account of the mission with which he had charged me. I spoke to him of the honorable alliance which his godson had contracted, and he replied by desiring me to thank you in his name.'

There was not a solitary word of truth in this little statement; but it was expressed with such gracefulness of manner, that the hearts of Mr. and Mrs. Laloin were swelled within them. In the meantime Léonce had scarcely dared to look at Lise; he had not ventured to speak to her. Having nothing further to add, he was about to retire, saying:

'I know that you have many visits to pay, and I must, therefore, take my leave.'

'Oh, not we, but Prosper and his wife; and we have accompanied them, because it would have been a loss of too much time had he been obliged to come back for us in St. Denis-street.'

'And you are going to remain in this carriage, during two long hours, crowded as you are!' said Stern, struck with a luminous idea. 'Ah! Prosper shows a want of consideration for you, ladies. Really, if I might presume, I would advise Mr. and Mrs. Laloin to walk up to my rooms. Prosper might call for you: it is but a five minutes walk from here to the railroad.'

Mr. Laloin and his wife at first declined, but with a degree of constraint that clearly proved their readiness to accept the offer from any one but a Marquis of Stern. Luckily, Mrs. Laloin, despite her forty-four years of age, had her share of female curiosity: she was the first to accede to the request, Mr. Laloin alighted; so did Mrs. Laloin; but neither Lise nor Mr. Tirlot moved a step. This was not what Stern was after.

'And Mademoiselle Lise?' said he.

'Oh!' replied she with a somewhat malicious smile, 'now we have plenty of room.'

'And you, sir?' said Mrs. Laloin, speaking to the groomsmen. 'I?' said the latter with a sulky air, 'I was not asked.'

The idle humor of this person availed Stern much more than the exercise of his own skill. Mrs. Laloin reflected that, while Prosper and his wife would be paying a visit, Lise and Mr. Tirlot would be left alone in the coach. Of course she knew her daughter, and the groomsmen too, well enough to feel perfectly safe in the event of such a contingency; but it struck her that he might have had an eye to that same event, and, like a prudent mother, she was unwilling that he should have taken this advantage without her consent; she therefore said to Lise, in a tone, the dryness of which was intended rather for Mr. Tirlot than her daughter:

'Come down, Lise.'

Lise obeyed with a little pout of displeasure, apparently, but in reality with a sweet rapture at heart, for she was far more anxious than her mother to enter the dwelling of the handsome marquis,—the fearful lair of the proud lion.

An Oriental Tale.

THE SERPENT-CHARMER OF CASHMERE.

A Tale of Hindoostan.

BY FANNY E. LACY.

"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."
Romans, chap. xii, verse 21.

THE soft mists of early dawn were rolling gradually, like a draped curtain, from the gigantic summits of the Indian Caucasus—that vast mountainous chain whose snow-crowned heights are as a magnificent frame-work to one of the loveliest pictures of God's creation in Nature's architecture—the enchanting valley of Cashmere. Already was the rising sun mirrored in the numerous rivulets, that like little paths of silver intersected the luxuriant verdure of the smiling plains, or as occasionally broken into natural cascades, scattering bright showers like fairy gems over water-loving lotus-flowers of rich and varied bloom. Beautifully were these objects of sun-light and florid loveliness here and there diversified by the long dark shadows of stately trees peculiar to oriental vegetation, as the broad-leaved mango, the graceful seringat, and picturesque cotton-tree, twined their luscious fruit and perfumed blossoms, with the groves consecrated to idolatrous worship, and receptacles of many a pagan shrine. And these are, also, the umbrageous resorts of the innumerable gay-plumaged natives of the genial clime. Here the clamorous paraquette sways itself in restless motion, and the magnificent cockatoo rears his gilded crest; wild peacocks proudly display the dazzling splendor of their iris-shaded trains in the glowing sunshine, and little exquisitely-tinted lorries flash among the rustling verdure as though in emulative beauty; while myriads of glittering insects flit past, to mingle in the bright joyous confusion like sparks of many-colored fires, and the gorgeous broad-winged butterfly of the East sports among the varied flowers, as though their blooming tints were rising with their breathing incense to the fair sky above them. Here also behold, in its peerless majestic beauty, the wondrous tree, type of its great Creator, extending far and wide its beneficent universal shelter of ever-verdant, self-producing, continuous arcades, lengthening vistas of hope and joy, bounty never ending, and life eternal. Hail to thee, fair pride of the East, glory of Nature, and emblem of God's unfailing mercies, all hail to thee, glorious banyan!* Though now but the receptacle of insensate idols and pagan worshippers, though but too oft the scene of superstitious rites and self-sought penance, oft art thou the haunt of the mildly-meditative and pious in intent, and powerful is thy silent eloquence, when uniting all men as brethren beneath that universal, never-failing shelter—the favor of the one only God of all creation.

It was at the delightful and invigorating hour already described that the beautiful valley of Cashmere, so justly designated the "Paradise of India," was contemplated in much of congenial spirit by one whom lowly state and long familiarity with the many charming objects indigenous to the locality and clime might have caused to behold them with indifference; but Cosron, while deficient in the cultivation of powers that might have enabled him to descend upon the surrounding objects with the eloquence of erudition, was yet fully instructed by the sensibilities of Nature

* So many experienced and intelligent travelers have favored the public with accounts of this wonderful and delightful tree, that further detail may, perhaps, be deemed superfluous. Having, however, been thus alluded to, it seems to demand more particular mention, for which we beg to refer to "Miller's Geographical History" nearly as follows:—"The Banyan Tree, or Traveler's Friend, is found in all parts of India, and seems to be peculiar to the province of Bengal. It well merits description. The principal body grows to a great bulk, some of its branches springing horizontally from the trunk; from these, small twigs, shooting downwards perpendicularly and taking root, form other bodies, which, like pillars, support the arms from which they sprang; thus one tree produces twenty or thirty bodies, covering a space of ground sufficient to shelter a regiment. Neither this or any other of the Indian trees are divested of their leaves at any season of the year, and it is beneath these trees, but particularly the wondrous banyan, that the Brahmans place their images of worship."

to appreciate her charms as they deserved; and to prove the heart not less eloquent for the silence of the lips. That the heart of our simple Cashmerian peasant was eloquent in a right spirit will, we trust, notwithstanding its trials and conflicts in store, ultimately become manifest. He had just stepped from the threshold of his humble tenement of bamboo and palm leaves, and as a pious Hindoo proceeded to perform his ablutions in one of the consecrated streams. While he is thus devoutly occupied, therefore, we will proceed to introduce him more particularly. Cosron was of the tribe recognized as the soodars, or laborers,* and according to the custom of the Hindoos, pursued the occupation of his forefathers, who had all in succession been humble gopas (herdsmen) of the valley. He had, also, for some time past, taken delight in a practice much resorted to by those of lowly grade in many parts of India, the occasion of which, profitable to the individual, and imperative in a general sense, seems to be one of the most frightful drawbacks on the many luxuries of a tropical climate: it will be at once perceived that we allude to the variety and plentitude of disgusting and dangerous reptiles so frequently encountered; proving literally, as well as metaphorically, how the serpent still glides among the flowers of this life's fairest Eden. Cosron, then, was what in India is known as a serpent-charmer,† and by the well-chosen and judiciously-employed music of his rustic pipe, could at any time excite the reptile to the display of its dancing-like evolutions, that secured the beholder thereof from danger. So expert had he become in this exhibition of his dominion over the venomous tribe as to have acquired a reputation considerably exalting him above all others of this strange but too oft-required calling, even in the most guarded and costly dwellings; and if Cosron found it productive of gain, his popularity in this respect rendered it equally gratifying to his ambition. Thus for some time had he prospered when, suddenly, one Daara, an individual of his own caste and calling, appeared as competitor for this singularly-won distinction; for Daara was no less a wondrous serpent-charmer, and would roam proudly through the towns and villages with nearly a dozen of these terrible captives of his skill wreathing their glittering spotted folds about his person in disgusting sinuosity and terrific beauty.

Thus had Cosron frequently exhibited before him, while others had been content to convey their dangerous property in the usual covered baskets; for none had presumed to compete with Cosron, the wondrous serpent-charmer of Cashmere. But now this Daara had come among them, and the great serpent exhibitions of Cosron were of course no longer a novelty; no longer did he overhear whispered the flattering suggestion that he certainly must be familiar with some debta (devil,) and no doubt could subdue the world if he chose to take the trouble. He was now no more than any other serpent-charmer—at all events he was only a soodar (they had none thought of this circumstance before, which is the same under all reverses of fortune, I believe.) From all this it was evident that greatest of all calamities to a Hindoo—namely, loss of caste, had certainly lost much of his consequence, which in some parts of the world might be considered nearly as great a misfortune; he felt, therefore, duly mortified by his rival's success; he became uneasy—unhappy—py—I am afraid I must add—sinful; for Cosron was a pious Hindoo, and though an idolater, sedulous in his puja (worship,) and faithful in all it had been permitted him to know: furthermore, his heart was good, his disposition kind and gentle. Both now were sorely tried; for he thought of Daara, the intruder on the wide field of his triumphs, the robber of his justly-acquired fame; and they were evil thoughts, and he wished evil wishes towards his rival, as revealing in wild imaginings of terrible things that might happen should his vast collection of serpents—Alas! poor irritated Cosron, serpents more formidable than any thou had yet encountered, were instilling their destructive poison, spite of the harmony of thy better nature! But the competition did not at last rest wholly with the principal actors therein; partisans were aroused for each, and though Daara unquestionably stood conspicuous for some extraordinary and novel feats, and his control over the gliding monsters in their terrible beauty demanded unqualified applause; some there were who, reviewing the former skill and courage so often evinced by Cosron, caused memory to re-echo the sweet magic of those strains that had drawn forth the lurking peril in their dwellings to, perchance, save some dear and precious life. Thus the claims of the rival serpent-charmers at length became a subject of extreme interest, resulting in a determination to make public exhibition of their individual ability, to which the competitors themselves assenting, a certain day was named, public announcement thereof was made, and the excitement speedily became universal. And now the appointed day was drawing near, yet the gloom that had possessed Cosron, ever since the appearance of his triumphant rival, seemed to be unmitigated.

The radiating manifestation of the Hindoo's god had already become the smiling Vishnu of the West,* and the soodar acknowledged the reflection of those sacred beams, in the consecrated river at his feet, with reverence due, ere the gloomy reign of the destroying Siva should commence with the shadows of night; this duty performed, reclining upon the mat, beneath the palm-leaved veranda of his hut, he soon became absorbed in profound meditation. But not the sweet quietism, the entrancing calm was his as when the mild lustre of the sunset hour is wont to be reflected by the bosom of content. He gazed sullenly upon the numerous serpent skins decorating his dwelling, as trophies of his skill. 'And can Daara,' he pondered, 'can he bring so many proofs of having freed from danger, perchance from death, the path of the wanderer and unwary, that Cosron must now rove from village unto village forgotten and uncared for? without even so much as recognition in token of past service for the once so admired serpent-charmer? Alas! the music that hath soothed a savage and base reptile, discourseth vainly unto hearts it so oft hath set at rest; for lo! the presence of Cosron, that was wont to be desired, even as a draught from the sacred waters of the Ganges in the hour of death,† is become as the pillar of the mighty Siva‡ level with the dust of the earth! What avails it that my birth was pronounced to be in a fortunate hour? that my rice-fields flourish, and my herds are thriving; and that even to crown my good fortune in all things my fair wife, my incomparable Parayata,§ beauteous as the sacred flower from which she hath been named, is as the moon unto the stars even among the all-excelling daughters of Cashmere?|| and that I love her so entirely as to desire no other wives?¶ Vishnu be praised! I am content with one: cheerfully does she grind the corn, and bear the pitcher to the sacred fountain: and 'twas in the hour of good fortune when first I touched her gentle hand, across the holy table in her father's house.††

It was as thus absorbed in his sullen broodings, Cosron contemplated the skin of a huge and dangerous serpent, distinguished as the cobra de capello (hooded snake,) his control of which had so oft excited admiration as left him without competitor, till the appearance of the detested Daara in the valley. Mechanically he raised to his lips the rustic flageolet that was suspended from his waist. Languidly he breathed the simple, well-remembered strain, when suddenly he becomes awed—horror-struck—and drops the instrument with the most unqualified amazement, as by degrees he perceives the skin inflated, glowing in all the native brilliancy of its colors, and breathing with renewed existence! Wreathing, bending itself in its usual dancing-like evolutions, it advances towards the now silent musician, who springing from his seat at this unexpected prodigy had fascinated in his turn, remained with eyes of distended gaze, unable to retreat. 'Great Bramah! he mentally ejaculated, as strange bewildering thoughts flashed through his brain, 'Great Bramah! is this a precursor of thy last Avatar,‡‡ or is it the transmigration of some unhappy spirit, as penance for its evil deeds, into yon dreadful form? And now the strange hood-like excrescence near the creature's head expanded itself wider—wider—the semblance of a human countenance within became each moment more distinct!§ and at length a voice, strange and unearthly, thus addressed the astonished Soodar:

'Cosron, thou art unjustly treated: thy services are forgotten, and thy only need is that of ingratitude: this thou must avenge, and by the destruction of him who hath been the author of thy reverse of fortune. Nay, start not: know that I am an emissary of Siva, the Destroyer; and therefore assumed his favorite form, that of the great serpent Kaliya,|| in which he first obtained rule, and hath continued to rule the children of the dust from the beginning, for millions to obey—many, unconscious that they are serving him, and who love to boast of their freedom from his sway. But though Siva is despotic, and still glories to wound the heel of Krishna¶ he well knoweth a time will come, when it shall be raised to bruise his head! and thinkest thou, Soodar, he will not struggle—fiercely struggle, to maintain his empire? I tell thee there will be warfare that will shake the multifarious heavens of the children of the dust, and earth in its remotest centre! for the staff of Siva is broken, and his fall is near at hand. But thou, oh! Cos-much distinguished for their beauty and accomplishments; and are frequently purchased by the omrahs, and other men of high station, on that account.

* Polygamy is universally allowed among the Hindoos; with the exception of the Brahmans and Banians.

† The bride and bridegroom meeting at her father's house, a table is placed between them, across which their hands are joined, while the Brahmin or priest, covering their heads with a cloth, bestows his benediction.

‡ Avatar, or incarnation of the deity: of which the Hindoos believe several have already occurred at different periods, and are still in expectation of the tenth and last Avatar, which, they say, is to prove the destruction of evil, and the restoration of all things to the primitive state of perfection, in the one Creator of all things, who will then reign over the whole earth.

§ The cobra de capello, or hooded snake, (coluber naja,) called by the Indians the naag or nagoo, is a large and beautiful serpent; it is called the hooded snake, from having a curious hood near the head, which contracts or enlarges at pleasure.—M'Leod's "Voyage of the Alceste."

|| Millar, in describing this snake, further affirms, that when dancing or otherwise excited, it opens this hood and discloses the semblance of a human face.

¶ Krishna overcame the serpent Kaliya; but was wounded in the combat.—See "Ward's Hindoo Mythology," vol. i., pp. 138 to 140.

‡‡ Krishna, the Indian Apollo, is one of the Avatars of the Hindoo creed. It must be acknowledged that the history of Krishna, however interlarded with the fantastic imagery of Hindoo Mythology, bears an undeniable resemblance to the Divine mission of our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ: upon which subject Mr. Maurice affords much interesting detail in his "Antiquities of Hindoostan," together with a translation from the Bhagavat Puraan and the Mahabharat, vol. ii., pp. 323 to 479.

 We beg leave to direct the reader's attention to the following remarkable attestation of M. Sonnerat in his "Voyage aux Indes," that in the temple of Vishnu, dedicated to this incarnation, Krishna is represented with his body encircled by a cobra de capello which rises his foot: while in another picture he is painted as dancing on the head of this same monster. His followers have commonly these two pictures in their houses. The plates, No. 60 and 62, of Meor's "Hindoo Pantheon," also corroborate the above, as representing Krishna treading on the serpent's head.

* Soodar, or labourer, signifies the fourth tribe or caste of Hindoos, which is typified, being sprung from the feet of Brahma, thereby implying the menial situation of those belonging to it. According to the Hindoo or Gentoo code, the first in dignity are the Brahmans, as having figuratively sprung from the head of Brahma: the second class, the shetris (the military,) from his heart, as denoting courage; the bee—i. e. trader—from his stomach, as providing the necessities of life.

† "The dancing snakes, which are carried in baskets throughout Hindoostan, procure a maintenance for a set of people who play a few simple notes on the flute, with which the snakes seem much delighted, and keep time by a graceful motion of the head, erecting about half their length from the ground, and following the music with gentle curves, like the undulating lines of a swan's neck. It is a well-attested fact, that when a house is infested with these snakes, the musicians are sent for, who, by playing on a flageolet, find out their hiding-places and charm them to their destruction, for no sooner do the snakes hear the music than they come softly from their retreat, and are easily taken. If when the music ceases they are not immediately covered in the basket, the spectators are liable to fatal results."—See M'Leod's "Voyage of the Alceste."

* The Sun, when in the East, is called Brahma, only from noon till evening; while in the West, Vishnu; at night, Siva—Seeley's "Travels to Elora," page 165.

† "The Ganges is in such esteem among the Indians that it is worshipped as a god; and happy is the man that can procure any of its water to drink before he dies."—Millar's Geography, page 77.

‡ "A famous stone pillar, named Siva's walking-staff, held in high veneration by the Hindoos. This pillar stood originally in one of the Hindoo temples which were destroyed by Aurungzeb. It was a very beautiful shaft of one stone, forty feet high, and covered with exquisite carving. Respecting this pillar, a tradition had long prevailed among the Hindoos that it was gradually sinking in the ground; that it had been twice the visible height it then showed; and that when its summit was level with the earth, all nations were to be of one caste! and the religion of Brahma have an end."—Bishop Heber's Travels, vol. i., p. 490.

ron, so oft hast rendered to him thy willing tribute of discontent, and murmuring envy of thy rival's fame, and wishes for his downfall, that Siva feels impelled thereby to reward thy allegiance by recognizing thy claim on his assistance; which I now come empowered to bestow, and which will enable thee to destroy, not only the skill of thy rival, but also himself shouldst thou so employ it. Know, oh! thou who so wildest to serve the mighty Siva, that I am the serpent of the sacred cave of Elephanti;^{*} and that my arrowy tongue, which I now drop at thy feet, is fraught with poison, the most death-dealing of our kind, and that its slightest touch will unsuspected immolate the receiver thereof, and leave the field of thy ambition unimpeded as before, for the distinction thou dost covet, together with its attendant consequences of wealth and worldly honors.' Cosron, as he listened, felt as there were strange fires shooting through every vein; the spirit of malignity—a desire to inflict pain, to witness agony, swelled his heart with horrid joy: nevertheless he was conscious of an undercurrent of contrary feeling; as a somewhat of pity—of remorse—appeared to struggle for pre-eminence, and rendered thought a perfect chaos. Suddenly it seemed as though a faint shriek met his ear, succeeded by the well-known music of some passing serpent-charmer: there was also a rustling—a hissing, as of serpents, not far distant—the shriek—a female's, was repeated, and Cosron, startled by this combination of agitating sounds at length awoke from what had been but a troubled dream! The smile of Vishnu had long time faded in the west; the calm moon-beam of 'lesser light' was already reflected in the sacred stream, and glancing among the broad green leaves and golden fruit of the surrounding mango-groves. For a short space the Hindoo gazed, bewildered by the recent wanderings of his excited fancy, and scarce able to believe them such: yet all familiar objects appeared the same, and the skin of the enormous hooded-serpent opposite, hung lifeless as before. Impressed with the past he yet rejoiced that his better nature triumphed with the awakened vigor of his mental faculties; though still was he moody and galled, as remembering the acknowledged pre-eminence of Daara. Rising from his mat, he advanced to glance round from the verandah;—suddenly he starts back with a sort of bewildering horror—for there at his foot lies the poisoned arrow of his so recent dream! Was it possible? Had it, then, not been a dream?—and where was the mysterious apparition? All without represented Nature in her calm loveliness as before, he had slept: but not for the poor tempted one, thus owning the newly-awakened conflict within his own breast: for spite of his resentful feelings, and their base incentive, the guardians of the worthy were still attracted towards their charge, by that portion of their nature that remained struggling for ascendancy. But now his vision seemed renewed in all its former force: again he seemed to behold the strange serpent apparition—and to hear the voice of evil counsel, justifying his sense of injury in the person of the new and successful serpent-charmer. Cosron took up the death-dealing implement, so mysteriously placed within his reach; it appeared to be the virulent part of a serpent's tongue; and though but a mere lifeless portion of the formidable reptile, that accident might have caused being there, amid the collection of any one of his pursuit, the Soodar, by no means deficient in the superstitions of a Pagan, believed it still to be endowed with the dangerous attributes of its living nature, and with much agitation concealed it within the folds of his girdle. And again the music was heard—but much nearer, and evidently approaching his hut; while Cosron could perceive in the cloudless moon-beam, a bright elongated mass of verdant gold, waving and softly gliding among the long cusa-grass that rustled as before; this was an object familiar to the serpent charmer, well understood; but the music—nearer, still nearer, it sounded; and concealed by the shelving form of the verandah, soon Cosron discerned also him, the source of the evil by which he was tormented. It was Daara himself evidently luring the dreadful reptile to its destruction, unconscious that his own was near, as on—on still he slowly came till within the shadow of the broad plantain immediately before the door of Cosron's hut. And the arm was raised—yet Daara passed on with his quiet melody, and passed unharmed; for at that moment the shriek was repeated, succeeded by the approach of light rapid footsteps—a small, soft hand is placed on that uplifted arm—a voice—a dear, well-known voice, salutes the ear of Cosron; it is that of Parayata, his well beloved Parayata, who, her long dark hair dishevelled over her shoulders, and her fair cheek wan with terror now falls upon his neck. 'The serpent! the dreadful serpent! Vishnu be praised! my husband, thy music hath saved me.' For Daara was now out of sight; and his melody, that the serpent had followed, could no longer be heard. Keen was the remorseful pang that assailed the heart of Cosron, as the truth flashed upon his comprehension. With averted looks, and in hurried tones, he replied, 'It was not my music, Parayata; it was—' He ceased abruptly; for how could he add, 'it was his whom I was on the point of destroying, and from the basest feeling.' Humbled, in his gratitude for the interposition of Providence, the Soodar stood awhile, trembling and abashed, before the power he had supplicated, ere sleep wove the troubled dream, that had left the impress of so much evil. At length recovering from his confusion, 'Thou art safe,' exclaimed Cosron, embracing his still trembling wife. 'Thou art safe, my Parayata, and though not by aid of mine, yet I ought to be thankful.' 'It was my good fortune, dear Cosron,' replied Parayata, 'that some passing serpent-charmer crossed my path, and by his well-timed music hath been my preserver. Again I say, praise be unto Vishnu!' 'Truly do I echo thy praise, my Parayata: and it is but a brief space since I rendered him the homage due. And ought I then to serve his foe?' added the Hindoo within himself. Snatching the late mysterious gift from its concealment, he hurried it to a distance without his dwelling. And then Cosron felt as though relieved from some terrible burden: he gazed tenderly on his lovely Parayata; he caressed his infant boy, his little Baaboo, a four-year old prattler; he became unembarrassed, as was his usual wont—he became cheerful—he seemed to be contented with his lot. A few more days had elapsed; and though in most parts of India serpent-charmers are more or less in requisition, nothing remarkable had been heard of either of the competitors, beyond the general and increasing excitement of expectation, as the day of the public display of their individual skill drew near. 'I will at least prepare for the strange contest,' thought the serpent-charmer, approaching the receptacle of his living collection. At that moment, his little son came bounding towards him, 'Father—father,' exclaimed the child, 'old Webbanee, the cotton weaver, gave me this that he found in the mango-grove: he laughed and said, 'There take it to your father; when he sets all his snakes dancing perhaps he can bring it to life; for, by the flute of Krishna I think Daara could.' On hearing this innocent jesting repeated by his child, the medium of such unequivocal preference for his rival, the envy of Cosron was revived in all its former vigor; though he fain would have disowned the feeling, even to himself. Placing his hand caressingly upon the head of little Baaboo, he took the object presented to him, and immediately started with superstitious horror, as recognizing the mysterious gift of his dream, and which he had cast from him but a few nights past! Irritated by galling recollections, he hastily concealed it once more within the folds of his girdle: while apparently intent on examining the place of his danger-fraught possession. 'Dear father, said the child, coaxingly, 'make the great snake dance; for he was too well accustomed to the exhibition to entertain any fears, and would clap his little hands with delight, and even dare to touch them, when under the powerful influence of the melody. The 'great snake' of little Baaboo's admiration, was accordingly set at liberty, together with many others of the terrible collection, and all, immediately fascinated by the usual means employed, commenced their dancing-like movements. How beautiful though terrible the sight! How wondrous the power by which the monsters were controlled, as slowly, gracefully winding and writhing with each other, the ever-varying gold and verdant tints of their spotted skins glowing in the bright sun-beam, like the passions of earth, regulated by the harmony of reason, to reflect the light and glory of Heaven! This took place on the very margin of the consecrated stream flowing immediately before the entrance of the serpent-charmer's hut. All at once, some unexpected combination was produced, of more than usual attraction, causing the child, in ecstasy of admiration, to bound upward, and accidentally coming in forcible contact with his father's arm; the instrument was struck from his hand—it fell into the stream, and was instantly lost to view! The means of protection were no longer in force, for the spell was broken. Of this the unfortunate serpent-charmer, but too well aware caught his shrieking child to his breast in an agony of terror and despair! Surrounded by so many of the death-dealing reptiles, whither could he turn? A horrible fate appeared inevitable! Already the monsters, missing the enchaining sounds, began to erect themselves with hissing ire, as preparing to dart upon their victims! 'Lost! lost! my child!' with the infant's terrified cries, were the only sounds heard—yet—no, no, not the only sounds—hark! Oh, great Vishnu! a sound, sweet, mellifluous, and soothing, proceeds from the adjacent grove; it is that of another flute, breathed by another musician! it is the well-known melody of the serpent-charmers! the monsters hear it also, and as though by magic influence resume their former ecstatic evolutions; and while the spell continues Cosron well knows that there is safety in approaching them: placing his terrified infant on the ground, he therefore hastens to cover the snakes in their baskets, while under the influence of the music: though fearing each moment that from some accidental cause it might cease ere he had thus secured them. Under such apprehension, the agitated Soodar called to the unseen musician, in the name of the great Vishnu! to continue for awhile. The serpents at length replaced in their baskets, and the danger past, Cosron looked around him to observe that again it was the hour of sunset—beautiful, all-glorious sunset! that bids farewell with smiles and promise of bright eternal day, happier than ever yet hath gladdened this earth of temptation and of trial, of sorrow, yet also—of blessed hope! The Soodar, true to his faith, bent o'er the consecrated stream at this hallowed hour—yet did he pause; for how dared he render homage unto the Preserver with the gift of the Destroyer still lying near his heart? Snatching the detested implement from its concealment, like another Khrisna, he crushed it in the dust beneath his foot, till quite immolated.—'Twas then with the lightened heart of a clear conscience, that according to the prescribed forms of his creed, the Soodar thrice bathed his brow in the waters of the sun-lit stream, which being confluent with a branch of the Indus,* was rendered sacred to its Hindoo worshippers; while now, as contemplating the reflection of the receding orb in those bright waters, he rejoiced in the yet brighter one of his own repentant bosom. Presently a slight movement near caused him to turn his head, and he encountered Daara, the rival serpent-charmer! still holding in his hand the rustic pipe of his profession; thus disclosing from whence the recent aid had so opportunely proceeded. 'I also,' said Daara, 'would fain render homage unto the great Vishnu at this sacred hour. Meet is it that I should: for in a dream was I not long since warned of pursuing danger in a serpent's tongue: but which through the favor of the Divine Preserver, I have hitherto escaped.' 'I have been no less favored, good brother, couldst thou know,' replied Cosron, almost shedding tears of joy, 'and of this shalt thou be further informed, when we meet in presence of the multitude assembled to witness our expected display of serpent-charming. To thee, oh Daara, am I indebted, not for my own life only, but for that of my wife—my child—he ceased abruptly from excess of emotion. 'To me!' exclaimed Daara. 'Surely we have scarce met before; and are known to each other more by repute than sight: even now, I surmised not thine to be the voice urging me to continue my strains, on the abrupt ceasing of a serpent's flute; and though I well guessed the danger—' 'The danger is past now, Daara, replied Cosron, with significant expression. 'We soon shall meet before the world, in exhibition of our individual skill: yet, notwithstanding our opposing interests, we shall meet as friends, and thou, Daara, shalt acknowledge that Cosron hath controlled serpents—mighty monsters, perchance unknown to thee.' 'It may indeed prove so, my brother,' observed Daara, with composure. 'I protest I envy thee not; and we shall meet in friendship as thou sayest, even as we now part.' 'Doubt it not; doubt it not, good brother,' exclaimed Cosron, 'my pipe hath fallen from my hand, to be carried away by the stream; but I have learnt that there is a harmony more sweet and durable within the reach of all, and so fare thee well, brother.'

* This celebrated cave, justly distinguished as one of the most interesting antiquities of India, is situated in an island near Bombay; and is said to derive its name from the statue of an elephant hewn out of the solid rock, so life-like in appearance as to deceive the spectator within a hundred yards' distance. The interior of this remarkable cave is said to be most elaborately wrought and sculptured, to a vast extent, with figures and devices, symbolical of the Hindoo religion for ages past; and, according to Fitzclarence's Journal, "the deadly cobra capello is by analogy placed in the hands of the destroying power in the famous Trimurti there represented." For his very particular description, see his work above quoted, page 393.

* "Called also Sind: the word Indus being probably from the names of Hind and Sind belonging to two sons of Ham, son of Noah, the Suttya of Hindoo chronology, and mentioned as a favored personage, who, with only seven others, was preserved in an ark during a general deluge."—See Mr. Seely's Travels, page 201.

'Twas thus parted the rival serpent-charmers: the following day was that announced for the curious and novel exhibition: and Cosron, after the performance of the accustomed pūja of all pious Hindoos, on the lotus-fringed banks of the sacred river, proceeded early in a course extending for some leagues beneath the far-extending shelter of the Banyan, towards the most cultivated part of that beautifully valley, in all parts so richly cultivated by the liberal hand of Nature. The part to which the Soodar now bent his steps, was the chosen resort of several noble omrahs, and other persons of distinction; who were fain to make it their refuge from the required shackles of state, and the busy turmoil of the world in which their rank compelled them to move.* Now, amid these stately edifices, that notwithstanding their professed seclusion were in most instances conspicuous for the display of wealth and luxury surrounding them, arose the quiet habitation of a learned Pandit,† who was in himself its most glorious ornament, as being a gem of learning and vast attainments, rendering him precious unto others, as his native virtues and true piety caused him to find that treasure in himself 'Earth cannot give, nor take away.' Such was the learned and truly wise Pandit Mah Satarah; a name which in Hindostanee is literally translated, Great Star, and which he fully justified.

The years of this estimable man had been many; he had lived to prove life a blessing equally to those around him as to himself; and the venerable gifts of Time hung about him, like the well-earned trophies of a mighty conqueror, honoring the worth they cannot dignify. Of the Musnavi sect, or worshipers of the 'One great Invisible,' Mah Satarah had learned to survey Nature in all her varied phases, to trace each in its essence, unto the Eternal cause, the immutable source, as rays of the one vast mind, pervading all—manifested in all—to be comprehended alone by the creature he formed for his glory, and recipient thereof; the only shrine of his worship on earth, Man—in the beginning, the image of his brightness, in whom he hath breathed a living soul—life of his own life!—light of his own light!—the divine unquenchable spark of his own Immortality! In all parts of the habitable globe, notwithstanding the multifarious contrarieties of tongues, customs, prejudices, and opposing doctrines of the spiritual Babel, man stands everywhere a reasoning, reflecting, responsible being, for elevated natures to become liberalized and wakened to rational conviction: thus had Mah Satarah, a seeker after truth, adopted many notions which occasionally startled his numerous disciples. He feared not publicly to decry the opinions promulgated of Chunar Fort,* boldly asserting the locality of stipulated periods, as being inconsistent with the omnipresence of Divine protection.

It was in the midst of such discussions that he was wont reverently to advert to the beautifully-expressive symbol of the 'Great Invisible' in the sacred cave at Elora,† the mention of which would cause his auditors to simultaneously bow their heads. Well was it for the venerable Pandit that his own unblemished reputation combined with his elevated position to raise him above reproach: since he had been known to have once risked scandal, by administering to a fainting Pariah a draught of water from his own sacred hand!—nay, more, that he had boldly endeavored to justify the impure act, by certain passages from a strange Shaster belonging to some Christian Feringhees;‡ he would also, when discoursing of the holy Trimurti§ call attention to many portions of the Sanscrit, alluding to their final annihilation,|| an assertion by which he greatly amazed some of his auditory; insomuch that many, although with free access to those sacred records, and staunch professors of their creed, were, like those of more enlightened shores, far too deeply engrossed by their 'farms' and their 'merchandise,' to be very solicitous upon the subject, and some perhaps not even cognisant of the authority quoted; proving thereby idol-worship to be by no means peculiar to any part of this deteriorated earth; and that in truth if the industrious missionaries of Great Britain were to remain at home, they would find ample grounds for their pious labors: nevertheless, we wish the hearty 'God speed,' that must ever attend the 'zealous in good works.'

* In Chunar Fort, in the province of Bengal, is a place supposed by the Hindoos to be the most holy in all India, and thus spoken of by Bishop Heber in his "Journal" vol. i. page 408:—"Colonel Robertson called for a key, and unlocked a very rusty iron door, in a very rugged and ancient wall, said he would show me the most holy place in all India. Taking off his hat, he led the way into a small square court, overshadowed by an old Peepul tree, which grew from the rock on one side, and from one of the branches of which hung a small silver bell: under it was a large slab of black marble; and opposite, on the walls, a rudely-carved rose enclosed in a triangle. No image was visible; but some Sepoys who followed us in, fell on their knees, and kissed the dust in the neighborhood of the stone, and rubbed their foreheads with it. On this stone, Colonel Alexander said, the Hindoos all believe that the Almighty is seated personally, though invisibly, for nine hours every day; removing for the other three hours to Benares. On this account is the generally-received notion, that Chunar can never be taken by an enemy but between the hours of six and nine in the morning! Even here, the seriously reflecting Hindoo rejects all outward symbols as the supposed actual presence of the Deity."

† There is no idol in front of the great altar in the temple of Kurii, at Elora. A Brahmin, speaking of this altar, exclaimed, in nearly the words of our poet, "Him first, Him last, Him midst, Him without end." He rejected all ideas of assimilating Budha, (or Brahma) with the "Eternal God," who, he said, was "One alone, without beginning, without end; and that the circular altar was his emblem."—Seeley's "Travels to Elora," page 73.

‡ The term of Feringhees (or Frank) is applied indiscriminately to all Europeans in the East, of whatever religious profession.

§ Brahma, Vishnu, and Mah-Jeva, the three Hindoo deities, were perhaps originally personifications of the Creating, Preserving, and Destructing, or, as it may be understood, the Re-producing power of the Supreme Being.

In spite of the quaintness, and (if permitted the expression) flippancy of the above, we cannot but at once perceive its coincidence with the Sacred page, declaring the ultimate dissolution of "all things created" when He, the uncreated, shall be "all in all." There is in the same learned authority a note upon the subject, so finely illustrative, and so pithy in detail, that we cannot forbear the infringement of our allotted space, by the following extract:—"You are not to consider Brahma, Vishnu, or Mah-deva, and other incorporate beings, as the Deity; although they have each the denomination of deva, or divine; these are all created; while the Supreme Being is without beginning or end; unformed, and uncreated—worship and adore him. The worship which is paid to inferior deities, and the representations of them proceeds from this: mankind in general are more affected by appearances than realities; the former they comprehend, but the latter are difficult to be understood: thus, learned tutors first place figures before their pupils, that their minds may become composed and conducted by degrees, to the essential Unity, who survives the annihilation; when the Devas, and all created existence, are dissolved and absorbed into his essence."—Sir William Jones's Life, page 363.

STANZA.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE, BY C. RUSSELL CLARKE.

A TENDER, unobtrusive hour,
This fading twilight seems to me,
As over mountain, vale and lea
It starts, and with a magic power,
Enveils the beauties of the earth,
'Till darkness' guise comes o'er the scene
To linger, till the brow serene
Of jocund Day beams light and mirth.
Fond Mem'ry plumes her pinions bright,
And soars above the fickle stream
Of by-gone years, whose waters seem
To glisten 'neath a mellow light.
So may they sparkle evermore,
Till lost upon Death's sullen shore.

THE FATHERLESS.

SPEAK softly to the fatherless!
And check the harsh reply
That sends the crimson to the cheek,
The tear-drop to the eye.
They have the weight of loneliness
In this rude world, to bear;
Then gently raise the fallen bud,
The drooping flowret spare.

Speak kindly to the fatherless!
The lowliest of their band,
God keepeth, as the waters,
In the hollow of his hand.
'Tis sad to see life's evening sun
Go down in sorrow's shroud,
But sadder still when morning's dawn
Is darkened by the cloud.

Look mildly on the fatherless!
Ye may have power to wile
Their hearts from sudden memory,
By the magic of a smile!
Deal gently with these little ones—
Be pitiful—and He,
The friend and father of us all,
Shall gently deal with thee!

THE LOST PURSE.

NEXT to the forfeiture of credit, perhaps, one of the least pardonable of crimes in a commercial country is a breach of contract, or a falsified promise, so closely related to what is usually termed sharp practice, and very properly regarded as no venial offence. It is one, however, not so easily detected, and still less frequently amenable to the laws, depending for the most part, on the skill or the penetration of the magistrate to unravel, and to place it in such a light as to bring conviction to the most dubious; to catch, in short, the real culprit, in his own net.

In the days of Italy's ducal splendor and commercial prosperity, there occurred in Mantua a notable instance of this kind, of which the details were so amusing, and the 'lex talionis' so adroitly applied by the judge, to the no small edification of the court and the public, as to obtain for him in that behalf an almost Solomonian renown. This judge was no other than Francesco de Gonzaga then Duke of Mantua, celebrated as much for his love of justice as for his feat of arms, and delighting for that reason, when at peace, to be his own lord chancellor, and preside in the judgment seat, conformably with the old and revered custom of his noblest predecessors.

Once, while thus laudably employed, it fell out that a Greek merchant of Corfu, of extensive traffic, very wealthy, but of most penurious habits, met with the greatest calamity that can possibly befall a man so circumstanced—he lost his purse! What a fate! When after scouring half Italy, driving the hardest bargains, and levying contributions heavier than of war itself upon all 'manner of men,' foreigners and country-men alike, and just settling down in his pleasant villa in the neighborhood, to lose his purse!

* According to Millar, this charming locality, termed the "Paradise of India," has been usually the resort of the Moguls in the sultry season; whither they have retired with their courts; as also many persons of distinction.—See his "System of Geography," page 80.

What were all his other ninety-nine safe invested treasures to that, his 'one lost sheep,' over which he truly mourned with all a miser-shepherd's love.

What added to his chagrin, it formed the proceeds of a pretty little bargain by which he had made at least forty gold crowns more than he had at all expected, or had a right to expect, and loved them for that very reason with a more singular and intense affection. Now, alas! he would be compelled to sacrifice those beloved, closely driven forty, to have the least chance of ever again beholding their no less valuable companions. And oh, when he reached home, when he doubted, when he searched, when the truth gradually broke, then flashed upon him in its full wrath, what agonies did he not endure. No smuggling culprit, enveloped in seven-fold shields of silks, satins, and cigars, ever underwent so rough a handling as he voluntarily inflicted on himself, but not with the success attending the officer of justice.

'Yes it was all safe but a few hours before; he had only transacted one or two minor little bargains subsequently, and strange that he could not recall how, when, or where, his beloved had left his side—his hope, his joy, had, perhaps, departed for ever—ever—ever!'

As he pronounced the last words, he struck his forehead in a fit of despair, cursed his carelessness and folly in not having strapped and locked his treasure round his body, as he most usually did; and, as a memento for the future, was very nearly, like the Irishman who tore his bank-notes to revenge himself on the firm, about to lay violent hands upon himself. That just sentence, however, being a true miser-trader of Corfu, M. Philos Phulos, with a humane regard for self to which he was ever alive, soon commuted for running like a maniac over every step he had before gone, inquiring of every person and at every place whether a certain red purse of large dimensions, containing four hundred and upward of gold crowns, had been seen, left, stolen, or stolen away without its master's knowledge or consent? The messenger who first drew Priam's curtain at the dead of night looked like a mere dolt compared to the rich trader's expression of horror, as he received a killing negative to every fresh demand. Scarcely one could recognise him for the same man, so great was the effect of the sudden loss of a comparative trifle upon his grasping and avaricious heart—for soul he had none. He seemed to have lost all presence of mind, and he was afraid of flying to the aid of the police lest that should entail a further expense upon—a loss.

At length, finding that all his efforts to recover possession without venturing something were in vain, he resolved, in his dismay, to apply to the last resort—to the supreme head of the state in the high seat of justice itself. So wild and haggard were his looks that all made way for him, in the idea that some most fearful and public calamity had just occurred, with which he was about to astound the ears of the court. There was quite a sensation. Judge, advocate, panel, prisoners, and spectators, were alike terror-stricken at the hueless, spectral appearance of the well known wealthy trader, now the most wretched, miserly spectacle ever beheld. All became horrid expectant silence and dumb show—you might have heard a pin drop; and when rushing forward toward the very judgment-seat, taking precedence of everybody and everything he exclaimed, in most lugubrious tone:

'Oh, my lord, my lord—I have lost—lost my purse.'

The contrast was so ludicrous, that all with the longest faces possible, anticipating some fatal tidings, burst into one loud and most unanimous laugh.

'Your purse, man,' re-echoed the judge, who had conceived that the enemy must be at the gates; 'is that all? I am truly rejoiced.'

'Rejoiced! Grazia di Dio! four hundred crowns!'

'Four hundred!' exclaimed the duke, 'what a trifle; what is that to you? Why not proclaim the loss and a handsome reward at once?'

'A handsome reward! Oh, heavens! must I?'

'I see you hate the very idea; but there is no remedy; say at once fifty crowns.'

'Fifty! Diavoli! No, no, say five, or less.' 'Then you will never see your money. Who would be at the trouble—or, rather, not punish your avarice, and give it to the poor?'

'God forbid—God forbid!' replied the wretch in a tone that filled all his hearers with disgust.

'Now,' exclaimed the duke indignantly, 'let the public crier proclaim forty crowns reward.'

'Ah! I beseech your excellency to have some mercy; not forty, say ten, or less.'

This was uttered with so ludicrous a contortion of visage, that a fresh peal of laughter resounded through the court.

'Away with your 'less'!' retorted the duke; 'it shall be more. Let the crier call fifty crowns as a reward for whoever—'

'Then let it be forty,' interrupted the miser, 'as your excellency first said, or say less.'

'Oh, that 'less,' replied the Duke: 'say I again, and it shall be more, for it could never be made so little as thy own soul.'

Scarcely had the public crier proceeded to comply with the ducal mandate by the proclamation of fifty from without, before there appeared, escorted by two of the city sergeants, an aged woman; a poor widow, and a sister of charity belonging to one of the neighboring monasteries. She had just picked up the lost treasure, and was already on her way to the court for the purpose of restoring it to the owner before the reward had been proclaimed. Seizing upon this circumstance with the eagerness of a drowning man, the wily trader, shouting to the public crier to stop, asked the poor old lady if she had brought it in consequence of hearing the proclamation of a reward.

'No, I had already found it, and wished to restore it to the owner; I had heard of no reward.'

'Then it is mine; my own, my own purse thou good worthy woman,' exclaimed the miser, in a rapture, 'but I will be as good as my word, and you shall have five crowns, you shall,' and he looked around with an air of assumed generosity and magnanimity, as if he had performed something little less than a miracle; and indeed it would have been most miraculous on any other occasion in him.

'Not so fast, not so fast,' interrupted the good duke; 'bring the purse to me, and let the honest woman come nearer, and stand by the kind merchant while we count her out his fifty crowns.'

The horror of the trader suddenly hurled from the pinnacle of his hopes, was too great for speech; but his contortions to the delight of the beholders, bore witness to the self-inflicted torments of his miserly heart.

'Are you in easy circumstances, madam?' inquired the duke with marked politeness.

'I am a poor afflicted woman, my lord; a widow, and have only what I obtain with my own hands, and the help of my daughter, by sewing for the sisters' convent hard by.'

'But you will now have a dowry for your daughter,' replied the duke, 'out of the good merchant's purse, and can marry her well. Come before me, signor,' he added, 'and empty your purse upon the table.'

Making a virtue of necessity, the sorrowful miser complied; the pieces were counted, when to the no little astonishment of all, the trader, with a cry of dismay, began to wring his hands.

'How is this, you wicked woman?' he exclaimed; 'there are thirty good Venetian ducats wanting here, which I had forgotten; you must have stolen them; oh, you wretch.'

The poor creature, charged thus suddenly, could not utter a word. She blushed, she stammered, then turned pale, and many there were who, at those guilty signs, began to take the side of the merchant, and adjudged her guilty of theft. Not so the able judge; he saw through the snare at once, and turned the tables upon the wily trader in a mode he did not expect.

Still taking singular pleasure, as much as he possessed ability in exposing the tricks and frauds of double-dealing appellants, and which induced him so often to preside, he waited patiently to see how the poor creature would contrive to defend herself; and was delighted to find her simple honesty more than a match for grasping avarice itself.

'May it please your excellency,' she began, after a long pause, 'having had the whole of the money in my power, if I were wicked enough to take part, why should I not rather have taken the whole? There was no one present to prevent me, and yet I brought the purse as I found it, unopened hither. You say that I have robbed you of thirty ducats, and I call heaven to witness, standing here before your excellency, as I hoped to be saved, that I have not touched a single zechin. Let him prove it only, and I invoke the severest punishment you can inflict on my head. Nay, I tried not once to open it.'

'I believe you,' replied the duke, casting a terrible and indignant glance at the real culprit; you deserve to lose all your money, and were you one of our own subjects, I know not, if I would not hang you by the neck like a dog, and a very mischievous dog as you are. But, perhaps, such short punishment would be too great mercy; you deserve to linger in torments; in all the torments of vile disappointed avarice; as you shall do. To that monstrous vice you wish to add notorious breach of faith; but you have enough to answer for already, I dare be bound. I shall not farther indulge your demon taste, but step in to protect you from your worst enemy—from yourself. Now, sir, why did you not make mention of the thirty ducats in the first instance with the four hundred crowns?'

'It quite escaped me in my fright,' exclaimed the terrified wretch, for he saw that his excellency's blood was up; that he was in downright earnest.

'What!' continued the duke, would you attempt to persuade us, madman, that your memory was so bad, and that you are so regardless of money, that you could not retain the idea of thirty ducats when you had so vivid a recollection of four hundred crowns? No, you will never catch old birds with that chaff, though you may turn to high usurious interest the simplicity and credulity of your weaker and poorer fellow creatures. But there are bounds to fraud and usury as to everything else. When men grow wanton and reckless in their wily greed and oppression, it is high time to put a drag chain upon their movements. One thing,' continued the duke, imitating the old trader's voice to perfection; for with all sounder accomplishments he was an admirable mimic; 'one thing my dear sir, according to your own showing, is perfectly patent, and you deserve a rogue's patent for it, namely a halter, that this same purse is none of yours, and that thou art a base coveter of some or other of thy neighbor's goods. Thou sayest thy purse contained ducats, and this hath none. This purse belongs to me, for my recollection is better than yours, and I now recall to mind that one of my own people this very morning lost a purse of this size and color, and containing exactly four hundred crowns. So it must needs be that it is one and the same. And now, having a presumed right at least to dispose of it, I beg to present it to you, my good madam, and, with this further hundred added to it, you may be enabled to give your daughter a portion for her marriage. And I have that opinion of your integrity, madam, that if you should find another purse, the purse described by our unfortunate client here, in which, along with the crowns, there are thirty ducats, you will restore it to him, and I dare say he will be most happy to pay you the fifty crowns already proclaimed as a reward.'

The poor old widow—though we should no longer say poor—gratefully thanked his excellency especially for his good opinion of her, adding, as a little cold comfort to the dismayed miser, that she should consider herself very happy indeed to find it, and would promise to return it to him without making any claim on his liberality whatsoever.

The bare suggestion, though all empty air, or recovering something without paying anything, seemed to carry consolation to the disconsolate miser's breast; and the humorous manner in which he thanked the good old lady elicited another burst of laughter at his expense, which upset the mock gravity of the rather eccentric, but able and penetrating ducal judge himself.

Biographical Sketch.

SKETCH OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

THE news of the election of Louis Napoleon to the Presidency of the French Republic will naturally excite some curiosity in regard to his history and public character. Hitherto he has only been known through the foolish affairs at Strasbourg and Boulogne, his published works, notwithstanding the merits claimed for them by his adherents, having failed to enlarge his reputation. His life has, nevertheless, been somewhat eventful, and he does not lack the advantages of varied fortune and severe experience. Whether he has profited by them, remains to be seen. From such hasty materials as we could procure, we have arranged the following brief notice of his history.

Charles Louis Napoleon, son of Louis, ex-King of Holland, was born in Paris on the 20th of April, 1808. His god-parents were the Emperor and Maria Louisa, and during his childhood he was an especial favorite of the former. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he stood beside him on the Champ de Mars, and when embraced by him for the last time, at Malmesbury, the young Louis, then a boy of seven years, wished to follow him at all hazards. When the family was banished from France, his mother removed to Augsburg, where he received a good German education. He was afterwards taken to Switzerland, where he obtained the right of citizenship, and commenced a course of military studies. After the July Revolution, by which he was a second time proscribed from France, he visited Italy in company with his brother, and in 1831 took part in a popular insurrection against the Pope. This movement failed, but he succeeded in making his escape, and, his brother dying at Forli the same year, he visited England, and afterward returned to Switzerland, where, for two or three years, he contented himself with writing political and military works, which do not appear to have been extensively read. The death of the Duke of Reichstadt, in 1832, gave a new impulse to his ambitious hopes. His first revolutionary attempt, at Strasbourg, in October, 1836, completely failed, but after a short imprisonment in Paris, he was sent to this country. The illness of his mother occasioned his return the following year, and after a visit to Switzerland he took up his residence in England until his second attempt at Boulogne, in 1840.

In this affair several of his followers were killed, and he was himself taken and sentenced to imprisonment for life in the Castle of Ham. The particulars of his escape in May, 1846, after an incarceration of six years, are well known. From that time until the end of September last, when he was returned as a Deputy to the National Assembly from the Department of the Seine, he has resided in England. A late London journal, in describing his mode of life, gives the following not very flattering account:

"He was unscrupulous in contracting obligations which were wholly beyond his means of repayment; and his most serious pursuit was the study of alchemy, by which he expected to arrive at the discovery of the philosopher's stone. So vigorously did he prosecute this exploded science, at a house which he had fitted up as a laboratory at Camberwell, and so firm was his faith in the charlatan empiric, whom he employed to aid him in transmuting the baser metals into gold, that he is said to have actually appropriated his revenues in anticipation, and to have devoted the first milliard of his gains in the payment of the national debt of France, in order to acquire thus an imperial throne by purchase!"

The large majority by which he was elected a representative astonished every one, and gave his followers the first encouragement to bring forth his name as a candidate for the Presidency. To defeat the acknowledged Republican party, he received also the support of the Legitimists and the Orleanists, and those combined influences have elected him by an immense majority. The rest must be left to Time and fate.

SLEEP-WALKERS.

A BUTCHER'S boy about sixteen years old apparently in perfect health, after dozing a few moments in his chair, suddenly started up and began to employ himself about his usual avocations. He had saddled and mounted his horse, and it was with the greatest difficulty that those around him could remove him from the saddle and carry him within doors. While he was held in the chair by force, he continued violently in the act of kicking, whipping and spurring. His observations regarding orders from his master's customers, and the payment at the turnpike gate, were seemingly rational. The eyes, when opened were perfectly sensible to light. It appears that flagellation even had no effect in restoring the patient to a proper sense of his condition. The pulse in this case was one hundred and thirty, full and hard; on the abstraction of thirty ounces of blood it sank to eighty, and diaphoresis ensued. After laboring under this frenzy for the space of an hour, he became sensible; was astonished at what he was told had happened, and stated that he recollected nothing subsequent to his having fetched some water and moved from one chair to another, which indeed he had done, immediately before his delirium came on.

"In the monastery of —, this story was told to a party of Alpine travelers, to beguile one winter's evening:

"A melancholy nobleman of Italy, Signor Augustus, walked generally at the waning of the moon. The walk was always preceded by his lying on his back with his eyes fixed and open. At this time the beatings of his heart were scarcely susceptible. During this state he noticed none of his companions around him: but if any noise was made by them, his steps were hurried and agitated, and if the noise was increased, a sort of maniacal state was induced. In his sleep he would saddle and mount his horse, he would listen at a key-hole if he heard noises in another room, and, if he entered his billiard room, he would seem to be playing with the cue. On returning to his bed, he usually slept for ten hours after his walk. Tickling would always arouse him.

In a Gazette of Augsburg, I have read this sad story. "Dresden was the theatre of a melancholy spectacle on the 20th ult. As early as seven in the evening a female was seen walking on the roof of one of the loftiest houses in the city, apparently occupied in preparing some ornaments as a Christmas present. The house stood, as it were, alone, being much higher than those adjoining it, and to draw her from her perilous situation was impossible. Thousands of spectators had assembled in the streets. It was discovered to be a handsome girl, nineteen years of age, the daughter of a master baker, possessing a small independence bequeathed to her by her mother. She continued her terrific promenade for hours, at times setting on the parapet and dressing her hair. The police came to the spot, and various means of preservation were resorted to. In a few minutes the street was thickly strewn with straw, and beds called for from the house but the heartless father, influenced by the girl's stepmother, refused. Nets were suspended from the balcony of the first floor, and the neighbors fastened sheets to their windows. All this time the poor girl was walking in perfect unconsciousness, sometimes gazing towards the moon, and at others singing or talking to herself. Some persons succeeded in getting on the roof but dared not approach her, for fear of the consequences if they awoke her. Towards eleven o'clock she approached the very verge of the parapet, leaned forward, and gazed upon the multitude beneath. Every one felt that the moment of the catastrophe had arrived. She rose up, however, and returned calmly to the window by which she had got out. When she saw there were lights in the room, she uttered a piercing shriek, which was re-echoed by thousands, below, and fell dead into the street."

BALDER'S HILL.—Not far from the village Tune, in the district of Roskilde, is the mountain in which Balder is reported to have been buried. Saxo asserts, that once when several countrymen, under the guidance of a professor of the black art, went to this hill for the purpose of digging up a treasure, it seemed to them, when most busied at the work, that a foam-flood, with much noise, was precipitating itself down from the top of the hill; whereupon, in the greatest terror, they cast away their spades, and each sought for safety in flight.

HANEBIERG.—In the parish of East Lyum, in Slesvig, is a hight called Hanebjerg, and not far from it is a fairy-moss. A young peasant once lay down upon this moss, and slept so long, that he awoke very late at night, when he heard around him the most enchanting music, and, looking up, he perceived two fairy maidens, who skipped and danced about, and asked him, in the meantime, several questions, in order to make him speak; but he knew well that there would be danger in doing so, and was silent. Then suddenly changing their manner, they sung in menacing tones:

This instant rise and speak to us,
Thou young and handsome swain,
Or we with knives thy breast will rip,
And cut thy heart in twain.

He was much terrified when he heard this, and was just going to speak; but a cock at that moment crowed from the top of the neighboring hill, and the fairies immediately vanished; from which circumstances the hill is called Hanebjerg, (Cock's hill.)

THE SHOPKEEPER OF AALBORG.—Once when a raging fire broke out in the town of Aalborg, and the flames had just seized the warehouse of a shopkeeper, so that his whole property was on the point of being consumed, he snatched his weights and measures from the counter, and, with these in his hand, he hurried into the middle of the street, crying, 'In case, O God! I have ever with weight and measure robbed and cheated any one, then let the fire consume my house; but if I have always acted with probity and integrity, preserve then my goods, and dwelling.' And no sooner had he said this than the fire died away, and his house escaped. He caused this inscription to be placed over his door, 'I was on the brink of a precipice, but I did not fall down. Anno 1663, d. 11 Augusti.'

THE SEAL.—It is a common belief in Ferroe, that the seal every ninth night casts off its skin, assumes a human shape, and dances and amuses itself after the human fashion, until it resumes its skin, and becomes a seal again. It chanced once that a man passed by while this was taking place, and when he saw the skin he took it up and hid it. When the seal, who was a female, could not find her skin to creep into, she was obliged to continue in her human shape; and, as she was comely to look at, the same man made her his wife, had several children by her, and lived with her very comfortably. But, after the lapse of a long time, the woman found her concealed skin, and could do then nothing less than creep into it, and become a seal again.

A WITTY KNAVE.—A fellow who claimed acquaintanceship with almost every gaoler of the kingdom, went into a shop on Ludgate-hill to purchase some lace, when he told the shopman that a piece that reached from one of his ears to the other would serve him. Having accordingly made the agreement with the man of tape, he began to measure, observing 'that one of his ears was nailed to the pillory at Bristol.'

THE PROGRESS OF LIFE.—A man is thirty years old before he has any settled thoughts of his fortune—it is not completed before fifty. He falls to building in his old age, and dies by the time his house is in a condition to be painted and glazed.—Bruyere.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1849.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EMMA OF WARSAW.—A package has been ready for this lady for several weeks, but we know not how to forward it. Will she inform us how we can get it to her?

Miss E. B.—The Philozatheans are an Order of Lady Odd-Fellows, a society calculated to do much good. Information regarding them may be had by addressing Miss EMELINE GARDNER, No. 101 Forsyth street, New-York. Here is the form of application for a Charter:

The undersigned Ladies being desirous of availing ourselves of the advantages of your Order, and of extending its principles, would respectfully request that a Charter be granted us for opening an Association at —, in the County of —, and State of —, to be called — Association No. —. The amount for Charter Fee, &c., are herewith remitted. Respectfully submitted,
Date. In Friendship, Love and Truth.

THIS IS THE SEASON FOR CHARITY

Yes, this is the season for charity. The cold weather of the last three or four weeks must have been severely felt by the poor, especially in our large cities. Every where do we meet the sons and daughters of misfortune, and every where do they call upon us for help. How many thousands during the few past weeks have been reduced to the last extremity of want. Sick and despairing fathers, with no resources, dying in the midst of starving children! Widowed mothers shivering in garrets or cellars, toiling from earliest morning light, till the latest evening hour, to obtain a scanty supply of bread for their suffering little ones! Orphans, and those more unfortunate than orphans, the children of drunken parents, deprived of all the joys of home, the comforts and security which ought always to surround childhood and youth, driven by their despair and misery, by cold and hunger, to the practice of criminal trades!

These are real pictures, and one need go but a few steps from the place where we are now writing, to see them all, in all the blackness of their coloring! From the heart of our city, a mighty voice of suffering comes up, and seems to say, "In Christ's name, brothers, a little charity." And are we not their brethren?—are they not ours? Hath not "God made of one blood all nations of men to dwell together on the face of the earth?" "True, most true!" all are ready to say, but, alas! how few are ready to acknowledge this in practice. The fortunate classes of society have ever been prone to pass by the poor and suffering, like the priest and Levite, without pity, without affording relief, to the disgrace of their profession as Christians, and their dignity as men.

Remember, O you, who dwell in palaces of marble or granite—you who sit on soft couches and by warm fires, remember what a debt you owe to him from whom you have received these distinctions. Remember that He has imposed on you the sublime duty of charity. Remember too, that an everlasting and terrible curse will rest on you and yours, if you are false to that sacred duty.

"Think how for good or evil an endless chain pervades our human being, of which each of us is a link, and that the strong might have lifted up the bowed down and weak, and averted much of the guilt and misery of the world. Here in our midst and all around us, is a field for nobler work than ever called the warrior to battle, in which the poorest may be a missionary bearing something of good in his heart, on his tongue, or in his hands. Think kindly of the poor, they are our brothers."

And to you of the "mystic tie," allow us to say, be ministers of charity. Seek out the humble, the poor, the miserable, and kindle the fires of hope and comfort on their desolate hearths. Be protectors of the lone widow and those who have none to help them, fathers to the fatherless, eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, and then, in that day which is coming to all, a voice sweeter than the music of the spheres, will say to you, "Come, ye BELOVED of the Father—for I was hungry ye fed me, I was naked and ye clothed me, I was thirsty and ye gave me to drink, I was sick and in prison and ye visited me. Come, ascend to your reward!"

THE PROSPECTS OF THE ORDER.

THERE never was a time when the Order of Odd-Fellows could reckon on the future with more security, and with fairer prospects of success than the present. It appears that there are now about thirteen hundred Lodges in the United States, and nearly one hundred and fifty thousand contributing members. Notwithstanding the difficulties in the State of New-York, and the unfortunate division consequent thereon, the Order has been steadily advancing, and has lost none of its energy—none of its power to combat selfishness and want, and to carry comfort and peace, and security to its members.

The prosperity of the fraternity is to be attributed mainly to the peculiarity of its organization. The first lesson an Odd-Fellow is taught is that of obedience to the laws of the constituted authorities. The idea of UNITY is the very ground and basis of the Order, and this unity is secured by reverence of and obedience to the supreme head of the Order. Odd-Fellows should remember this, and not be tempted by local or individual considerations to lay a sacrilegious hand upon this bond of our unity.

The mission of Odd-Fellowship is not yet half achieved. Even here, it has just commenced its works of beneficence and charity. Not only, therefore, among us has it a great labor to perform, but a new and immense sphere of operation opens before it, in the gold-sprinkled territory of the west. In the Sandwich Islands there are already Lodges, and we do not doubt that society there is much improved by its influence. It has also planted its foot in Oregon, and is at this moment penetrating California. At San Francisco, Lodges will be instituted directly. Masonic Lodges, we believe, are already in operation there, and in the absence of civil law, the influence of these two kindred Orders must be exceedingly salutary.

Before the next session of the Grand Lodge of the United States, we expect to have reports from Oregon, the Sandwich Islands and California, regarding the extension of Odd-Fellowship in those regions.

The future, therefore, is bright and clear, and our association will be glorified by new victories obtained over the selfishness and misery of the world.

CHE-QUE-UK LODGE No. —, has recently been instituted at the flourishing village of Valparaiso, Indiana, and the following brothers elected officers: J. Lomax, N. G.; E. Ellis Campbell, V. G.; John Deming, Sec.; Robert G. Flint, Treas. The name of this Lodge, as will be seen, is of Indian origin, and has a very beautiful significance. In the Potawatamie language it means VERY GOOD, and our hope is, that the Lodge, individually and collectively, will never be "any thing else." Any thing that is very good, must succeed.

AN ADDRESS

DELIVERED BEFORE OGDENSBURG LODGE No. 273

On a Public Occasion, at Ogdensburg, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y.—Dec. 1, 1848.

BY CHARLES THOMAS POOLER.

Published in the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule, by a unanimous vote of the members of the Lodge before whom it was delivered. O. ROBINS, Sec.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, OFFICERS AND BROS. OF THE LODGE: Who is my neighbor? The priest has passed by on the other side. The Levite has turned and looked upon the dying man, and unmoved by the sight of his bleeding wounds, untouched by the plaintive sound of his dying moans, departed, leaving him to die unseen, unwept, unpitied and alone. The Samaritan traveller, journeying from a strange land, an enemy in nation, as he rides along the hostile road, catches at the low, faint sound of sorrow, and moved by the natural impulses of a generous heart, hastens to the spot, beholds the sufferer, dresses his wounds, conveys him to a comfortable abode, watches with him through the live long night with a brother's care, and in the morning pays his bill and leaves him a benefit.

Here, Brothers, is the first practical illustration of the principles of Odd-Fellowship, of which we have authentic record. And the deed comes down to us as worthy the notice of Heaven. The simple fact, that a man did as he would be done by, and that too, in an instance of the most extreme and aggravated suffering, that might well have moved the sympathies even of a strong heart, was so remarkable, so wonderful, so noble, and so worthy, that the Savior, ay, God himself, cited it as the fit, full and perfect illustration of his own divine precept enjoined upon man: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." This is the soul of Odd-Fellowship. Its nature, its objects and its duties, have this extent—no more.

We profess no Utopian scheme that has for its object a revolution in society, and the establishment of a new social fabric, that will restore a lost paradise to the inhabitants of earth. We do not claim to have a balm for every sorrow; we do not profess to have invented or discovered a system of organization that proves a universal panacea for the alleviation of all human suffering; nor that we are wielding an omnipotent hand of benevolence, capable of wiping the tears from all faces. Nor do we profess to stand at the head of all other associations in the accomplishment of good, and the exertion of kindly influences, operating upon the heart of man, enlivening his sympathies, reclaiming and recalling him to the acknowledgment and fulfilment of all of his primitive obligations to his Creator and to his fellows. It is religion alone, whose institution is the church, directed by him who governs the universe and knows the secret workings of the soul, that regulates the heart and qualifies man for the discharge of all duty. But we do profess and claim to be an institution, which as a means of administering mutual aid to its members when in sickness and distress, and of extending charity to others, places us at par with every other benevolent association of our country, and entitles us not only to their respect, but to the patronage of their favor and gratitude, for by relieving our own members, we enable them to extend their aid elsewhere, and thus to widen the field of charity and multiply the happy subjects of its kindly offices.

Friendship, Love and Truth, is the motto of our union, and its triple sentiment pervades the great heart of its organization, directing every pulse in its practical operations. "Love thy neighbor as thyself," is the great corner stone upon which the noble structure of our Order has arisen, out of the dark chaos of man's sordid passions, and now stands, peering to the very skies, a monument of Benevolence, built upon the tomb of Selfishness. It stands, like an eternal city set upon a hill, shining by the light of its works, whose beneficent rays, flung out upon the darkness of a world of surrounding sorrow, have already lit up the hearts of suffering thousands with bright, grateful joy; and, like the primal hues of the bow of promise, emblems of eternal truth and goodness, glimmering in the tears upon the orphan's cheek, have transformed them to sparkling gems, fit for the courts of heaven, and which shall adorn the rewarding crown of glory that awaits the head of every good Odd-Fellow.

And that we may the better contemplate the true objects of our institution, and the better define the duties and obligations it imposes upon each of its members, let us for a few moments glance at the past—let us spread out before us the great map of human society, as it was at the time that Odd-Fellowship first began to be known and reckoned among the social organizations of our own country. Were we, as from a lofty eminence, to look abroad upon the varied landscape of human nature, and contemplate only the darker side of the picture, outlined by the hand of sin, and shaded by the black and malignant passions of the human heart, with its vales of woe, and its mountains of sorrow—its rivers of tears, and its fountains of grief—its inhabitants, the gaunt, grim visage of poverty, leering through his ragged lattice—disease, with his fevered lips, and his long fingers, clutching at the heart-strings, and severing the brittle threads of life—blear-eyed intemperance, rolling upon his couch of straw, and writhing in the agonies of delirium tremens—murder, with his red hand, rioting in the blood of innocence; and the whole scene dimmed with the smoke that comes curling, black and poisonous, from the dens of infamy, we might exclaim, “Verily, this is the valley of the shadow of death.” Dark indeed, and overdrawn might seem the picture. And yet its scenes are all exhibited in living realities, and its characters, alas! too faithfully represented in the great drama of human society.

But the picture has its redeeming features. Thickly dotted over its surface, are the bright stars of human associations, emanating from the great source of love and mercy, the cross, their light relieves the map with a brighter, more heavenly shade.

The simple existence of these numerous, almost numberless associations, into which the whole family of mankind is so interwoven as to form a complete net-work of society, is a sufficient argument for the social nature of man. The objects they have in view, afford the most indubitable evidence of his fallen nature, his weak and helpless condition when isolated and alone, and the necessity of assistance in reformation. And the success which has attended their labors, the change which they have wrought in communities, and the world at large, the elevation they have given to man's moral nature, and the happiness and blessings which they have scattered, even into the remotest corners of human degradation and misery, would, if enumerated, form the most powerful and unanswerable sermon that could be preached in favor of their great practical utility.

Each has its own legitimate objects—its peculiar, requisite qualifications for individual membership, its duties, laws, penalties, and its particular mode of operation; but all have the same great, ultimate end in view—individual benefit, and the future “good and welfare” of mankind.

The Christian church, the great orthodox, requires of its members a simple belief in Deity, the Bible, and the Savior. Its subdivisions, under their various appropriate names, require still more of their members; each must subscribe to particular doctrines of faith, become obedient to a particular mode of church government, and live, speak and act under certain restrictions, to overstep which is reprehensible and sinful. These are the most exalted associations ever founded upon the earth; their objects, the highest that can here be attained or conceived—the preparation of fallen man for the presence and society of his God.

The temperance charity is more extensive than the church, because it requires but a single qualification, abstinence from intoxicating drinks, which every individual may at pleasure possess. Here the Christian and the impenitents, the infidel and the minister of God, meet upon common ground, and join their efforts for the reformation of the inebriate and the amelioration of the condition of the millions who have been bound down with an iron servitude, to debasing appetite, by the tyrant alcohol. And yet, no objection is raised against the temperance society, because of its heterogeneous membership! No one disputes the salutary effect of its mighty renovating influence, because the preachers of the gospel and the unrepentant sinners are yoked together, and tugging shoulder to shoulder, at its wheel! And no one reasonably questions the fact that their united efforts have accomplished more for the cause during the last twenty years, than the church could have done in centuries.

The benevolent institutions for the blind, the deaf, the deaf and dumb, and the insane, which characterize and elevate our nation above all others of the globe, have each and all their appropriate objects. Their fields of labor, and their own requisite qualifications for membership. And yet, notwithstanding the successful operations of all these glorious institutions; notwithstanding the state, the church, the asylums, and individual charities have performed their office work, still there has existed a mighty void of unalleviated suffering yet to be filled, ere the sum of general human comfort and happiness be complete.

Alms-house charity extends to none but sworn and legalized paupers. And, notwithstanding its ostensible professions, the practical charity of the church seldom reaches beyond the limits of its own pale, and sometimes even the remotest corners of that respond only with the echoes of unanswered want. The asylums, from their very nature and objects, can extend their aid to none but the blind, the mute and the maniac. The duty of the temperance society is discharged upon the drunkard, the moment he has drained his last cup; its objects end upon him, where his abstinence begins. All have done their office work, and well! and yet the sighs of sorrow and the woe, are not all hushed. The orphans' cries and the widows' moans, have not all been soothed to grateful silence by the kindly tones of benevolence and the caressing hand of sympathy. The poor man could secure himself against the loss of property by fire, but not against the loss of health, by disease or accident. This, from a cursory view, seems to have been the condition of society. And all along the great highway of life, journeying from the cradle to the grave, strewn here and there by the wayside, might be seen the wounded, and the sick, and the suffering; their groans unanswered, and their wants unattended.

The first passes by on the other side; and the Levite, though he turns and looks, shrugs up his shoulders, as if to suppress the rising sympathies of his yielding heart, and passes by on the other side! The widowed mother, by her tearful prayers; the orphan by his tattered garb, and his famished form; the sick man, mingling the groans of his sufferings with the clamoring murmurs of his starving children, as they cluster shivering around the dying embers of a meagre hearth, all speak in a trembling tone of sorrowing thunder in their appeals to the world for a Samaritan! And do they speak in vain? No! he comes; he comes clad in the regalia and bearing the ensigns of Odd-Fellowship: love thy neighbor as thyself; the soul of his precept and the voice of his practice. In the mottoes of his banners, visit the sick, bury the dead, relieve the widow, and educate the orphan, ye read it! This is Odd Fellowship; its objects, of a two-fold nature, preventive, and restorative in their application. The former guards or secures its members against the unhappiness, the suffering, and even the want and wretchedness to which they are liable to be reduced by sickness or misfortunes, were they not the subjects of the benefits of the Order. The latter restores the wife and children of a deceased brother, as nearly as possible to that temporal comfort and enjoyment, of which they have been deprived by the death of a husband and father, and places within the means of the orphan the opportunities of obtaining an education sufficient for an honorable discharge of all the ordinary business transactions in life, and the maintaining of a respectable and useful position in society.

As universal in its extension as the application of its cardinal precept, “Love thy neighbor as thyself,” the field of its labors is the world! It gleams over the mighty field of human suffering, where the other associations which we have enumerated have reaped, and carried off the isolated sheaves to which they were limited by the condition of their services.

Untrammelled and unblinded by the mists and fogs of sectarianism—unrestricted by the idle bickerings of politics and religion—unfettered by the silken purse-strings and gaudy trappings of an inflated aristocracy—unchoked by the vaunting babblings of pedantry—the privileges, blessings and benefits of its membership are freely proffered to all. The farmer and the merchant, the mechanic and the professional man, here meet upon common ground, with a common interest, for a common object—the mutual benefit of each other, and the good and welfare of the Order.

We, like the other associations we have mentioned, have our conditions of membership, our laws, and method of practical operation. But they are less restrictive, and more universal in their application. They are such, and such only, as the wisdom of the venerable pioneers of Odd-Fellowship foresaw, and the successful experience of years have proved, to be essential to its existence, and the accomplishment of the greatest amount of good to its members, and to society at large.

Thus much for the nature of Odd-Fellowship, and now what are its duties? Does it create any new relations between man and his fellow, differing from those established by his Creator? Does it enjoin any new precepts, or establish and enforce any other than the primary obligations between himself and his fellow? I answer, none! “All men are created free and equal,” “Do as you would be done by,” and “Love thy neighbor as thyself,” are immutable truths and precepts, which were as binding upon man before the flood, as they are to-night—as binding upon him before as after his initiation into our Order. Their author was God, and he fixed the extent and duration of their application. And had they been duly heeded, the world had now no need of Odd-Fellowship! But man has wandered from duty. Selfishness and an unhallowed ambition, have usurped the human heart, become the prime movers to thought and action, dictated a new and more convenient code of moral obligations, covered up or effaced the old landmarks of duty, and established a new “code of procedure,” for the attainment of their desired ends—wealth and the self-aggrandizement of popular favor and distinction. These have steeled the heart against another's woe, and too often put to an everlasting sleep its better sympathies, implanted there to act as the faithful monitors to deeds of benevolence and mercy. Odd-Fellowship takes its candidate back to a careful survey of these old landmarks of duty, points out to him the lines from which he may have wandered, and holds out to him the benefits and blessings that will inevitably reward their practical recognition, and if he then voluntarily bind himself to their faithful discharge, he becomes an Odd-Fellow. Thus the bond of Odd-Fellowship is simply a voluntary pledge to the Order to recognize and discharge, at all times, an original duty, contained in the injunction, “Love thy neighbor as thyself,” which pledge, when given, places him upon his honor as a man, under a new, but secondary obligation to the Lodge, for its faithful fulfilment.

And yet, we have our opponents! One of the futile objections urged against our Order, is, that its benefits are confined to its own members. Well, be it even so. When they will point us to a single association in the wide world, whose benefits are not thus limited, and which buries its dead, provides for the support of its widows, and the education of its orphans, then, and not till then, shall we deem this accusation worthy a considerate answer. But are its charities thus limited? Let the grateful responses of the sufferers by the destructive fires in our cities relieved by the contributions of our Lodges, let a voice from the vessel that was chartered by Odd-Fellowship, and freighted with its bread for the starving millions in Ireland, answer the question.

It is also urged that our meetings are private, with the sweeping assertion, that no good can result from the secret session of a body of men, who are unwilling to have their transactions pass the ordeal of scrutiny by the public eye. Verily, with such logic might Satan and his legion host condemn the doings of high Heaven, because themselves are refused admission into its holy courts! Premises of ignorance can only lead to conclusions false and blind. The brightest legislative bodies of the country, who hold in trust the nation's weal—the church, in all its branches, which professes to have in charge, the eternal interests of immortal souls, have each and all their secret sessions, when in their wisdom, they believe that their own, and the welfare of society enjoin secrecy upon their transactions. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is the criterion, given by inspiration to man, by which he may sit in judgment upon the works of his fellows, and by this, and this alone, Odd-Fellows are willing have their institution passed upon by the world.

And though we would not boast our good works, for the sake of winning popular favor, yet as the utility of our institution is sometimes questioned by our opponents, it may not be out of place here to mention the results of the workings of Odd-Fellowship for a single year. The report of the G. L. of the U. S., which is the aggregate of the reports and returns from each of the Subordinate Lodges in the States, certified by their respective officers and seals, may be implicitly relied upon for the truth and correctness of its statements. This annual report for the year ending June 30, 1847, shows that at that time there were 1,892 Lodges in the United States; the whole number of contributing members, 118,961; 82,794 were initiated during the year, and 421 expelled. The revenue, or receipts, for that year, were $888,606. The number of brothers relieved was 16,762, to whom was paid as benefits, $227,850; number of widowed families relieved, 1,476, to whom was paid $81,184; number of brothers buried, 896, for which was paid, $86,385; amount paid for the education of orphans, $6,822; making the total amount paid for relief during that year, $802,248.

Thus works the institution which has been so often denounced by the prejudiced and ignorant, as having a demoralizing tendency, and productive of no good whatever. But thanks to Him, who sustains every good cause through the darkest hour, a brighter day has dawned upon Odd-Fellowship.

The prayers and blessings ascending to heaven, from the altars of twenty thousand grateful hearts, last year relieved by its benefits, now invoking prosperity to our Order, shall not all remain unanswered. Alone, by the light of the low dying ember,

While sweet on her bosom her infant has slept,
On many a lone night, in her desolate chamber,
The widow, in sorrow and hunger, has wept.

False friends at the breath of misfortune, departed,
When most there was needed their kindness and care;

The Priest and the Levite—alone, broken-hearted,
Had left her, to weep and to pray in despair.

But hope, though it set in darkness and sorrow,
The spirit of love will its portals unbar;
Again it hath dawned, with a heavenly morrow,
And high in meridian gleams its bright star.

Lo! gladdens the heart of the sorrowing mother,
Her orphans, in hunger, no longer shall cry,
In Friendship and Love, the Samaritan brother Hath come to her aid; for he passeth not by.

Mothers, wives, sisters and friends, most cordially do we welcome you here to-night. To you, to your sympathy, to your countenance, and to your influence are we greatly indebted for the success that has, thus far, attended our institution. And yet we have to admit that your rejected claims for membership with us, form an objection to our Order, which, from its nature, is worthy of a careful and candid consideration. If Odd Fellowship be what it professes, an institution of benevolence, and the asylum of the suffering, the abode of charity, where kindness and sympathy hold their soothing sway, why is woman, "the last at the feet of the Cross and the first at the door of the tomb," excluded from its councils? Why is she, who, in every enlightened age, has, from the very nature of her endowments, kindness, affection and tender sympathies, ever been regarded as the representative of the principles upon which our Order is founded, why is she who is so eminently qualified to carry out its principles, denied even the privilege of its membership?

These are questions which, at first, would appear to admit of none but an unreasonable and an untruthful answer. And yet there is an answer, which, I doubt not, all whom I have the honor to address, will, with me, deem not only plausible but correct, and, consequently, satisfactory. And, paradoxical as it may seem, that answer is found in the fact of her pre-eminent qualifications! The objects of Odd Fellowship, as we have seen, are to bring man back to primitive duties from which he has wandered.

Woman has never thus wandered from these primitive obligations. The befitting scenes of her life have been in a milder sphere. Shut out from all the rough and sterner duties of the business transactions of the world; by the customs and usages of society protected and secured from the baleful influences of traffic and gain, the rivalry of political, and the glory of military ambition, her heart remains uncalled, unhardened by the thousand influences to which man is exposed, and that have made him an apt and devoted pupil in the iron-hearted school of selfishness and sordid avarice.

True as the magnet to the pole is woman's sympathy to the voice of duty. And as the silken fibres of the Æolian harp respond with a soothing sound to the gentlest zephyr's sigh, so do the chords of that most mysterious of all instruments, a woman's heart, ever and quick to respond to the faintest sigh of sorrow. She never, like the Levite, looks upon suffering, and passes by on the other side. Here we have the reason why it were useless for her to become an Odd Fellow. She is accomplishing, and with an equal efficiency, the same objects out of the Lodge, and that we are within it. And we as good Odd Fellows, ever grateful for her influence in our favor, and for her presence at our public exercises, are sworn by our very pledge to profit by her example, in the discharge of every duty enjoined in the precept, "love thy neighbor as thyself."

We have remarked that Odd-Fellowship recognizes no distinctions, and is no respecter of persons. This is the nature, and as far as possible the letter of its Constitution. It is true, that political and religious distinctions have never yet obtained the pass-word for admission into the Lodge-room. It never will, if all the influences which are brought to bear upon human nature in the outer world, warping the judgment with prejudice, and swerving the will with self-interest, could as readily be thrown off at the threshold of the ante-room. But there have been growing proofs in the history of the G. Lodge, that this is not the case. The interest and prosperity of Subordinate Lodges have also suffered detriment from the same causes. It has been well, though perhaps quaintly remarked, that every paradise is the abode of a devil. In other words, every human institution, however sacred its objects, however noble and elevated its character, and however well disposed in the outset, sincere and zealous are its members, it has an evil genius within itself to contend with, which, if it do not ultimately defeat the objects of the institution, by destroying the unity and harmony of its operations, will, nevertheless, do much to retard its progress, to circumscribe its influence, and limit the happy results that would otherwise have followed.

Brothers: I am wholly unacquainted with the history of the worthy Lodge which I have the honor, this evening, briefly to address. I know not, and so far as the delicacy of speaking against the evils to which I allude, is concerned, I care not whether they have shown themselves here; yet for the welfare of your Lodge, whose interests I shall ever regard and defend, I hope they never may, and from what I have learned of your present prosperous condition, I trust they never have.

I allude to the evils of selfishness, and a petty ambition which sometimes seeks the emolument of office, and, aided or seconded by an out-of-the-Lodge aristocracy, will, if fostered, sacrifice "good and welfare" for personal aggrandizement. This is the greatest evil with which any association ever yet had to contend. It springs from a desire or principle, as deeply implanted in the soul, as the hopes of its own immortality; and unless most cautiously and strenuously guarded against by every member, it will, at times, turn his feet from the path of duty, to tread upon forbidden ground, with motives widely foreign to those that directed his hand when he penned his signature to the Constitution. Let it be remembered that there never yet was a body of men associated together for purposes of benevolence, reformation, or social welfare, but that each of its members joined the compact with a direct sacrifice or compromise of some personal or pecuniary interest.

And as long as this liberality of sentiment, this love for the scheme, predominates over every motive of selfishness, so long will success attend the operations of that body, independent of external or foreign causes that may militate against it.

Practical Odd Fellowship, therefore, requires of its members, in and out of the Lodge room, a full free, unreserved, unqualified sacrifice of self upon the altar of "good and welfare." And as long as every heart that throbs beneath the regalia of an Odd Fellow, beats with this generous, noble sentiment, so long will our emblem of unity and strength the bundle of rods, bound by the triple ties of our motto, Friendship, Love, and Truth, have a living illustration, mighty against every foreign foe, and powerful in its own success and continued prosperity.

ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY.

A MEETING was held on Wednesday evening last, at National Hall, for the purpose of considering the plan proposed by Bro. Ralph of Empire Lodge. We most cordially approve of the project, and shall advert to it in detail, hereafter. Meanwhile, we give the following communication:

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD-FELLOWS.
New-York, Dec. 4, 1848.

OFFICERS AND BROTHERS: The undersigned respectfully offer for your consideration, the following plan for the formation of a Library, to be located in this city, and known as the "Odd-Fellows' Library."

The Order in New-York city, Brooklyn and Williamsburgh, number near, if not fully, sixteen thousand, and the advantages to be derived from a well-selected Library are great and many.

It is proposed that a tax of ONE CENT PER WEEK be levied on the membership as above, for which sum each Odd-Fellow becomes a member of the library. By the weekly tax of one cent, (supposing there are 16,000 members) the sum of $8,320 would be raised annually, which could be devoted to the purchase of books, &c., deducting, of course, the current expenses, such as librarians, rents, &c.

By this course, in a few years, a library could be established which would be a credit and a benefit to our Order.

The income would be annually increasing, and a portion of the receipts, after paying the incidental expenses, could be devoted to the purchase of philosophical and other apparatus, and also engage the services of the most eminent talent in the country, so that a course of Lectures could be given annually, on such subjects as would most likely interest the members, and to which they and their families would be entitled to free admission.

A Reading Room could also be established, on the tables of which the sojourning brother would find the current literature of the day.

The income of the institution being large, the best works on all subjects could be obtained, so that in a few years, the library alone would be an inducement for the brightest minds of our country to seek admission within the portals of our Order.

Its cheapness, (fifty-two cents annually,) will at once, recommend it to every person, for no one can at present become a member of a library under 2 or $3 per annum.

The tax could be collected by the Permanent Secretary when the brethren pay their dues, and paid over to such officers as a library committee may designate.

Yours in F. L. and T.
EDWIN S. RALPHS.

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES.

Resolved, That we recommend the foregoing plan of P. G. Ralphs of this Lodge, to the earnest consideration of our sister Lodges.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to confer with similar committees from other Lodges.

JOHN CARTER, N. G.

G. W. SCHRAMM, Secretary, Empire Lodge No. 64, I. O. O. F.

An adjourned meeting, to take into consideration the establishment of an "Odd-Fellows Library," will be held at the Lodge Room, 38 Canal-st., on Wednesday evening, 24th inst., at 7 o'clock.

At the last meeting, the following resolution was passed:

"That the various committees be requested to bring up the subject in their Lodges, and report the number of Brothers who are willing to co-operate in the establishment of said Library."

ON DITS ABOUT OURSELVES.

THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION.—This work, devoted to Odd-Fellowship, Literature, &c., commences a new volume with the current year, and appears in a new and beautiful dress, and much enlarged. The reading matter is mainly original, and is ably written. We only regret that our talented brother who edits it, should sustain the G. L. of the U. S. in the high-handed power usurped by it in attempting to render null and void the New Constitution adopted by the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows in this State. With this exception, as an acceptable literary and family paper, it has no superior.

The above is from the Ballston Democrat, a well conducted and interesting journal, which we are happy to number among our exchanges. As to our course in relation to the unhappy controversy in this State, we have only followed what we conscientiously considered our duty. Our brother of the Democrat has his view of the case—we ours; but we will shake hands, brother, for all that. So we wish you a thousand happy new years.

ANOTHER.—The Cabotville Mirror, an excellent paper, which we always peruse with pleasure, has the following:

THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION, GOLDEN RULE, AND ODD-FELLOWS' FAMILY COMPANION, published every Saturday, by J. R. Crampton, at 44 Ann-st., New York. Terms, $2 a year. This is one of the best papers devoted to the spread of the doctrines of Odd-Fellows, and we are glad to witness its new dress and otherwise improved appearance, commencing with 1840. May its shadow never be less.

MAGNOLIA LODGE.—A statement of facts, regarding the re-instatement of this Lodge, has been prepared by a committee of the Lodge, and will appear in our next, being too late for our present issue.

HOMER, N. Y.—Officers elect of Homer Lodge No. 280: Owen Bowen, N. G.; Wm. L. Sherman, V. G.; Geo. B. Sames, Sec.; G. C. Babcock, Treas.; Josiah Patterson, P. S.

Tioughnioga Lodge No. 263: Wm. B. Allen, N. G.; G. K. Stiles, V. G.; R. H. Duel, Sec.; Hosea Ballou, Treas.; J. M. Seaman, P. S.

LIONS OF THE TOWN.—Mr. C. G. Graham, our neighbor at 38 Ann-st., is, in his "Lions of the Town," hurling thunderbolts at the heads of the scoundrels of the city. Beware! Mephistopheles is here, unroofing the houses. He sees all—all.

EXCURSIONS DURING THE HOLIDAYS.

Christmas in Delaware—Debtors' Laws—A Reformed Gambler—Odd-Fellows—J. Bayard Taylor and Italy.

It is Christmas day. It snows. Nature is silent, and dressed in the wintry mantle. All is quiet and dull around me. I hear but the tedious croaking of the crows, flying in search of some miserable prey. The chit-chat here is about weddings, which are in great numbers; and it is difficult to find divines enough to bless the union of the girls and boys of Delaware State. This morning I had the honor of being introduced to a young bride, united last evening in hymen's bands. I asked the fresh spouse how she had passed the night. She informed me that she had not slept, and had a most dreadful headache.

Here in this small State, although the people are civilized and sociable, still there are laws which belong rather to barbarous ages and countries than to a flourishing and beautiful country like this. I mean the "Poor Debtor's Law." If a poor father of a family is indebted for any small amount, the amiable sheriff enters the house, takes possession of all the furniture, and the unfortunate man is deprived of his shelter, and exposed, with his wife and children, to enjoy in the open air the charms of a winter night.

In the small city of Newark, the Odd-Fellows society has a Lodge, and is increasing very rapidly all over the State. It shows that civilization and charity takes the place of bigotry and sectarianism, and in a short time there will be more Lodges here. The Lord be praised.

Mr. Tea is a reformed gambler, although he had "done" but once, and was so much satisfied with the first play, that he left gambling forever. Mr. Tea is a young man of five and twenty. Having lost his father, he dreamed that with eighteen thousand dollars, he could beat all the gamblers in the United States, and with such intention he left, some years ago, his humble farm to accomplish his mission with the gentlemen of Philadelphia. Arrived at the hotel, he asked for Mr. Milk, and it happened that he introduced himself to the same person, who introduced himself as Mr. Coffee, and desirous to "do" with him. They retired to a private room, where, after twelve hours of "doing," the young Delawarean lost half of his fortune, not satisfied with having seen the elephant. He was in despair, and thought that there was no more hope of a better future for him. Suicide was his only resource. The old gambler, seeing the despair of this novice, with all the dignity of a clergyman, said, "Young man, I am Mr. Milk, the very person with whom you were so anxious to become acquainted. Although a gambler by profession, I refuse to accept your money, and I am inclined to return it to you, with the condition that you shall 'do' no more. I wish I could return to society as pure as I was some years ago; but that is impossible. Believe me, deceived youth, take your money and go back to your friends, and live happy with your widowed mother." The novice accepted the advice and money, and left the gambling life. He is now a wealthy farmer, and husband of a most lovely and beautiful wife.

From Delaware I passed into Maryland, where I saw the country people far less advanced than in the former State. It was on Sunday when I arrived at Elton, a small town of two or three hundred families, situated in a most charming place on the Elton river. From what I could see and learn, the inhabitants are civil and hospitable, fond of good society, and of foreigners of a respectable appearance. At the Washington Hotel, where I met two charming young ladies, one the daughter of the landlord, Mr. T., and the other a niece, I was told that there was a great revival among the Odd-Fellows, who have three Lodges, and are building another, in order to increase and extend their philanthropic society, as well as to alleviate the miseries of humanity. Should the editor of the Gazette send an agent to Elton, I assure him many new subscribers in this pleasant town, and to make more proselytes to the noble and charitable institution of Odd-Fellowship.

I left Elton the same day, with the hope of returning there next summer. At Creek Hundred I assisted at a Temperance meeting, held in a tavern. The bar-tender was called to occupy the seat as chairman. He began to show and explain the evils of drinking liquor, and the advantage of swallowing cold water in cold weather, and ended his famous bombast by announcing to his hearers his sacred promise to reform, and to sell no more alcoholic liquors next year. The next called to the chair, by unanimous applause, and amid shouts of "hurrah for brandy-water!" was a Baptist clergyman, as red as the children of the Sun, who insisted that a petition should be sent to the Legislature at Dover, to change the name of the memorable river Brandywine to Fresh-water river. He was hissed, and the crowd insisted that he should be put down.

New Year's day! Some years ago I was many thousand miles from Delaware, where this great day is consecrated to the worship of Christ. Here I saw people working in the fields, without any regret for the beginning of the new year, and without any desire to celebrate the circumcision of the chief of their religion. Although I am not very scrupulous in religious matters, I prefer Catholics to Protestants in this way: Catholics have more respect and faith for the mysteries and symbols of the Christian religion. Not being able to find a Church open, I spent new year's day in Pennsylvania, with a respectable and interesting Quaker family.

"Mr. H., I introduce to you Mr. S.," said Mr. T., a fine, humorous fellow.

"How does thee do, S.? art thou from Italy or from Jerusalem?"

"I am from Italy," said I, "and I have been to Jerusalem."

"Is thee a Christian, or a Philosopher?"

"Well, I am between the two."

"Thou art a fine man. Thee belongs to my faith. Are thy father and mother living?"

I passed a most happy day in H.'s family. He has a large farm, and everything in and out of the house shows that there reigns peace, order, love and simplicity. Mr. H. insisted that I should remain longer, but I declined, and went further into Chester county. I passed the rest of my sporting days reading and re-reading J. Bayard Taylor's works; and his travels and poems were more interesting to me, as I was almost in sight of the house where so great a writer was born.

Taylor, like Franklin and Horace Greeley, is born from humble and respectable country people, and has attained with his wonderful talents, the reputation of one of the best modern poets and prose writers. His book on Europe is the most interesting and accurate work about foreign nations, till now, by any American traveler. This young man is a gift to his nation, and an honor to his native State. His literary and political productions are of great value to the Tribune and Saturday Evening Post, and his editorial articles on foreign policy, are certainly superior to any other papers. Reading his ballads and poems, published lately by Putnam, I see that Taylor, like Lamartine and Byron, speaks of modern Rome as the city of dead empires, and thinks that Rome has been turned by the Popes, into a "Wreck of the fallen world—

Ghost of the mighty past."

The future, perhaps, will teach my friend Taylor that in Rome all is not death. There is still a volcano, which is destined to burst in the present year, and the time is not far distant when Taylor, with his wonderful genius, shall consecrate some of his poetical and beautiful thoughts to the awakening and resurrection of Rome.

I was surprised to find the Philadelphia Saturday Post in almost every family I visited in different States of the Union. With such contributors as Taylor, and the charming Grace Greenwood, with its talented editor, Mr. Peterson, this weekly paper will have the largest circulation in America. I shall write you a few more lines of the beauties of traveling on the Philadelphia and Baltimore railroad.

G. F. SECCHI DE CANALI.

FOREIGN MISCELLANY.

FRANCE has elected a President. Louis Napoleon obtained the superiority over Cavaignac, and, having sworn before the National Assembly to maintain the Republic, and to restore to the Government the moral force of which it stood in need, he was proclaimed President of France, with unanimous cries of "Vive la Republique." A Bonaparte is once more at the head of this powerful nation. He has triumphed over his enemies, and his election has surprised even his admirers. He was born in Paris, on the 20th of April, 1808, and had for sponsors the Emperor and Empress of France. The ceremony of his baptism took place two years after his birth, with unusual splendor; yet young, he was exiled from France with his family, and fought in 1831 for the Italian cause. Every one is acquainted with his life, full of adventures and of romantic events. From prisoner of Louis Philippe, he has become the Chief Magistrate of France, while the old king has returned into exile, to learn better that lesson which he had been taught previous to his elevation to the throne of France. Louis Napoleon is called to fulfil, at present, a most important post; and we hope that he may have the power, knowledge and ability to support its requirements.

SPAIN is in a state of disorder—of civil wars—of partial insurrections and conspiracies. Bands of Carlists, headed by the cruel Cabrera, are desolating this unfortunate land. Narvaez is yet Prime Minister, and his first policy was to exile his more powerful enemies. He will be the absolute master of Spain until Christina shall rule over the queen daughter. The Cortes were opened by Isabella in person. She said that she believed a friendly alliance would be established between her kingdom and Great Britain, and declared that all her attempts had proved useless in connection with the emperor of Russia.

ITALY is again on the eve of declaring war against Austria, and everything in that country announces the approaching struggle with the barbarians of the North. In Lombardy, Gen. Radetsky continues to shoot as many liberals as he can find. The people are in the most pitiful and desolate condition; they wait for the neighboring States to march to their salvation. The Croats, who attempted to take Malghera, near Venice, were repulsed by the Venitians, after two fierce and bloody attacks. This heroic republic has received from Genoa a succor of 600,000 francs. In Piedmont, they are making the necessary disposals to renew the war in Lombardy. The ancient retrograde ministry were dismissed, and a democratic and popular one was elected by the people, and sanctioned by the king. The policy of the present government is to establish a national confederacy all over Italy; to proclaim Italy independent and united, and to expel the barbarians of Austria coute qui coute. Gioberti, the most talented and popular man in Italy, is president of the council of the Piedmontese ministry, and of the Italian confederacy. He has ordered the troops in Genoa to evacuate the city, and to march to the frontier of Lombardy. At the sitting of the Chamber of Deputies in Turin, the law for the re-union of the Duchies of Piacenza, Parma and Modena, was adopted by the whole Chamber, and Castel S. Giovanni has been fixed as the place where the volunteers of the other States of Italy should assemble. Turning from the North to the South of the Peninsula, we find that the revolution in the Roman States is proceeding with more quietude than might have been anticipated from so excitable a race as the modern Romans. A new deputation has been sent to Pius IX, at Gaeta, and although the king of Naples endeavored to prevent the deputies being admitted to the Pope, they succeeded, by writing in obtaining an ultimatum from the ex-sovereign of Rome. Previous to this there appeared in Rome some chance to enter into a friendly negotiation with the Pontiff; but as soon as the conditions of Pius IX were known to the people, they marched to the capitol, headed by Cicerovacchio. Here Sterbini, one of the new ministers, read in a loud voice the answer of His Holiness; that the present ministry should be dismissed, and the National Guard and Chamber of Deputies be disbanded. The Pope ended his famous ultimatum by expressing the wish to suppress the journals! The people and deputies declared unanimously that the Pope had forfeited his temporal power, and Sterbini added that the Pope should be permitted to return to Rome, as Bishop of the Eternal City, and that entrance should be interdicted to all the Cardinals and Prelates. A provisional government was established, and there seems to be no other chance for a Papal restoration, than the armed intervention of the Roman Catholic powers, which we should think that none of them will run the risk of attempting.

NAPLES AND SICILY are in the same hostile position as the past two months. Sicily has refused the humiliating proposals of the tyrant of Naples, and is determined to trust her great cause to her sacred rights, and to the events of a new war. The Sicilians have given proof to the world, since a year of independence, that they are capable of self government, and will never submit themselves to the iron sway of their most odious oppressor. The King and his family are at Gaeta courting the Pope, and Pius IX, in his turn, blesses the soldiers and navy of the assassins of the Sicilians. Well done, Pius IX, you bless the arm of the enemy of your country, and of your own person. O tempora! O mores!

HUNGARY has lost several battles with the Austrians, but the country and people are not yet conquered. The fierce Magyar hordes will give more trouble to their enemies, and this war will cost Austria more troops and misery than during the revolutions of the Empire. Nothing certain is known from the seat of war; the skirmishes between the hostile parties are very sanguinary, as we see by the bulletin of the great number of Austrian officers who have been brought in wounded to Vienna.

AUSTRIA is engaged in the hard war with Hungary and is approaching the moment that this power will be called to fight in the plains of Italy. Executions against single individual continues to take place in Vienna; the people of this city are more sentimental than political, and the assassinations and innocent murders of Windischgratz's court martial disgust them more than despotism. The public treasure is reduced to sixty millions of florins and the young Emperor could not obtain a loan of twenty more to pay the expenses of the war, and of the sieges of different cities. The Austrian Deputies at Frankfort have left their seats, as there is no more chance of unity between Austria and the rest of Germany. The Emperor has refused to acknowledge the new German law relating to bills of exchange; to contribute toward the expenses of building a German fleet, one of the most cherished objects of German patriots who shout about the unity of Fatherland.

PRUSSIA seems destined to become the center of German nationality, and the King, who has allowed a liberal constitution to his people, is prepared to put himself at the head of the German nation and proclaim himself chief of the German Empire. The King is prepared for such a result, and his partisans in Frankfort and in other parts of Germany begin to discover, for the first time, that there may be a united Germany independently of Austria. From the last dates we have no news from the unfortunate Poland. The project of uniting this nation in a single kingdom seems to have been rather the idea of some editor than the allied powers. The Minister of the Interior in Berlin has addressed a circular to the civil and provincial authorities, thanking them for the zealous support they have given the government; and General Wrangel has also published a formal acknowledgment of the contributions of money and provisions sent in for the use of the troops by the citizens of Berlin. The best understanding reigns between the King and the Prussian people.

DENMARK has been the seat of popular insurrections and bloody riots between the troops and the people; in Hadersleben fresh riots have taken place, and the dragoons were attacked by a large number of armed peasants. The people fired upon the soldiers, and after some time the rioters were dispersed.

From Schleswig-Holstein we learn that the Danes have marched 6,000 troops to the island of Alsten, and it appears, in fact, that hostilities between the Danish and German parties are as bitter as ever.

RUSSIA having refused to acknowledge Isabella as the legitimate queen of Spain has given orders to the ambassador to leave Petersburg without obtaining a single interview with the sovereign. The emperor is extremely busy in writing autograph letters, and so sent couriers to the king of Naples, and complains that he cannot offer any physical help to his amiable friend the bloody tyrant of the two Sicilies.

ENGLAND at the present time does not offer any interesting event. There the Chartists continue secretly their plotting, while Ireland dies away in starvation.

EGYPT has a new viceroy, Abba Pasha, a young prince who appears to be very popular with the Egyptian tribes. At Suez about 2000 Bedouins of the desert had assembled of their own accord to make their obeisance to Abba Pasha on his return as ruler of Egypt.

INDIA. The intelligence is not of any particular interest. Two forts of considerable strength have been razed by the royal troops, and Moobray, the chief, was in less favorable position, as regards men and supplies, than he had been for some time past. Mahorajah had marched a body of his troops against Chuttur Singh.

LETTER FROM PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 13, 1849.

WITHIN two weeks we have had our elections in the Subordinate Lodges in this State. So far as our city and county are concerned, we have had no difficulty in the whole matter, as near as we can learn. Every thing has gone off smoothly. The V. Gs. assume a new position, and the P. N. Gs. have now a right to enter the Sanctum Sanctorum of the G. L. of the I. O. of O. F. of Pennsylvania. The Subordinate Officers come in their turn, and although the probation is considered by some to be too long, still, terms of office must expire, and old incumbents will be rotated into new ones, at the earliest possible convenience prescribed by the Constitution. During our election week, every thing passed off well. We can have no difficulties that will either convulse the nation or cause the world to turn upside down. Louis Napoleon has been elected N. G. of the French nation; he has succeeded to his position through some excitement. We, however, who compose the only genuine fraternity in the world, elect our presiding officers in the utmost good will, and permit no bar of discord to interfere with the solemnity or dignity of our ballot. So may it ever be.

Mrs. DISKINSON.—This talented and beautiful lady has been playing at Baltimore and Richmond, to crowded and delighted houses. She is one of the best actresses in her line of characters, if not the very best, we have ever seen. Those who witnessed her admirable personations at Niblo's last season, will be right glad to see her here again. We never shall forget her Claude Melnotte, Sir Charles Coldstream, and Tom, the Eton Boy. She is to play an engagement soon in Washington.

Literary Notices.

☞ "THE SCALPEL." This is the name of a journal published and edited by E. H. Dixon, M. D. We have perused the No. before us with pleasure and instruction, and most cordially approve of its object and character. While it exposes quackery, and deals giant-blows on all humbuggery, it asserts that medical science, like all other sciences, is subject to the law of progress. Dr. Dixon treats every subject he touches with ability. We hope all our readers will take this work, and read the article in the Jan. No., entitled, "What do we know of Asiatic Cholera?"

☞ "GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK, for 1849." Philadelphia: L. A. Godey, 118 Chestnut street. We have received the January number of this beautiful periodical, and although it seems difficult to maintain through the whole year such superior merit as is manifest, yet we have never known the proprietor to issue a decoy number. Our readers will notice (as is due,) that we attach the epithet beautiful to the work, and not to the January number. All who subscribe may anticipate and realize with each succeeding number, a rich treat, and at the close of the year may possess two elegant volumes, stored with choice gems of literary taste and artistic skill.

The Lady's Dollar Newspaper is also given with the Lady's Book, for $3 00 per annum.

☞ "FRANKLIN ILLUSTRATED." Harper and Brothers. We have received the first number of this work, valuable to the young and the aged, as affording amusement and instruction to the one, and subject for contemplation for both. All who have read the life of Franklin, (and who has not?) wish to read it again. It is printed on fine paper, and will be finished in eight numbers.

☞ "METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW." We have often spoken of the high merit of this publication. The contents of the Jan. No. are unusually rich. The paper on Channing, and the essay on the word Sheol, are exceedingly interesting and instructive.

☞ "THE GREAT HAGGARTY DIAMOND." New York: Harper & Brothers. This is another excellent work from the pen of the talented author of "Vanity Fair." It is full of interest, and deserves an extensive sale.

☞ "SARTAIN'S UNION MAGAZINE." This monthly commences the year under most favorable auspices. The January No. surpasses, in beauty and richness, all its predecessors, and must give satisfaction to the numerous patrons of the work.

A NEW LIGHT.—"In a lecture," says an English paper, "delivered at Crosby Hall, by Mr. Pepper, on the properties and phenomena of magnetism and electricity, the electric light, and the apparatus by which it is produced and regulated, was introduced. The brilliancy of the light is almost beyond what can be conceived of the powers of artificial light—that is, of light produced by scientific means from simple natural causes. It was so vivid as to make the numerous gas-lights by which the hall was illuminated, completely ineffective. Its intensity to those close to it was almost painful, and it was impossible, when the shade or paper screen by which it was surrounded was removed, to look upon it. It is a white or sun-light; there is no yellow tinge, no vapor or smoke, and none of the attendants of light which partake of combustion. The exhibition of this certainly extraordinary light was witnessed by a very crowded company of visitors, who expressed their satisfaction in a marked manner on its merits. The apparatus by which its power is produced and sustained can scarcely be described; it is a piece of mechanism of comparatively simple construction, by which pieces of charcoal, &c., are supplied and adapted; it can only be understood by being seen and inspected. If the generating and regulating powers of this invention can be sustained, and the expenses attendant upon them kept within reasonable bounds, as the patentees assert they can be, this light will at some period supersede all others; and a statistical account affirms that upwards of £25,000,000 is annually expended in England and Wales, for lighting, an important saving to the public.

THE SEA SERPENT NO FICTION.

We find in a late English paper the following from Capt. M'Quhae in relation to the sea serpent. The Captain speaks like an honest person, and we doubt not, did see some uncommon sea monster. And why should we doubt, after all, the existence of such a being? Surely all the wonders of the deep are not yet laid bare. For our part, we are ready to believe that Capt. M'Quhae did see a sea serpent. The Captain's paper is in reply to Prof. Owen, who ridicules his official report. His comments are as follows:

Professor Owen correctly states that I 'evidently saw a large creature moving rapidly through the water, very different from anything I had before witnessed, neither a whale, a grampus, a great shark, an alligator, nor any other of the larger surface swimming creatures, fallen in with in ordinary voyages. I now assert, neither was it a common seal nor a sea elephant, its great length and its totally differing physiognomy precluded the probability of its being a 'Phoca' of any species. The head was flat, and not a 'capacious vaulted cranium'; nor had it a 'stiff inflexible trunk,' a conclusion to which Professor Owen has jumped, most certainly not justified by the simple statement, that 'no portion of the sixty feet seen by us was used in propelling it through the water, either by vertical or horizontal undulation.'

It is also assumed that the calculation of the length was made under a strong preconception of the nature of the beast; another conclusion quite the contrary to the fact. It was not until after the great length was developed by its nearest approach to the ship, and until after that most important point had been duly considered and debated, as well as could be in the brief space of time allowed for so doing, that it was pronounced to be a sea serpent by all who saw it, and by all who are accustomed to judge of lengths and breadths of objects in the sea to mistake a real substance and actual living body, coolly and dispassionately contemplated, at so short a distance, too, for the eddy caused by the action of the deeper immersed fins and tail of a rapidly moving gigantic seal raising its head above the surface of the water, as Professor Owen imagines, in quest of its lost iceberg.

The creative powers of the human mind may be very limited. On this occasion they were not called into requisition, my purpose and desire being, throughout, to furnish eminent naturalists, such as the learned Professor, with accurate facts, and not with exaggerated representations, nor to assure him that old Pontoppidan having clothed his sea serpent with a mane could not have suggested the idea of ornamenting the creature seen from the Dadalus with a similar appendage, for the simple reason that I had never seen his accounts, or even heard of his sea serpent, until my arrival in London. Some other solution must therefore be found for the very remarkable coincidence between us in that particular, in order to unravel the mystery.

Finally, I deny the existence or the possibility of optical illusion. I adhere to the statements as to form, color, and dimensions, contained in my official report to the Admiralty, and I leave them as data whereupon the learned and scientific may exercise the 'pleasure of imagination' until some fortunate opportunity shall occur of making a closer acquaintance with the 'great unknown'—in the present instance most assuredly no ghost.

THE GOLD FEVER.

ALTHOUGH we have no doubts that the accounts from the gold region, regarding the abundance of the precious metal, are mainly true, we must still be permitted to entertain doubts of the success of all these enterprises—at least of a success equal to the sanguine expectations of those engaged in them. Notwithstanding our wishes to the contrary, we fear the following remarks of Prescott, in his history of the Conquest of Peru, will be found to describe with equal accuracy all these gold speculations. We hope for the best, however.

"But now these promises were realized. It was no longer the golden reports that they were to trust, but the gold itself which was displayed in such profusion before them. All eyes were now turned toward the West. The broken spendthrift saw in it the quarter where he was to repair his fortunes as speedily as he had ruined them. The merchant, instead of seeking the precious commodities of the East, looked to the opposite direction, and counted on far higher gains, where the common articles of life commanded so exorbitant prices. The cavalier, eager to win both gold and glory at the point of his lance, thought to find a fair field for his prowess on the mountain plains of the Andes. Ferdinand Pizarro found his brother had judged rightly in allowing as many of his comrades as chose to return home, confident that the display of their wealth would draw ten to his banner for every one that quitted it.

"In a short time the cavalier saw himself at the head of one of the most numerous and well appointed armaments, probably, that ever left the shores since the time of Ovando. It was scarcely more fortunate than his. Hardly had Ferdinand put to sea, when a violent tempest fell on the fleet, and compelled him to return to port and refit. At length he crossed the ocean, and reached the little harbor of Nombre de Dios in safety. But no preparations had been made for his coming, and, as he was detained here some time before he could pass the mountains, his company suffered greatly from scarcity of food. In their extremity, the most unwholesome articles were greedily devoured, and many a cavalier spent his little savings to procure himself a miserable subsistence. Disease, as usual, trod closely in the track of famine, and numbers of the unfortunate adventurers, sinking under the unaccustomed heats of the climate, perished on the very threshold of discovery.

"It was the story often repeated in the history of Spanish enterprise. A few, more lucky than the rest, stumbled on some unexpected prize, and hundreds, attracted by their success, pressed forward in the same path. But the rich spoil which lay on the surface had been swept away by the first comers, and those who followed were to win the treasure by long-protracted and painful exertion. Broken in spirit and in fortune, many returned in disgust to their native shores, while others remained where they were, to die in despair. They had thought to dig for gold; but they dug only their graves."

Facts and Scraps.

CURIOSITIES OF THE HOLY LAND.—We have mentioned the arrival at Norfolk last week of the U. S. ship Supply, from the Mediterranean, bringing passenger Lieut. Lynch, commander of the Dead Sea expedition. A report from Lieut. L., who has gone on to Washington, cannot fail to be highly interesting. In the meantime the Norfolk Beacon mentions as among the curiosities brought by him for the government, the following, calculated to excite a degree of interest which seldom attaches to such things:

A number of specimens of the water of the Dead Sea, the river Jordan, and the Pool of Siloam; and fragments of the pillar of salt into which Lot's wife was transformed, as a punishment for her disobedience to the command of the Almighty.

In regard to this last, we are informed that the pillar from which it was taken rises nearly 40 feet high, stands exactly in the spot designated by the bible, and that Lieut. Lynch, the commander of the Dead Sea expedition, expresses the confident opinion that it is the representative of what was Lot's wife. We believe it has not been seen before for many centuries. Josephus records its existence.

There are many other curiosities on board the Supply—as an Egyptian mummy, a pair of the cat-tle of Arabia, rosaries made of wood from the holy mount, shells from the shores of the Dead Sea, gazelles, &c.

Ohio exhibits a growth in population since the census of 1848, equivalent to an increase of nearly thirty-five per cent, in eight years, and presents an aggregate at this time, probably, of 2,060,000 inhabitants.

The National Intelligencer contains an exhibit of the improvements in, and the population of Washington city, for the year 1848. There are one hundred and thirty-six houses erected, which makes a total of 5,822 houses in the city.

It is confidently predicted that Jared Sparks will be the successor of Mr. Everett in the Presidency of Harvard College.

Boston during the last nine years just closed has paid into the national treasury in the form of revenue, forty millions of dollars.

SLAVES IN THE NORTHERN STATES.—At the period of taking the last United States census in 1840, the number of slaves in the Northern States was as follows: New Hampshire, 1; Rhode Island, 5; Connecticut, 17; New York, 4; New Jersey, 674; Pennsylvania, 64; Ohio, 3; Indiana, 3; Illinois, 381; Wisconsin, 11; Iowa, 16. In these States slavery had not been totally abolished in 1840, although no new slaves could be introduced. The masters were obliged to sustain such of their slaves as would not, owing to their incapacity for service or other causes, accept their freedom papers.

WONDERFUL PRODUCT.—F. P. Blair, Esq., who wisely deserted the uncertain field of politics for the wholesome one of agriculture, states in the Daily Globe that his Silver Spring farm in Montgomery county, Md., actually now produces 18 barrels of corn to the acre—or 90 bushels. He acknowledges his indebtedness for this result to Mr. E. Stabler's process of renovating worn out lands, as lately set forth in his prize essay in the American Farmer. It is Kentucky's boast to excel all others in this crop, and there ten barrels of corn to the acre is a fair average yield. —[Baltimore Sun.]

ABBREVIATING THE ATLANTIC.—The Boston Transcript, in an article upon the improvement of steam-ships, &c., suggests that the journey by water across the Atlantic might be very materially shortened by departing from those points on the two continents most contiguous to each other. By selecting some port on the western coast of Ireland as a depot, on the one side, and Cape Canso, the most easterly Cape of North America, on the other, a passage could be made which would astonish the whole world by its brevity.

EXTRAORDINARY.—The Memphis Eagle of the 9th says: Messrs. A. B. Shaw & Co. had a cow slaughtered yesterday, in which operation a most extraordinary development was made. In the womb of the cow were found five calves, each one of which was fully as large as a well grown rabbit. This is a positive fact, and as such given to us by the well known and very respectable gentlemen of that firm."

NEW ORLEANS BANKS.—The monthly statement of the New Orleans Banks, made up to the 25th ult., shows that their circulation amounts to $3,694,012; Deposits, $889,637; Specie, $8,481,652. The amount of Foreign and Domestic Exchange due the Banks was $2,330,40, against $1,406,733 on the same account, which left $923,670 for draft in favor of the Banks.

BAPTISTS.—In 1758 this denomination numbered 187 churches. According to the latest returns, they now number in this country about 610,471 communicants, 8,015 churches, and 4,337 ordained ministers.

An officer of the navy, who bought twenty leagues of land, one hundred house lots, and twelve dwellings in California, is ruined by the speculation. He has no tenants, and his property has no value now.

THE CANADAS.—It is supposed that the new census will show the population of Upper Canada to be about 700,000. Lower Canada is estimated to contain nearly 800,000. The former province increases much faster than the latter.

THE CROTON AQUEDUCT.—From the Report of the managing board for the last quarter, it appears that the income for that period amounted to $32,328 24, and the expenses to $17,287 10. The number of dwellings now supplied is 18,106.

Each dray in New Orleans, according to a new ordinance, is taxed annually thirty-five dollars. We suppose drays must be a nuisance, and the authorities wish to drive them from the city.

DELAWARE.—The population of this little Tom Thumb State is 80,000. The number of bushels of wheat raised is 410,000. The product of all the agriculture of Delaware is $2,673,000.

DEBT OF NORTH CAROLINA.—The Governor of the "Old North State," in his late message, sets down the debt of the State at $500,000.

The length of the telegraphic paper on which the President's message was dotted down, measures seven thousand two hundred feet.

Mrs. Dix.—At the suggestion of this talented and benevolent lady, the North Carolina Legislature are about to establish a lunatic asylum.

The telegraph wires have been suspended over the Kennebec river at Bath, Maine, a distance of 1200 feet, and 180 feet above the water.

A SECOND ULYSSES.—The following scene occurred in the Philadelphia Police Court not long since: An old man, of very acute physiognomy, answered to the name of Jacob Wimont. His clothes looked like they might have been bought second-handed in his youthful prime, for they had suffered more by the rubs of the world than the proprietor himself.

Mayor.—What business do you follow, Wimont? Wimont.—Business! None—I'm a traveler.

Mayor.—A vagabond, perhaps. Wimont.—You are not far wrong; travelers and vagabonds are much the same thing. The difference is that the latter travel without money, and the former generally travel without brains.

Mayor.—Where have you traveled? Wimont.—All over this continent.

Mayor.—For what purpose? Wimont.—Observation.

Mayor.—What have you observed? Wimont.—A little to commend, much to censure, and very much to laugh at.

Mayor.—Humph! And what do you commend? Wimont.—A handsome woman that will stay at home, an eloquent preacher that will make short sermons, a good writer that will not write too much, and a fool that has sense enough to hold his tongue.

Mayor.—What do you censure? Wimont.—A man who marries a girl for her fine dancing, a working man who believes in the sympathies of professional gentlemen, a youth who studies law or medicine while he has the use of his hands, and the people who elect a drunkard or blockhead to office.

Mayor.—Ahem! And what do you laugh at? Wimont.—I laugh at the man who expects his position to command that respect which his personal qualities and qualifications do not merit.

Mayor.—Oh! I perceive you are an utterer of pithy sentences; now I am about to utter one that will surprise you.

Wimont.—A pithy sentence from your honor would indeed be a matter of astonishment.

Mayor.—My sentence is, that you discontinue traveling for the term of thirty days, while you rest and recruit yourself at Moyamensing.

This retort was a poser, and Mr. Wimont, submitting to the requirements of the vagrant act, retired from the hall of justice without uttering another syllable.

METAMORPHOSIS OF A FASHIONABLE MILLINER.—As the Model Milliner rises in the world, a confusion of tongues, like the Tower of Babel, attends her growing eminence. Her knowledge of English becomes more French every day, until at last her dialect, like the British Channel, belongs to neither England nor France, but is continually running between the two. She talks like Madame Celeste, which makes it very difficult to understand her, unless you have had a course of six private boxes at the Adelphi. A similar metamorphosis takes place in her name and door-plate. Mrs. Todd is changed to Madame Toddee, and her shop is called a Magazin des Nouveautés, or, at least, a Depot, and circulars inform the curious that Madame Toddee is de Paris, (of course) and was the premiere eleve of Madame Victorine, and carried off the gold medal at the Exposition d'Industrie, for her very superior jupons hygieniques. As her fame increases, so does her invisibility. Her magazin is vacated for a handsome mansion in some ci-devant aristocratic square, where liveried footmen usher you up velvet-carpeted stairs, into saloons and boudoirs with gold-legged chairs and the rosiest ottomans. She only receives the elite. She "gives consultations"—is very difficult, however, to consult; and when visited in her in-cognito, sends down word "that Madame cannot be disturbed—she is composing." —[Model Women.]

PUNCH gives the following outbreak of Mrs. Harris (the Standard,) against Sir Robert Peel, and refers to the paper of the 30th ult., for a verification: "Yah! Who caused all the disturbances in Forrin Parts? Why you, you base creechur; and well may you go and ask Lewis Phillips to spend Christmas with yer; which it's a Merry Christmas I wish yer—over the left—Yah!"

DOMESTIC BLISS.—Paterfamilias. "I cannot conceive, my love, what is the matter with my watch; I think it must want cleaning." Pet child. "Oh, no! Papa, dear! I don't think it wants cleaning, because baby and I had it washing in the basin for ever so long this morning!"

XTRAVAGANZA XTRAORDINARY.—Charles X, x king of France, was xtravagantly xtolled, but is exceedingly xecrated. He xhibited xtraordinary xcellence in xigency; he was xemplary in xternals, but xtrinsic on xamination; he was xstatic under xortations, xtrême in xitement, and xtraordinary in xtempore xpression. He was xpatriated for his xcesses, and to xpiate his xtravagance, xisted and xpired in xile.

The Legislature of New Hampshire have passed a law that joining the Shakers deprives a man of his property. It goes to his wife. If both husband and wife join the society, guardians are appointed to take charge of the property for the benefit of the children. The law provides that children shall not be indentured to the Shakers without the consent of the County Judges, and imposes a heavy fine for secreting children.

FOR the Treatment of all Diseases in Men, Women and Children; whether Acute or Chronic; whether Local or General; whether Scrofulous, Syphilitic, or Epidemic—or all Maladies belonging to the line of Medicine and Surgery.

I. Cases of all kinds will be examined every day in the week from 7 o'clock A. M. till 7 P. M. Sundays excepted.

II. No CHARGE made for EXAMINATIONS, or for our OPINION in any case.

III. Patients will find our examinations unlike those of any others which they have ever known or heard, and if we do not tell them more about their case, without their telling us any history of their disease, than they have ever known or learned before by their own observation, or that of any of their Doctors, we advise them not to submit to our treatment.

IV. All that Class of Diseases in which delicate and sensitive persons are exposed, by most Doctors, to Surgical and bloody operations, and to means and treatment which burn and torture, and confine the patient to the sick bed, are treated at this office without pain, exposure or confinement.

V. Patients will be convinced beyond all doubt, by our Examinations and Treatment, that their diseases in most, and the worst cases, originated in their childhood, or were inherited from their parents, or arose from a great variety of causes, which neither they nor their doctors ever imagined—and though they may seem to have a dozen different diseases, that in nearly every case they all spring from one root or cause, and will be driven out together by very simple means.

VI. Those Diseases of certain parts of the human system, which are almost universally treated in the first state with Balsam of Copaiba, Capsules, Cubes; by Injections of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead Water—Yellow or Black washes; with Blue or Mercurial and other Ointments; with Bougies, Catheters or Syringes—or in the second state, with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate for Corrosive Sublimite; with Hydriodate of Potash, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like slops—we say before heaven and earth, that by such treatment and such means, as are generally used, we know and can demonstrate, that these diseases have never been and can never be healed. They deceive the patient—they drive the disease into the system, and to other and more important parts—they produce Strictures, Callouses, Piles, Abscesses, Ulcers, Fistulas, Catarrhs, Dropsies, Rheumatic pains, Diseases of the Bones, of the Liver, Kidneys, Lungs, Throat and whole system; and either render the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of these Quackish, Ruinous and Swindling remedies, we promise to every curable case we treat, a permanent and radical CURE FOR LIFE by very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell—which neither purges or vomits—nor hinders from business—nor exposes the patient in any way whatever, and which is only to be taken every other night. We can furnish patients with References to Terrible Cases which have been carried out of the Broadway Hospitals as incurable, to die, whom we have raised from the gates of the grave, after all other means have been used in vain.

VII. Knowing, as we do, that most Medicines in the hands of Apothecaries and Druggists are adulterated, and for various other reasons are not to be relied on; we have, therefore, established a CHEMICAL LABORATORY, where we manufacture all our Medicines—for this reason we can warrant that our medicines shall do all that we promise in every case.

VIII. In every case in which we promise a cure, if we fail to effect this, the money paid for medicine will be returned. To all who wish we will furnish names and residence of patients in the city and country, whom we have treated for all forms of disease, who will give them all the facts in their case—the nature, extent, and duration of their sickness, and the success of our treatment.

We therefore invite all sufferers however afflicted, or however hopeless their case may appear, to give us a trial—put our knowledge to the test in an Examination of their case—it will cost them nothing—and they will find beyond doubt that ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which are called Consumption, Spinal disease, Cancer in the Womb, or elsewhere, &c., &c., are totally mistaken—there being nothing of the kind. This we have demonstrated in hundreds of cases.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

INVOCATION.

THINE awful Voice and energetic Might Went forth upon the vast and mystic Deep,
Startling old Chaos from his couch of Night,—
Rousing him from his long and dreamless sleep
To forms of beauty,—each a radiant world,—
Each swift by Thee to its appointed orbit hurled.

Then from thine own mysterious essence came Thy crowning Work, above all others grand And glorious—MAN!—a shrine of clay—within a flame

Of Thee a type. This work shall stand
Amid the rolling cycles of all time
And vast eternity, o'er all the most sublime.

Where mountain waves upon old Ocean dash—
Glowing like liquid amber in the light
Of half-veiled stars. Where echoing thunders crash,
And lightnings gleam athwart the brow of Night—
Where's heard the storm-king's fierce and giant roar,
There art thou, God, in thy sublime and awful power.

Where spring the tiny seeds to infant life,
And onward thence to ripe and golden grain,—
Where wafts the breeze with golden fragrance rife
From garden flowers, when falls the gentle rain,—
Where warble birds in each green, waving tree, Gladdening our hearts with their sweet minstrelsy,—

Where, 'mid green meadows, laughs the merry stream,

And hill, and dale, and sky, with beauty glow—
There art thou, God, presiding over all,—
There doth thy goodness grateful praises from us call.

Thou, God, hast written o'er Heaven's boundless scroll

A starry language, wonderful and bright;
There myriad orbs in awful grandeur roll,
Like flaming chariots in their paths of light;
From the far center to Heaven's sparkling coasts,
Thy guiding force is felt by all the shining hosts.

EDEN VAL, Dec., 1848.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY, 1849.

To my Fellow Citizens of the City of New-York.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
JOHN F. VAN EDEN HOLLERMANN.

REJOICE with me, my friends and brothers,
Ye citizens of great New-York,
The last year pass'd off with the others;
Kind Heaven hath watch'd o'er all His work.
Many of our friends and neighbors
The tyrant Death has grasp'd apace.—
We still are spared.—To Him who spared us,
To God Almighty, give the praise!

Yet not alone that our existence
He has prolonged—but on our land
Many high and precious blessings
Were lavished by His father-hand—
Prosperity, health, harvest, peace—
Yes, everything that gives us joy.
Then to Him let us give our love.
Our heart-felt love, without alloy!

Besides that thus, in plenteous blessing,
His kindness, mercy, He would shower
In pains and dangers, sore distressing.
He was with us at every hour;
Many evils that did threaten,
Were turned away at His command;
His messengers of love, His angels,
They were Columbia's guardian-band.

Frequently, when dire misfortune,
As we esteem'd it, seem'd our lot,
Suddenly our darkness vanished;
Oh, great, beyond all thoughts, is God!
In meekness we ourselves acknowledge
Unworthy of such guidance mild;
Let each of us then prove, henceforward,
A highly favored, grateful child!

Consider, brethren, oh, consider,
How for our country God does act!
Blessed the people that revere Him,
Their lives and homes He will protect.
Beyond the ocean, wars and bloodshed,
Rebellion against power and throne;
Here, rulers, citizens, united,
Each freeman wears the civic crown.

Then all unite, dear sisters, brethren,
Give God the honor to Him due!
Bend, bend the knee in grateful homage,
Each bosom glow with feelings true!
Thank Him for His unbounded kindness,
And pray that, from his Heavens high,
He ever will protect and bless us,
Us, whose Redeemer is His Son.

To close—let none of us omit it,
To pray, with humble, contrite mind,
He us His spirit give—enable us
To live to Him pure—soul-refined!
That he our frequent sins will pardon,
Expunge the wrongs that we have done;
Prepare us "here" for life eternal—
In mercy "there" will take us home!

French Novelle.

A LION IN LOVE.*

BY FREDERIC SOULIE.

As they were going up, Mr. Laloine all at once recollected that Stern's carriage was waiting:

'But you were going out, sir?'

'Oh!' replied Léonce, 'I have time enough,
I was going to look at a country-seat in the neighborhood of St. Germain; and whether I get there at noon or a few hours later, makes no difference to me.'

'Ah!' said Mr. Laloine, 'Prosper told us that you had a very fine one at Seine-Port.'

'True; but it is not for myself that I am going to look at this country-seat; it is for my uncle General R—, who is very partial to a country-life; but as he has business daily at the War Department, he wishes to purchase an establishment at St. Germain, in order to be able to leave it in the morning and to return at night.'

Mr. Laloine was quite satisfied with this explanation, but Lise cast a furtive glance at Léonce, who could lie glibly enough to deceive the father, but too awkwardly not to be detected by the daughter. A trifling circumstance almost immediately afterwards confirmed Lise in her suspicion of the truth. Léonce had shown Mr. and Mrs. Laloine, as well as Lise, into a parlor, and forgetting that nothing but a slight drapery separated him from her, he whispered to his valet, before rejoining the party:

'Go to some publishing office, and procure for me all the copies of the Public Advertiser you can obtain.'

Lise overheard this; and when Stern came in, she looked at him with such provoking irony, that he knew that his deception was seen through. But the look conveyed no expression of displeasure, and it seemed to almost approve of the stratagem.

Lise had entered Stern's apartments with a degree of childish curiosity; but she was scarcely in them, before this feeling became more serious, and almost alarmed; but she felt as if treading upon the precincts of danger. Under those gorgeous hangings, amid that collection of Damascus weapons, near those shelves showered over with golden ornaments of exquisite workmanship; in that alcove, where not an object seemed intended for female use, she felt ill at ease, and as if she stood alone in the midst of a circle of men. It seemed to her that the air she breathed was less pure than that of her snow-white chamber, which reached her through the flowers that fringed her window.

As for Mr. and Mrs. Laloine, they were eagerly engrossed with the beautiful objects that surrounded them. Mrs. Laloiné, especially, examined the shelves with ceaseless astonishment; but she was afraid to touch any of them, and ever and anon she called on Lise to share her admiration. Lise obeyed, but scarce looked at anything; a strange sensation of dread had taken possession of her, and she merely replied in an altered tone:

'Yes, yes, it is all very beautiful.'

Just as Mrs. Laloiné was showing Lise, not as an object of value, but at least as something singular, a small slipper placed among those works of art, and ornaments of bronze, Lise knit her brows, and replied in a tone still more altered than before:

'Yes, it is very pretty.'

Mrs. Laloiné looked at her, and asked with some alarm:

'Are you indisposed?'

'Slightly,' said Lise, placing her hand upon her heart, 'but it will soon be over.'

'Ah!' cried Sterný, 'the air is suffocating here.'

'A glass of sugar and water, with some orange-flower, if you please,' said Mrs. Laloiné with uneasiness; 'excuse me, Monsieur le Marquis.'

Leonce did not ring; he opened a door, entered a room, where he found on a side-board a small waiter on which was what is commonly called a glass of sugar and water, and brought it himself into the parlor.

'Oh, I really must beg your pardon,' said Mrs. Laloiné to him; 'this child is very troublesome.' Mrs. Laloiné prepared the beverage, and Lise took it; her hand trembled. When she had done drinking, and before depositing the glass upon the table, she noticed two letters engraved upon it, after the Bohemian style; these letters were repeated upon all the crystal pieces on the waiter. They were an A and a C. They could not therefore, refer to Leonce. He perceived this scrutiny, and taking the glass out of Lise's hand, he said with an air of sadness, and with an accent the emotion of which, startled her:

'It is my mother's cipher, mademoiselle.'

She raised her eyes to his; he was evidently much moved by this recollection, for he placed the glass upon the waiter, saying in a low tone:

'How strange!'

'What is strange?' inquired Mrs. Laloiné.

'Oh, madam,' said he, 'excuse this emotion. Four years ago, when at Nuremberg, I had this glass made for my mother; I returned to France with a joyful heart, for I knew that even this slight attention would give her pleasure. She had died the night before my arrival, suddenly, as if struck by lightning. I have kept this glass in memory of her. No one has ever made use of it until this day. I cannot say why, but the circumstance awakened most painful feelings in my mind.'

Mrs. Laloiné was silent; but Lise looked at Sterný with a delicious thrill of joy.

'Your mother died very young, did she not?' said Mrs. Laloiné.

'Too soon for me, madame; she was so noble, so excellent, so beautiful! I must show you her portrait; it is in my chamber. Come, madam, come; and you too, mademoiselle, I beseech you. I wish you to know my mother.'

They entered the chamber, and looked at the picture: it was a master-piece of painting, representing a master-piece of beauty.

'Was I not right to say she was beautiful?' said Sterný.

'Beautiful indeed!' said Lise in soft accents, with her hands clasped before that image, as if she were contemplating the Holy Virgin.

'Here is my father's portrait,' said Sterný to Mr. Laloiné.

The husband and wife turned to examine it; but Lise remained rooted to the spot, opposite the picture of Madame Sterný, whose countenance seemed animated by a sweet and benevolent smile. Lise heaved a deep sigh. It seemed to her that a woman with so angelic a face must have bequeathed to her son some portion of the charming purity of soul which beamed in her countenance. They quitted the chamber, and when Lise returned to the parlor, her heart was relieved, and almost happy.

The examination was resumed, and Lise found the slipper; this slipper sorely puzzled her; but it was no easy matter to inquire into the origin of it. However, an opportunity for this soon presented itself. When he came round to a certain table, Sterný had to explain the value of some objects, that were placed upon it: such a key had been manufactured by Louis XVI, this scent-bottle had belonged to Anne of Austria, that prayer-book to Madame de Maintenon.

'And this slipper?'

'That slipper is mine,' said Sterný laughing.

'How so, yours?' said Mrs. Laloiné.

'Yes,' replied Sterný, 'it relates to one of my youthful follies.'

'Ah!' said Mrs. Laloiné, gravely, as if she feared that the folly alluded to might have been of an equivocal nature.

But Lise felt no apprehension of this kind; something assured her that if any thing improper had been associated with the recollection, Leonce would not have replied with an air of such joyous frankness.

'Perhaps it is Cinderella's slipper,' said Lise with a smile.

'Oh! the story is a very singular one,' said Sterný; 'that slipper turned the head of a real prince, and it was I who wore it.'

'How did that happen?' asked Mr. Laloiné.

'Ah! that would be difficult to explain; but you must know that about ten years ago, I had a little feminine face, and bore a close resemblance to my sister, to whom M. d'Auterres was paying his addresses, and of whose gaiety he was very jealous. My brother-in-law—for he became so in the sequel—is certainly a man of honor, but the least trifle was enough to offend his strict notions of etiquette, and one day he gravely remonstrated with my mother because my sister wore slippers in a room where two or three young men happened to be assembled. Her wearing those slippers had struck M. d'Auterres as a shocking piece of impropriety.'

'One night, during the Carnival, after he had left us, saying that he was going to the ball at the Opera house, I know not what mad idea possessed me to torment him; I dressed myself in girl's clothes, and—in remembrance of his regard for etiquette—instead of shoes, I put on my sister's slippers.'

'Do you say that you have actually worn that slipper?' said Lise with an air of incredulity, and forgetting who it was she spoke to.

'Why, mademoiselle, I could wear it in those days,' replied Sterný with a smile.

Unconsciously she glanced at Leonce's feet, and saw that they were beautifully small.

'How shall I go on?' said he with a degree of embarrassment about equal to her own. 'I reached the Opera house, and having directed some of my friends to pursue me, I rushed into the arms of M. d'Auterres, exclaiming, "save my honor!"'

'D'Auterres turns round, and I then confess to him, tremblingly that I am a young girl, who, in obedience to the dictates of an inexpressible curiosity had escaped from my mother's house to attend the masked ball, that I am frightened, lost undone! So saying I had led M. d'Auterres into a private corner; I sank upon a chair, and while he was moralizing me, asking me, who I was, and swearing to protect me, I put out my foot. He took no notice of it; however, I carried on so, that some one ran against me, and I protested that my foot was crushed. Again I put it forward; it was impossible for him not to take notice of it this time. M. d'Auterres sees the slipper, becomes pale as death, and turning towards me, exclaims:

'Impossible! it cannot be!'

'I then pretended to burst into sobs, and said to him, "Alas! it is too true. Take me back to my mother." He was so thunderstruck, that it was I who led him out of the room, rather than he who assisted me. We got into the coach, and then he seemed to recover his senses sufficiently to admit of his recognising my features without allowing him closely to distinguish them. I tore off my mask, and he exclaimed:

'It is you; yes, it is you, mademoiselle!'

'But a second glance might have destroyed me. I buried my confusion and my tears in my handkerchief, and thus we reached home. It was my mother's reception night, and there was still some company in the drawing-room. M. d'Auterres caused her to be mysteriously sent for in her chamber, where, I had thrown myself, without saying a word, on a divan, burying my head in one of the cushions to conceal myself. It was then that M. d'Auterres with a most lugubrious and solemn aspect, undertook to impart to my mother the awful news he had in store for her.

'This secret,' said he, shall remain buried in my heart; but you must be sensible that all my prospects and all my hopes are for ever at an end.'

'But what is the meaning of all this?'

'Alas!' resumed he, pointing to me, 'there she is; it was an act of thoughtlessness, of great imprudence; but, your counsels, the salutary example of your virtues—'

'True enough,' said my mother, 'whose domino is that?'

'Ah, madam,' said M. d'Auterres, 'do not overwhelm her with your indignation! I hardly dare to inform you.'

'But what are you?' said the marchioness to me.

'It is I, dear mother,' I replied, in my natural tone of voice.

'You, Leonce!' said my mother laughing; 'Ah, I am not so censorious as to find fault with my son for having gone to a masked ball!'

'Leonce!' cried M. d'Auterres, 'your son!—but where is your daughter?'

'She is in the drawing room.'

'M. d'Auterres was for a moment uncertain how to act, and was accordingly silent. At first he felt inclined to go into a rage, and the look which he darted at me was terrible; but I looked so modest, and my mother seemed so astonished, that he concluded it best to laugh at the joke, and to relate to my mother how he had been mystified.

'She, in turn, was disposed to be angry with M. d'Auterres for having thought that my sister could have behaved so imprudently; but the poor lover repeated over and over again:

'It is all owing to those slippers; and that slipper, so very small—'

'But my daughter, sir—'

'In the name of heaven,' he would say, 'who could have thought it possible for a man to wear those infernal slippers?'

'I assumed a tragic air, and said to him gravely:

'Well, sir, there, take that slipper, and keep it, and if ever more a doubt should arise in your breast respecting my sister, let it remind you of your unjustifiable mistrust.'

'I accept it willingly,' said Mr. d'Auterres.

'And I shall keep the other,' said I; 'I will return it to you the day my sister asks me for it!'

'They have now been married nearly ten years, and M. d'Auterres has never yet dared to tell his wife of the suspicion he once entertained respecting her. I have therefore kept the slipper, which has been the subject of this story.'

Meanwhile the time flew, and Lise having recovered her usual spirits, was examining every thing, like an inquisitive child. At that moment a servant came in, and placed on the table a large bundle of Public Advertisers.

'This is what Monsieur le Marquis sent for,' said he.

'Very well,' said Leonce, throwing them into a corner of some piece of furniture; and going towards Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné, in order to prevent their seeing what it was, he said to them.

'Are you fond of these trifles? I have a collection of them in this cabinet; come and let me show them to you.'

He left the room with Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné, but Lise did not follow them.

Leonce was on a bed of thorns. Fortunately, Mr. Laloiné having perceived some articles carefully placed under a glass cover, inquired what they were.

'Oh, this is very precious,' said Leonce; 'this once belonged to the Emperor!'

At that word, Mr. Laloiné drew himself up to his full height.

'To the Emperor!' he repeated; 'ah! you are a happy man!'

'This snuff-box once belonged him, and he has made use of it.'

'Allow me to look at it,' said Mr. Laloiné, with some tremor in his voice.

Leonce took it from under the crystal globe, and a lucky thought struck him.

'You have been in the army, Mr. Laloiné, have you not?'

'Yes, sir,' said Laloiné with a heavy sigh; 'from 1808 to 1814.'

'Well, sir, such an object, which is no curiosity for me, must have a great value in your opinion; allow me to present you with this snuff-box.'

'Ah, sir, never! I could not think of it.'

'I beg of you.'

This lasted about five minutes, but Mr. Laloiné ended by accepting the gift.

'Lise, Lise!' cried he, going towards the parlor, 'come and see what M. de Sterný has given me.'

Lise came in; she was agitated and trembling, as if she had been committing some evil deed. Sterný took this opportunity of leaving the room. The bundle of papers was scattered about, and one of the number was lying open on an arm-chair. He took it up and examined it. At the tenth line from the top of the page, there was an advertisement, headed: 'For sale—A country-seat near St. Germain.' He stood transfixed with joy; and presently hearing the steps of Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné, he concealed the paper in the breast pocket of his coat.

When Lise made her appearance, she looked triumphant; she cast upon Sterný a look of such gaiety that he knew not what to make of it.

Was it mere chance or childish curiosity that had induced Lise to read the Public Advertiser? Was it in order to be able to act in concert with him that she had done so? Or was it not rather a lesson which she wished to teach him? He again relapsed into a state of painful uncertainty.

Nevertheless he wished to profit by the advantage he had gained, and approaching Mrs. Laloiné, he said in a tone of kindness:

'And you, madam, could I not prevail upon you to accept some trifling memorial of your kind visit?'

Mrs. Laloiné hesitated; but what Sterný offered her was of so little value that it would have been ungracious in her to have refused.

'And Mademoiselle Lise,' continued he, negligently, 'would she condescend . . . ?'

Lise interrupted him quickly:

'Oh, thank you, sir,' said she; 'for my part, I wish for nothing.'

That phrase, 'for my part,' seemed to imply that she was unwilling to accept anything on the score upon which it was offered.

'Really,' said Mr. Laloiné, 'you are too liberal; we look as if we were despoiling you.'

'I thank you, in my daughter's name,' said Mrs. Laloiné; 'it would be taking undue advantage of your generosity.'

Besides,' said Lise unconcernedly, 'all these objects are so handsomely arranged, that they ought to be left in their places.'

'However, there are some,' said Sterný to her with a meaning look, and pointing to the newspapers, 'which acquire an inestimable value by being displaced.'

'Yes,' said Lise, with an attempt at gaiety, 'but it is like the slipper;—we think we see what does not exist.'

A gloom of displeasure crossed Sterný's features; he was silent, and drawing forth the Public Advertiser, he crushed it in his hands and threw it away. Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné, who were busy examining the imperial snuff-box, did not see this movement; but Lise saw it and felt happy; then, her gaiety vanished, and she followed all Sterný's movements with attention. Leonce, once more master of his feelings, showed himself as attentive and obliging towards Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné as he was before this incident happened, but with a slight shade of the nobleman endeavoring to be exquisitely polite. Lise looked at him: she listened to him; he delighted her; he was so elegant, so graceful; as he now appeared to her, he no longer alarmed her; she found him natural.

At length, Mr. Laloiné seemed to grow impatient, and said to Sterný:

'We have disturbed you; the hour appointed, is passed, and you will reach St. Germain when it will be too late.'

'In all probability, I shall not go there to-day,' said Sterný.

'And the fault is ours.'

'No, madame, no,' said Leonce; 'besides, I had forgotten that I had to go to a certain person, at St. Germain, who was to direct me to the house, and I suppose that, by this time, that person has grown tired of waiting for me. It would be useless for me, then, to go there.'

'Oh,' said Lise, hesitatingly, 'I thought that all houses for sale were advertised in the public papers.'

Sterný looked at her; she dropped her eyes. There was something in her heart that impelled her onward against her will, and which made her blush the moment afterwards. But Sterný had understood her, and he exclaimed:

'That is very true; I have by me the very number of the Public Advertiser which contains the direction I am in search of.'

He took the paper, and the conversation turned upon country-seats.

However, Prosper did not return. Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné, who were losing all patience, opened a window, as if by looking after him they could make him come any faster. At that moment Sterný approached Lise, and whispered to her:

'You were cruel to refuse some memorial of me.'

She was silent, but she was agitated.

'Now that you have forgiven me,' said he, 'accept something.'

She had no time to refuse, for her father cried out:

'Here comes Prosper.'

There was no hope for it, now; but just as Mr. Laloiné was taking up his hat, Lise exclaimed:

'There! I have lost the pin that fastened my shawl!'

Sterný ran to his chamber, snatched a pin-cushion that was hanging over the mantel-piece, and returned; but the shawl was already pinned.

'Excuse the trouble we give you,' said Mrs. Laloiné 'but I gave my heedless daughter a pin.'

Sterný threw the cushion on the table with vexation. But Lise drew gently near it, and without looking towards it, she felt for the cushion with her hand, took a pin from it, and fastened it in her shawl. Sterný saw this, and would have kneeled to her had he dared. He was so happy that he felt no further fear, and said:

'Now I think of it, if, instead of going to St. Germain in my carriage, I were to take the cars, I might make up for lost time.'

'That is true,' said Mr. Laloiné.

'Well, allow me to accompany you as far as the rail-road; Prosper will follow us and we will all start together.'

The offer was accepted, and Mr. and Mrs. Laloiné, together with Lise and Sterný, took their seats in the barouche which was in waiting, while Prosper's hack toiled painfully in the rear of the dashing equipage of the lion. Never had Sterný felt so happy in the whole course of his life.

[To be concluded.]

PLOWING WITH ELEPHANTS IN INDIA.—Hundreds of young elephants can be procured at the Straits of Malacca, at from $50 to $100 each, admirably suited for work of various kinds, but more especially for plowing. One of these animals will closely plow a full acre of land in a day with the greatest ease to himself; and only requires to be attended by his keeper in addition to the plowman.

Any one visiting Singapore, may see a small elephant, named 'Rajah,' working, daily on the estate of J. Balestier, Esq., American Consul; and, although the animal is only five and a half years old, he will plow his acre of land a day with ease. One man holds the plow, and another, (the keeper,) walks beside the animal and directs him in his duty. The docile little creature obeys every word that is said to him, and will plow all day between the cane rows, without plucking a single cane.—[Wray.]

An Oriental Tale.

THE SERPENT-CHARMER OF CASHMERE.

A Tale of Hindoostan.

BY FANNY E. LACY.

"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."
Romans, chap. xii, verse 21.

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.]

The dews of early morning were yet bright upon the grass and rich clustering foliage of the fair vale of Cashmere, when a lowly individual of the Soodar caste craved admission at the ever-readily unfolding gate of the venerable Pundit. His attire and demeanor were that of the common gopas of the valley; and some of the same class, passing at the time, observed to each other that they certainly recognized their neighbor, Cosron, the noted serpent-charmer of Cashmere. Meanwhile, his early departure on the morning of the great day of general excitement, in which he was expected to take so conspicuous a part, failed not being attended by the usual result among rustic neighbors; the gentler portion of which wondered and whispered together, imparting their several opinions, as each, her pitcher resting on her shoulder, or the knot of her dark-braided tresses, her white drapery tinged by the cloudless sunshine, combined a picturesque group, resembling the fair women of primeval days on their way to the ancient wells and flower-wreathed fountains of their native clime.

'But tell us, dear Parayata,' began one, 'how the matter chanced. Was it in performing pūja that your husband cast his soul-breathing flute into the sacred stream?' 'Alas! no, my sister,' replied the wife of Cosron. 'I grieve to say, it fell by accident. Oh! great Bramah; had it been the holy Gunga!—(Ganges).'
'True,' observed another, of enthusiastic demeanor, 'that had indeed been a blessing. Well know I thy piety, dear sister: and I doubt not wert thou performing tupseya, (sacred pilgrimage) thou wouldst cast therein thy dearest treasures: even thy little Baaboo, here, whom thou so lovest; well knowing thou wert thus securing his eternal happiness.' A murmur of approval from the surrounding women, here succeeded, accompanied by much pious bending of heads, and other tokens of corresponding sympathy. Nor was the fair Parayata deficient in this expression: notwithstanding the unconscious child was at the same moment drawn closer to her side. 'Ah! my brave sister,' continued the last speaker, with increasing fervor, 'or to joyfully cast him under the wheels of the great sacrificial car—the renowned Juggunnathu!'
Poor Parayata still reverently bowed her head with those of her companions; but this time little Baaboo received a kiss, and when his lovely Hindoo mother again looked up, a tear, not his own, was seen glistening on his infant cheek. And now the fair prattlers revived the original subject of their curiosity; and while some conjectured their worthy neighbor to have resorted to the wise Dervise of the valley, others gravely suggested his having sought some wondrous magician, whose spells and talismans should make the exhibition of his rival not worth a monkey's peep from a palm tree. Time had meanwhile progressed, to collect numerous gay troops from all parts: on they came with all the buoyant excitement of merry country folk; while the mingling of revelry and rural music, dancers bearing garlanded idols decked also with streamers, resembled the festival in honor of Durga, Goddess of Nature.† Certainly the announcement that had from the first spread far and wide, had by no means diminished in proportionate interest, and even the distant cities of Delhi and

* This dreadful act, as also that of voluntary drowning in the river Ganges, are among the much-to-be-lamented ceremonies of Hindoo superstition still existing in India.

† Among the numerous Hindoo festivals in honor of these deities, none have been described by travelers, as more splendid and imposing, than that of Durga, the Goddess of Nature: in which may be traced the heathen rites of the ancient Greeks and Romans, in worship of their Flora, Pomona, Ceres, &c.—at this day the delight of the holiday-loving rustics of Britain, in their rural welcome of the first of May!

Lahore poured forth their learned pundits, and other grave personages; professedly, as they averred, to seize the opportunity thus afforded for philosophical discussion on the nature of the tortuous race, and their remarkable sensibility to the power of music; many being accompanied by their vakeels,* and most intelligent moonshees,† for the purpose of taking notes, as occasion might require. There were also present a few Feringhee travelers, from the British Isle; who, escorted by a respectable native interpreter, were in their turn objects of the surprise they displayed. At first, on beholding the throng, they inquired, with an expression of horror, if a Hindoo widow was about to comply with the revolting custom of burning herself upon the funeral pile of her husband: though, in fact, they could scarce speak of aught beside the magnificent Kootub Minar, and its remarkable neighbor, the Immovable Pillar of all metals,‡ no less to the reflecting mind a silent lesson for human endurance, than as being of one of the noblest specimens of earthly grandeur and glory of human skill. And now was it, that, making all due allowance for the differing customs, despotic government, the still more arbitrary rule of superstition, and above all, the iron demarcation of caste in India, it soon became evident that King Mob everywhere maintains his empire: and though the sanctified Brahmin and illustrious Sittri, shrank, lest even their garments should be contaminated by contact with some wretched chandal (outcast), yet there was soon an unavoidable admixture of rajah and ryott, howdah and hackery (wagon), and the rear of many a gilded ruff and splendid palanquin, was closed by noisy troops of the hellachore (rabble), nor were there wanting the nyasis and yogees of painful revolting penance. Fakeers, grave astrologers, sword-swallowing jugglers, and juggling friars, with occasionally some picturesque specimen of the strange migratory race of palm-tracing lore, and gipsy cajolery.‡ Persons of distinction, and those of respectable castes, were already occupying their several tents, reared in proportion to their individual rank, or means: but each scrupulously biased by the Hindoo laws precluding indiscriminate mingling of repast: not but there were almost an equal portion of the reckless of all distinctions, publicly complying with the solicitations of the numerous venders of arrack, tarce,|| the seeds of the intoxicating bang, dreamy opium, and 'all the drowy syrups of the East.' And then, too, amid the mingling din of trumpets, gongs, horns, and rattling tum-tums (small drums), arose the chaunt of priestesses, as preceeding the 'great and mighty of earth,' after the manner of those at Madras.¶ Many had from distant parts joined the dense column forming the somewhat motly caravan in order to avail themselves of the near proximity of one of its established halks, to the scene of general interest: so that wealthy merchants and shrewd traffickers might be heard eagerly discussing the main chance by the side of stern-browed fakeers, and pious hadjees, professing utter indifference to the chances of life altogether: while those of the sleek dromedary, tall camel, gay umbrella, and obsequious pipe-bearer, as they moved onward, in all the pride of 'dyed garments,' and vermillion-streaked visages,* were contrasted by an equal proportion, appearing to have been more solicitous of the accommodating way-side serai to prepare some hoarded morsel of kibbob, or savory pillan, than in availing themselves of the cleansing water-tank always appended: and then while some paraded with fond complacency, their beautiful tame bullock of hides scrupulously cared for, and gilded horns wreathed with flowers; others were caressing their favorite monkeys, that peeped roguishly from many a luxurious mohaffah (litter,) with all the conceited airs of a petted lap-dog, from the window of a fashionable English equipage. But what irresistible opportunities were afforded the idle young wags, with their little docile bayas† and how frequently was the glittering tica slyly snatched from the lovely forehead, as the well-trained bird, obedient to the given signal, bore the playful theft triumphant to its master! how did the sudden tingling of silver bangles,§ proclaim the agitated step of the pretty wearer! while in some instances, the bright smile of dark-fringed orbs from the otherwise-closely-drawn choudra (linen veil), served to indicate a not too angry suspicion of the saucy trespasser; neither that the casual admiration of certain dashing young rajapoots|| and noble omrahs, awakened by the momentary disarrangement of the said choudra, had been wholly unheard. In the midst of all, however, a simultaneous shout proclaimed the approach of the rival serpent-charmers: one of them, at least: 'twas Daara, conducting a large, gaily-painted hackery; adorned by muslin draperies, festooned with garlands, and drawn by a number of white bulls of glittering harness. It was occupied by the well-known serpent-baskets; and from the girdle of their owner was suspended the pipe that had so oft performed wonders, and from which so much more than ordinary might naturally be anticipated on the present occasion. Daara was heartily welcomed by the assembled peasantry; and by those of his own caste in particular: but where was his rival? Where was the old friend and favorite of all the valley, Cosron? 'Let us but be patient,' whispered one of his partisans to a companion, 'this fellow will amuse for awhile; but, by the heel of Krishna! our friend Cosron wears the wreath; I may not tell thee now, but believe me he, but yesternight, spoke to me of terrible and unsuspected serpents, that he would subdue to the surprise of all.' The speaker was interrupted by a general hasty receding among the assembled throng as a fierce array of bristling crests and arrow tongues sprang from the now unclosed baskets! 'Twas but for a moment—the serpent-charmer breathed a few simple notes of the well-known melody, and the monstrous reptiles fell into their usual graceful evolutions, as, wreathing and intertwining their opal-hued scales, reflecting the glowing sunshine, they moved, a huge living lattice-work of terrific beauty! Many succeeding wonders were wrought by the skilful serpent-charmer, nor was the facility with which he at length restored them to their assigned receptacles, his least acknowledged feat. The name of Daara was shouted in triumph; when suddenly that of Cosron was also heard. 'True—' replied several voices. 'We should be just, my brothers: it is now Cosron's turn. Where is our old friend?' Just then the general attention was diverted by the appearance of a closed palanquin, slowly approaching; there was a quiet dignity in its movement, a noble simplicity in its rich exterior, that filled the beholders with respect equal to their surprise, on recognising it on such light occasion as that of the venerable and so universally-venerated Pandit, the justly-renowned Mah Satara. And now might indeed be seen the vast importance of caste, in the acknowledged and the privileged, as other learned pundits and their moonshees salaamed profoundly: bare-headed Brahmins, their faces bearing the marks indicative of the deity they professed to serve, proudly displaying the poitu, or sacred cord, girding their shoulders: attenuated Yogees, of filthy garments and withered limbs of self-inflicted penance, confident as zealous, rushed boldly before him; while the lone Pariah, and wretched Chancalus, 'standing afar off,' that 'dared not so much as lift up their eyes,' little deemed how, even in a Pagan land, the heart truly serving the All-merciful, was most with those that supplicated mercy. The coolies (or bearers) had rested their honored burden upon a grassy mound, beneath the shade of one of the noblest palm trees of the spacious plain; and the curtains of the palanquin being withdrawn, its venerable occupant arose as about to address the surrounding throng, and the simultaneous hush that floated on the air evinced homage rendered far less to wealth, learning, and lofty caste, than the simple dignity of a blameless life. 'Dear friends,' he began, 'friends and brothers of all castes, often have ye hearkened to the words of these aged lips, that are now about to address ye, upon that which hath thus drawn ye together, the claims of one well known to all—Cosron, the serpent-charmer. He is even now at hand to receive your kindly greetings, and I trust your congratulations also, when ye shall have hearkened to that he hath prayed me to detail.' The worthy Pandit then proceeded to unfold the purport of Cosron's early visit on that very morning; who had confessed his mortifications, his hoarded jealousies and angry conflicts. 'Ambition, my friends,' continued Mah Satara, 'whether of the monarch, the warrior, or gopa of the valley, is still the same, to be justified only by its object. In the troubled soul of our brother, it wrought much evil: and the ever-ready agents of the Destroyer, attracted by their kindred sympathies in human nature, had proved Cosron an easy prey; but that, amid all his trials and conflicting passions, he forgot not the homage due to the Preserver, who, in like manner attracted by that portion of his own nature inducing prayer, rewarded the suppliant by the impulse of repentance, and strength to resist our common enemy. Such are the blessings—such the good gifts of Almighty promise; though not immediately apparent unto the dwellers of earth. Then was it, that humbled and abashed before Divine wisdom, Cosron perceived how he had sought to destroy the very agent of his own preservation, and that of lives most dear to him. Thus impressed, behold how with tears of grateful joy, he now congratulates the object of his late jealousy, and abandons competition. Award, then, the honor due to him who by his skilful melody ruleth the deadly foes of mortal life besetting our path on earth: but, in my mind, dear friends, is the far more glorious conquest his, who hath subdued the insidious foes of life immortal, by the harmony of a soul at peace with Heaven.'

|| The manner of obtaining this liquor is described in Forbes's "Oriental Memoirs;" who, after a particular account of the coco-nut tree, thus continues:—"Many of the trees are not permitted to bear fruit: but the embryo bud, from which the blossoms and nuts would spring, is tied up to prevent their expansion; and a small incision being then made at the end, there oozes, in gentle drops, a cool pleasant liquor called aree or toddy; the fermented and distilled becomes an intoxicating spirit." Thus much our learned authority, respecting one of the "kindly fruits of the earth;" all good and excellent gifts of a wise and bounteous Provider, when not perverted from their "fair uses" by erring man. The same liquor, or similar, is also procured from the palm (date) tree, according to Dr. Clarke, in his travels through Europe, Asia and Africa.

¶ In the Black Town at Madras, usually called Fort St. George: by the English, bands of female choristers, belonging to Pagan temples erected there, often chaunt in companies before the men of distinction that are passing along the streets. We believe these are the inferior class of officiating priestesses, called the Rangamites.

* "At a Hindoo festival, a large body of the people had vermillion rubbed over their bodies, faces, and apparel."—Heber's Journal, page 100.

† According to Bishop Heber, tame bulls are kept in the streets; and pet monkeys are equally numerous in the houses.

‡ A particular account of the bird, called Baya, or Indian Grass-beak, will be found in the second volume of "Memoirs of Arts and Sciences," page 220, Ed. 1763. It is called Baya in Hindoo; Barbara in Sanscrit; Babus in the dialect of Bengal, and Zanavut in Arabic. The following amusing account of the Baya bird, is by Athar Ali Khan, of Delhi:—"One instance of his docility I can mention with confidence, having often been an eye-witness of it: the young Hindoo women of Benares and in other places, wear very thin plates of gold called tica, slightly fixed by way of ornament between their eye-brows; and as they pass through the streets, it is not uncommon for the young gallants who amuse themselves with training Bayas, to send the bird, at a particular signal, to pluck the ornament from the forehead of the wearer thereof, who bears it triumphantly to her admirer."

LOVE.

LOVE! love! thou art a feather,
Blown about by every weather;
Now a breeze will give thee breath;
Then anon 'twill be thy death.
Sometimes lounging in a bower,
Sipping sweets from every flower;
Then, when cooler fits are on,
Wave a leaf, and thou art gone;
Or, perchance, the sunshine may
Beam too brightly on thy way;
Or if it should turn to shade,
Thou wilt fly the gloomy glade.
Love! love! I fear thou art
Of selfish temper, fickle heart;
Like the changeful April shower—
Storm and sunshine in an hour.
Thou canst wear a smiling face,
But it still bears passion's trace.
Fond and fickle, light and free,
Love! what else can equal thee?

A MAIDEN'S DILEMMA.

Addressed to every eligible Marrying Man.

I WANT to elope—I have tried every plan
To catch a smart, handsome, and wealthy young man;
Yet for my love of the numbers who sue
They're so steady, I find an elopement won't do.
They will marry me—yes, in the general way,
They bore me to mention the long-look'd for day
When I'll wed them; yet still I must crush every hope,
For they won't understand that I want to elope.

I don't wish to be married with friends at my side;
No, I'd like to dash off as a Gretna Green bride—
All the girls to exclaim, "Really, Emilie's gone!
She's eloped with a baron, and left us alone!"

So any nice man, with a title to suit,
And a fine-sounding name, such as Arnold de Bute,
If he's anxious to marry, and made to elope,
Let him send a short letter to EMILIE HOPK.

A FACT FOR THE LADIES.

A young lady of our acquaintance, some few months since, who was engaged to be married to a gentleman of our city, was one day abruptly informed by her father, that she must forthwith prepare for a journey, he intended leaving New Orleans on the following day, for the North, and she must accompany him. The lady received her father's unexpected mandate in silence, for the dutiful girl had never yet dared to question the slightest command of him—her only existing parent. Yet, it must be confessed, that she had never obeyed him so reluctantly as now. Her duty, for the first time, points to a different path than that of love. The conflict in her heart was severe, but short, and the next day she bade adieu to the 'Crescent City,' and to him on whom she had bestowed her virgin heart. The lovers exchanged vows of eternal constancy, with promises of neglecting no opportunity of communicating by letters, and hopes of meeting again at the expiration of a few months, to be separated no more. The lady had been gone several weeks, and her lover had heard nothing of her. He could not account for her neglect. Could it be possible that beneath such apparent innocence and simplicity, she had a false and fickle heart? The idea was insupportable, yet he could not dispel it from his mind. To drive away the thought he mixed again with the gay world, and ere long met with one on whom he began to think of transferring that love which had been so wantonly betrayed. Just at this crisis, he found one morning, among other letters, one from New York, with a superscription written in an elegant and finished female hand. Who could it be from? Had she at last remembered him? He tremulously broke the seal, and there, indeed, at the end of a well-filled sheet was the name of her, by whom he thought himself forgotten. The cause of her silence is soon told—like many others of her sex, the time devoted to her education had been spent in the cultivation of ornamental accomplishments, to the neglect of those which are useful. Among the latter was that of penmanship. She had never sufficiently studied this useful art, and after separation from her lover she keenly felt this deficiency. She burned to communicate to him her assurances of undying regard, but feared to do so, lest the CRAMPED medium through which they must necessarily be conveyed, would tend to depreciate her in his estimation. Week after week passed away, and found the lady still undetermined, when one morning she announced in the public journals the arrival of a celebrated writing master, who engaged to teach a graceful hand in a few short lessons. She joyfully repaired to the teacher's rooms, took lessons, and in a few days had learned to write the elegant letter alluded to above. She therein frankly acquainted her lover with the whole, confessed freely to him the cause of her long silence—begged his forgiveness, which, of course, was freely granted; and the happy lovers are now become man and wife.—[New Orleans Picayune

THE CELTIC WOMAN.—Celtic woman accords naturally with her race. It were a folly to speak of domestic economy as applied to her house; she does not even comprehend the meaning of such terms. In her house you will find nothing in its place: nothing done in time! Waste, loss, destruction of all property, follow her steps, her indolence exceeds all belief. Good-tempered, amiable, affectionate, it is impossible to be angry with her; her sympathies are deep; she is chaste and noblehearted; a dreamer, a romancer, a person gifted with second sight. Her love of her children, though excessive, never goes so far as to induce her to labor for them or mend their clothes. She weeps over them in rags, witnessing their death, often originating in causes which she could have averted; lamenting with many tears and cries the irreparable loss of those beloved tokens of affection, her children; those ties of society; those beauteous, unaffected, truth speaking, lovely forms, so doated on by man, and in which he sees, or fancies he sees, a sure, the only sure emblem of ever-revolving, ever-going, ever-turning, ever-creating nature.

WHAT MAKES OLD MAIDS AND BACHELORS.—We will paint a picture—one in which the lights and shades appear strong, perhaps, but which every one will recognize as not outraging the truth of nature. There are two houses built side by side. In the one dwells a widow and her daughter, fair, light-hearted, the sunshine of her mother's declining years, but, alas! not rich. With all the affectionate instincts of a woman's heart, with all the capabilities to create happiness in a man's house, she remains unseen and unchosen. As time passes on, she gradually deepens into old-maidism. Where once she was heard singing about the home, like Una making a sunshine in the shady place, her voice is now heard shrill in complaint; parrots and cats accumulate, taking the place of a more human love, and her words are those of sharp reproof and spite against those very instincts of maternity which have been so long the master-spirit of her thoughts. Her affections, after in vain throwing themselves out to seek some sympathetic answer, turn in with bitterness upon her own heart, and she remains that most melancholy of all spectacles—a nature with aspirations unfulfilled. In the next house lives a bachelor—young, open-hearted, and generous. Busied in the struggle of life, he has perhaps no time for parties; he sees little of society, the female portion of it especially; a knowledge of his own brusqueness of manners at first prevents him from coming in contact with womankind, and this shyness in time becomes so strong as not to be overcome. It might seem strange, but we are convinced it is the fact, that some men are much more afraid of women than women are of men, and fearing 'to break the ice' is a fruitful cause of old bachelorism. Gradually age grows upon him, chalk stones gather in his knuckles, gout seizes hold of his toes; served by menials, he is a stranger to the soft and careful hand of affection; and he goes to the grave, his death not only unlamented, but absolutely rejoiced over by his heir-at-law. A wall of but six inches thick has all this time divided these two people.

English society does not allow them even a chink, which, like Pyramus and Thisbe, they might whisper through, although by nature they might have been formed to make a happy couple, instead of two miserable units.—[People's Journal.

MUSIC.—Every woman who has an aptitude for music or for singing, should bless God for the gift, and cultivate it with diligence; not that she may dazzle strangers or win applause from a crowd, but that she may bring gladness to her own fireside. The influences of music in strengthening the affections, is far from being perceived by its admirer; a sweet melody binds all hearts together, as it were with a golden chord; it makes the pulses beat in unison and the heart thrill with sympathy. But the music of the fireside must be simple and unpretending; it does not require brilliancy of execution, but tenderness of feeling—a merry tune for the young, a more subdued strain for the aged, but none of the noisy clap-trap which is so successful in public. It is a mistake to suppose that to enjoy music requires great cultivation; the degree of enjoyment will of course, vary with our power of appreciation, but like all other great influences, it is able to attract even the ignorant; this is what the poets taught when they made Orpheus and his brethren the civilizers of the earth. In cases where musical instruments are not within reach, we may modulate our own voices, and make them give forth sweet sounds; we may sing those simple strains which require neither teaching nor skill, but which, if they come from one heart, are sure of finding their way to another.

HOW TO CHOOSE A WIFE.—That young lady will make a good wife who does not apologise when you find her at work in the kitchen, but continues at her task until it is finished.

When you hear a lady say, I shall attend church and wear my old bonnet and every-day gown, for I fear we shall have a rainstorm, depend upon it she will make a good wife.

When a daughter remarks—"Mother, I would not hire help, for I can assist you to do all the work in the kitchen," set it down that she will make somebody a good wife.

When you overhear a young woman saying to her father—"Don't purchase a very expensive or showy dress for me, but one that will wear best," you may be certain she will make a good wife.

When you see a female rise early, get breakfast, and do up her mother's work in season, and then sit down to sew or knit, depend upon it she will make a good wife.

WEDDINGS.—A learned writer says, in speaking of weddings, that 'none but a parent feels upon occasions like this. And then the bride, gazing with filial and graceful spirit upon the faces of those under whose parental kindness she has been fostered, still trembling at the magnitude and irrevocability of the step she had taken, and which must give a color to the whole of her future existence. Then turning her eyes upon her new made husband, with a glance which seemed to say, 'now I must look for husband, parent, all in you,' the reciprocal glances reassure her: she drinks in confidence and reliance as her eyes bend beneath his—a thousand new feelings agitate her bosom—the anticipation gets the better of recollection. The future for a moment banishes the past, and she feels secured on the new throne she has erected for herself in the heart of the man to whom she has confided her happiness—her all."

A NOBLE REPLY.—It was a beautiful turn that was given by a great lady, being asked where her husband was when he lay concealed for having been deeply concerned in a conspiracy, resolutely answered that she had hid him. This confession drew her before the king (Charles II.) who told her that nothing but her discovering where her lord was could save her from the torture. 'And will that do?' said the lady. 'Yes,' replied the king, 'I give you my word for it.' 'Then,' said she, 'I have hid him in my heart; there, and there alone, you'll find him!'

The Family Circle.

THE OLD HOUSE.

BY COLIN RAE BROWN.

FAREWELL, old house, although I leave thee,
It is hard to turn away;
And yet, however much it grieve me,
Here, alas! I cannot stay.

Yes! other walls will soon enclose me,
Less familiar to my sight;
But this fond heart will never lose thee;
Thou shalt be its chief delight.

Can I forget the happy faces—
Happy friends in thee I've met?
When of the Past have fled all traces,
Then—then—only, I'll forget?

No! I shall ne'er forget the pleasures
Which erewhile, were mine in thee;
And greatest among memory's treasures
Thou, old house, must ever be.

In thee a father's dying blessing,
Fell upon my saddened ear;
In thee a mother's kind caressing
Oft hath checked my childhood's tear.

I may but recollect to sorrow,
And remember but to sigh,
That there e'er shall dawn a morrow
When on thee will rest mine eye:—

But oh! there is a joy in sadness,
Such as cannot well be sung;
A soothing, softening, voiceless gladness
To the heart for ever young!

FLATTERY.

FLATTERY, if not artificial politeness, is, at least, an essential part of it. It consists in an endeavor not to make others happy, but to serve the interests of our own vanity. For what do we seek by flattery but to gain the favor and good opinion of another, though at the expense of truth, goodness, and even the happiness of that other, if the point in view can be obtained by destroying it? The means by which flattery generally succeeds is by studied language the expression of the heart in disguise. He who acts from this principle will rarely or never express to any one what he truly feels. He will express admiration for a fool, and esteem for a bad man; because flattery seeks its own ends, without considering what may be the consequence with regard to others. It is essentially different from that regard which is paid to real merit; for that is a tribute which is certainly its due, and may be both paid and received with innocence and pleasure; but the expressions of this will be such as generally escape undesignedly from the heart, and are far different from the studied language of flattery. Flattery, indeed, is not, in general, addressed to real and acknowledged merit. One who seems to have studied it as a science, observed that a professed beauty must not be complimented on her person, but her understanding, because there she may be supposed to be more doubtful of her excellence. On the other hand, one whose pretensions to beauty are but small, will be most flattered by compliments on her personal charms.

The same may be observed as to other qualities; for though most people would consider flattery as an insult, if addressed to such qualities as they know they do not possess; yet, in general, they are best pleased with it where they feel any degree of doubt, or suspect that others may do so. When Cardinal Richelieu expressed more desire to be admired as a poet and a critic, than as one of the greatest politicians in the world, we cannot suppose that it was because he thought those talents of more consequence in a prime minister. The fact was, he was certain of his excellence in one respect, and wanted not to be told what all the world must think of him. In the other he wished to excel, and was not sure of success. The same may be the reason of the partiality said to have been expressed by some writers for their worst performance. Can we, for instance, suppose that Milton really preferred his "Paradise Regained" to his "Paradise Lost"? He had doubts of the success of the former poem; and it was very natural for him to feel more anxiety about it, and to endeavor to persuade others, and even himself, of its superior merits. This is a weakness in human nature of which flattery generally takes advantage, without considering, or, if considering, without caring, that, by such means, it not only encourages vanity in those to whom it is addressed, but may, also, draw them in, to make themselves appear ridiculous, by the affectation of qualities to which they have little or no pretensions. Nor does this artificial kind of flattery at all times stop at such qualities as are in themselves indifferent. It is too often employed (and perhaps still more successfully) in disguising and palliating faults, and thereby affording encouragement to those whose inclinations were restrained by some degree of remorse.

Flattery, then, may be likened to a poisonous and pernicious weed, which, wherever it grows and prevails, does infinite mischief. And it is in courts where it is oftenest found, that it does most harm. There few dare speak the truth. Perhaps there never was an instance in the world where a prince was told the sincere truth in every thing which it concerned him to know. Truth, which is of plain, unalterable nature, and not to be molded into any shape, is unfit to be a courtier; while Flattery, on the other hand, being the creature of the imagination, and capable of bearing all forms, is an agreeable guest in palaces. To illustrate this, endless examples might be brought; and most of the evils that princes do, proceeds from the flattery of their courtiers. To this, moreover, most princes have owed their ruin. Take, for example, Galba. He was thought proof against flatterers; yet he was deceived by them. When he had lost all, and nothing remained to him but his life, which he was also soon to lose, there was not one about him who would acquaint him of his danger. Had they told him of his condition he would have been saved. Disliked for his avarice, despised for his age, and hated for his severity, he was addressed by multitudes of people to put Otho to death and to banish all his accomplices. Well, a rumor was spread that Otho was slain. The same flatterers ran to the palace and congratulated Galba, at the same time, with apparent bitterness, complaining that Fate had snatched the usurper from their vengeance. One would suppose, now, that here were marks of loyalty to the person of Galba; and of zeal and firmness to his interest. Not so. Two hours after, Otho's power prevailed in Rome. What was the consequence? Otho had the hearts and the acclamations of the courtiers; and Galba's death was demanded of him with the same importunity that the death of Otho had been demanded of Galba; and—a melancholy lesson of the vile fraudulence of flatterers—by the same men.

The Sieur Amelot de la Houssaye has observed, with truth and sagacity, that princes are better armed against fear than against flattery. Terror, says he, animates them and whets their courage; but flattery softens their minds and corrupts their manners. So aware have many sovereigns been of this, that flattery makes them negligent, idle, and forgetful of their duty, that they have been averse to it. Philip II. of Spain was in the habit of interrupting those who sought to flatter him by saying to them roundly, "Cease trifling, and tell me what it concerns me to know." George III., too, could not bear flattery, especially from the pulpit; and yet it was from the mouths of his clergy that he heard it the oftenest.

Flattery having itself only in view, and observing, as above mentioned, no rule of merit, praises and calumniates, just as men are exalted or depressed. Mezeray tells us that while the last of the race of Valois, Henry III. of France, built magnificent monasteries, and plunged himself into monkish devotions, ill-becoming his dignity, the monks revered him as a saint, and even called him one. But no sooner was the religious and seditious league formed against him, than the monks loaded him with all the reproaches and ill names they could think of. Tyrant, hypocrite, and murderer were the titles which they gave him. At last they butchered him as a heretic, with the deadly dagger of assassination. So easily can flatterers make one and the same man a god or a devil; and so true it is that flatterers love no man, and only court the fortunes of men. The most ingenious piece of flattery on record is perhaps that of Vitellius to Caligula. That mad emperor took it into his head that he was a god. He consequently, one day asked Vitellius this question: "Pray, Vitellius," said he, "have you never seen me embrace the moon?" "Oh, sir," answered the parasite, "that is a mystery which none but a god, such as your majesty, ought to reveal." Vitellius is said to have been one of those quibus principum honesta atque inhonesta laudare mos est; who praise every thing that their prince does, either good or bad. It is from flatterers such as these that tyrants are made. It is not possible for any prince to be a tyrant without them. How could he tyrannize if he had not servile hands to execute his will, and servile mouths to approve it? It was with the greatest fear that Nero ordered the murder of his mother. Yet he had counselors wicked enough to advise and applaud it. When he had committed that crime he was thunderstruck and distracted with apprehensions of the consequences. But, finding flattery, instead of resentment, in every quarter, he grew outrageously abandoned, and plunged into all licentiousness and infamy. Had it not then been for flatterers, the middle and the end of his reign would have been as good as the beginning, than which there never was a better. This is enough then to show the vileness and the mischief of flattery. It has destroyed nations, ruined princes, and at one time or other it has injured every body.

LINES.

I HAVE walked in the dark and gloomy shade
Of the yew and cypress tree,
And I've seen the rose and the garland fade,
By affection culled for me—
Sometimes my path has been strewn with flowers,
Fragrant roses around me cast;
But sorrow has darkened the sunnier hours,
And flung them to the winter blast.
And now I am left like an autumn leaf,
Alone on a withered spray;
And the only hope that can bring relief,
Is the hope of passing away.
Then welcome, welcome the blessed hour,
When the soul from earth shall soar,
The spirit shall leave its earthly bower,
And sorrow shall be no more.

RULE FOR LIVING WITH OTHERS.—Another rule for living happily with others, is to avoid having stock subjects of disputation. It mostly happens, when people live much together, that they come to have certain set topics, around which, from frequent dispute, there is such a growth of angry words, mortified vanity, and the like, that the original subject of difference becomes a standing subject for quarrel; and there is a tendency in all minor disputes to drift down to it. Again: if people wish to live well together, they must not hold too much to logic, and suppose that everything is to be settled by sufficient reason. Dr. Johnson saw this clearly with regard to married people, when he said, "Wretched would be the pair above all names of wretchedness, who should be doomed to adjust by reason, every morning,—all the minute details of a domestic day." But the application should be much more general than he made it. There is no time for such reasonings, and nothing that is worth them. And when we recollect how two lawyers, or two politicians, can go on contending, and that there is no end of one-sided reasoning on any subject, we shall not be sure that such contention is the best mode for arriving at truth. But certainly it is not the way to arrive at good temper.—[Friends in Council.]

HUSBAND.—The English term 'husband' derived from the Anglo-Saxon words huss and bond, which signifies the 'band of the house,' and it was anciently spelt 'houseband;' and continued to be spelt thus in some editions of the English Bible, after the introduction of printing. A husband, then, is a houseband—the band of the house—that which engirdles the family into the union of oneness of love. Wife and children, and 'strangers within the gates,' all their interests and their happiness are encircled in the 'houseband's embrace, the objects of his special care.'

A Western Sketch.

A LOVE OF A SINGING-MASTER.

THE prettiest girl that attended our singing-meetings was Jane Gordon, the only daughter of a Scotchman who had lately bought a farm in the neighborhood. She was a fair and gentle damsel, soft-spoken, down looking, but not without a stout will of her own, such as they do say, your very soft-spoken are apt to have. Indeed, we may argue that to be able at all times to command one's voice down to a given level, requires a pretty strong will, and more self-possession than impetuous people ever can have; and it is well-known that blusterers are easier governed than anybody else. Jane Gordon had light hair, too, which hasty observers are apt to consider a sign of a mild and complying temper; but our dear Jane, though a good girl, and a dutiful daughter, had had a good deal of trouble with the old Adam, and given her sober parents a good deal too.

So that, by and by, when it was whispered that Jane Gordon was certainly in love with Mr. Fasole, and that Mr. Fasole was at least very attentive to Jane Gordon, the old people felt a good deal troubled. They were prudent, however, and only watched and waited, that though quite determined that an itinerant singing-master should not carry off their treasure, to be a mere foot-ball of fortune, and have

"Nor house nor ha'
Nor fire nor candle light."

and at every singing-meeting the intimacy between Mr. Fasole and his fair pupil became more and more apparent, and the faces of the unappropriated damsels longer and longer. The district school-master that winter was a frightful old man, with a face like a death's-head, set off by a pair of huge round-eyed spectacles, so he was out of the question, even if he had not a wife and family to share his sixteen dollars a month. The store-keeper, Squire Hooper's partner, had imprudently gone off to the next town for a wife but a few weeks before; and a young lawyer who talked of settling among us as soon as there was anything, (he had an eye on the setting back of the mill-pond, we suspect) did nothing but smoke cigars and play checkers on the store-counter, and tell stories of the great doings at the place he had been haunting before he came among us. So the dearth of beaux was great, mere farmer boys being too shy to make anything of until they have bought land and stock, when they begin to look round with a business eye for somebody to make butter and cheese. Mr. Fasole, with his knowing air, and a plentiful stock of modest assurance, reigned paramount, the 'cynosure of neighboring eyes.' He 'cut a wide swath,' the young men said, and it may be supposed they owed him no good will.

How matters can remain for any length of time in such an explosive state without an eruption, let philosophers tell. Twice a week, for a whole long western winter, did the singing-school meet regularly at the school house, and practice the tunes which were to be sung on the Sunday; and every Sunday did one or two break-downs attest that improvement in music could not have been the sole object of such persevering industry. Sometimes a bold bass would be found flourishing off for a bar or two, in happy unconsciousness that its harmonious compeers had ceased to vibrate. Then again, owing to the failure, through timidity or obliviousness, of some main stay, the whole volume of sound would quaver away, tremblingly into silence or worse, while the minister would shut his eyes with a look of meek endurance, and wait until Mr. Fasole, frowning, and putting on something of the air with which we jerk up the head of a stumbling horse, could get his unbroken team in order again. Jane Gordon was not very bright at singing, perhaps because she was suffering under that sort of fascination which is apt to make people stupid; and she was often the 'broken tooth and foot out of joint' at whose door these unlucky accidents were laid by the choir. Mr. Fasole always took her part, however, and told the accuser to look at home, or hinted at some by-gone blunder of the whole class, or declared that Miss Jane evidently had a bad cold—not the first time a bad cold had served as an apology for singing out of time.

The period for a spring quarterly meeting of one of the leading denominations now drew nigh, and a great gathering was expected. Ministers from far and near, and a numerous baptism in the pond, were looked for. Preparations of all sorts were set on foot, and among the rest, 'music suited to the occasion.' The choice of 'set pieces' and anthems, and new tunes, gave quite a new direction and spur to the musical interest; but Mr. Fasole, and Jane Gordon were not forgotten. There was time to watch them, and sing too. Through the whole winter, the singing-master, though his way lay in quite an opposite direction, had thought proper to see Miss Gordon home, except when it was very cold or stormy, when he modestly withdrew, with an air which said he did not wish his attentions to seem particular. It had become quite a trick with the young men to listen by the road-side in order to ascertain whether he did not pop the question somewhere between the school-house and Mr. Gordon's; but the conclusion was, that either he was too discreet to do it, or too cunning to let it be heard, for nothing could ever be distinguished beyond the most ordinary talk. Nothing could be more obvious, however, than that, whatever were Mr. Fasole's intentions, poor Jane was very much in earnest. She lost all her interest in the village circle, and, too honest and sincere for concealment, only found her spirits when the fascinating singing-master appeared. He had the magnetizer's power over the whole being of his pupil. The parent observed all this with the greatest uneasiness, and remonstrated with her on the imprudence of her conduct, but in vain. They reminded her that no one knew anything of the singing-master, and that he very probably had at least one wife elsewhere, although it was past the art of man to betray him into an acknowledgment of such incumbrance; but Jane was deaf to all caution, and evidently only waited for the votary of music to make up his mind to ask, before she could curtsy and say yes.

The quarterly meeting came on, and Squire Hopkin's big barn was filled to overflowing. A long platform had been erected for the ministers, and rough seats in abundance for the congregation; but every beam, bin, and 'coign of vantage,' was hung with human life, in some shape or other. Such a gathering had not been seen for a long while. In front was placed Mr. Fasole with Jane Gordon on his left hand, and his forces ranged in order due on each hand. White was his bosom, (outside) and fiery red his hair and face as he wrought vehemently in beating time, while he sent out volumes, not to say whole editions, of sound. One could not but conclude that every emotion of his soul must find utterance in the course of the morning's performance, if Jane Gordon only listened aright, which she seemed very well disposed to do. But the concluding hymn was to be the crowning effort. It abounded in fugues—those fatal favorites of country choirs, and had also several solos, which Mr. Fasole had assigned to Jane Gordon, in spite of the angry innuendoes of other pretenders. He had drilled her most perseveringly, and though not without some misgivings, had succeeded in persuading himself, as well as his pupil that she would get through these 'tight places' very well, with a little help from him.

When the immense assembly rose to listen while the choir performed this 'set piece,' it was with a sound like the rushing of many waters, and poor Jane, notwithstanding the whispered assurances of the master, began to feel her courage oozing out, as woman's courage is most apt to do just when it is most wanted. She got through her portion of the harmony with tolerable credit; but when it came to the first solo, it was as if one did take her by the throat, and the sounds died away on her lips. Dead silence ensued, but in a moment, from the other side of the barn, seemingly from a far distant loft, a female voice, clear, distinct, and well trained, took up the recreant strain, and carried it through triumphantly. Then the chorus rose, and, encouraged by this opportune aid, performed their part to admiration—so well, indeed, and with so much enthusiasm, that they did not at first miss the leading of Mr. Fasole. When the next solo's turn came, they had time to look round; and while the distant voice once more sent its clear tones meandering among the rafters, and through the mows, and out of the wide doors, all the class turned to look at the master. There he stood—agape—staring—pale—spiritless—astonished—petrified; his jaw fallen, his nose pinched in, his eyes sunken and hollow, and fixed in wild gaze on the dim distance whence issued the potent sound, while poor Jane's fascinated optics gazed nowhere but on him.

But before note could be taken of their condition, the chorus must once more join in the last triumphant burst, for the new auxiliary had inspired them like a heavenly visitant, and they could not attend to sublimary things. They finished in a perfect blaze of glory, the unknown voice sounding far above all others, and carrying its part as independently as Mr. Fasole could have done.

'What is the matter with the singing-master?' 'Has he got a fit?' 'Is he dying?' was whispered through the crowd as soon as the meeting was dismissed. 'Bring water—whiskey—a fan—oh goodness! what is to be done?'

'Let me come to him,' said a powerful voice just at hand; and, as the crowd opened, a tall, masculine woman, of no very prepossessing exterior, made her way to the fainting Orpheus.

'Jedediah!' she exclaimed, giving a stout lift to the drooping head; 'Jedediah! don't you know your own Polly Ann?'

It was Mrs. Fasole—a very promising scholar, whom the unhappy teacher had married at the scene of former labors somewhere in the interior of Illinois, hoping to find her a true helpmeet in the professional line. But discovering to his cost that she understood only one kind of harmony, and that not of the description most valuable in private, he had run away from her and her big brothers, and hoped in the deep seclusion of still newer regions, to escape her forever, and pass for that popular person an agreeable bachelor. Whether he was really villain enough to have intended to marry poor Jane too, we cannot know, but we will charitably hope not; though we are not sure that to wantonly trifle with an innocent girl's affections for the gratification of vanity was many shades less culpable. The world judges differently, we know, since it makes one offense punishable by law, while the other is considered in certain circles, rather good than otherwise. But the singing-master and his fearful spouse disappeared, and those who had not joined the class exulted; while as far as public demonstration went, we could not see but the singing at meeting fell back to very nearly the same old mark, under the auspices of old deacon Ingalls, who for many years has been troubled with a polypus in his nose.

Jane Gordon is a much more sensible girl than she was two years ago, and looks with no little complacency upon Jacob Still, a neighbor's son, who boasts that he can turn a furrow much better than he can a tune.

STRUCTURE OF THE HEART.—"An anatomist (as Dr. Paley observes) who understood the structure of the heart, might say beforehand that it would play; but he would expect, I think, from the complexity of the mechanism, and the deficiency of many of its parts, that it would always be liable to derangement, or that it would soon work itself out. Yet shall this wonderful machine go night and day, for eighty years together, at the rate of a hundred thousand strokes every twenty-four hours, having at every stroke a great resistance to overcome; and shall continue this action for this length of time, without disorder, and without weariness.

"Each ventricle will at least contain one ounce of blood. The heart contracts four thousand times in one hour; from which it follows that there passes through the heart, every hour, four thousand ounces, or three hundred and fifty pounds of blood. Now the whole mass of blood is said to be about twenty-five pounds, so that a quantity of blood, equal to the whole mass of blood, passes through the heart fourteen times in one hour; which is about once every four minutes."—[Buck's Practical Expositor.

THE LAST TIME.

BY EMILIE REVLIO.

THERE'S a time for all things; there's a time to be gay;
THERE'S a time for dark night, and a time for bright day;
THERE'S a time when the heart should be happy and free;
THERE'S a time when light laughter no longer should be;
THERE'S a time for sweet youth, and a time for old age;
THERE'S a time when the infant will turn to the sage;
THERE'S a time when the past will a mockery seem;
THERE'S a time when the past will appear but a dream;
THERE'S a time that all dread—there's a last time in store—
When the soft smile of loved ones can welcome no more;
THERE'S a time when at peace in the grave we shall lie;
THERE'S a time when the noblest and bravest must die.

ANECDOTE OF JOSEPH THE SECOND.

JOSEPH the Second (Emperor of Germany, succeeded by Francis the Second, and grandfather to Ferdinand, the late Emperor of Austria) was fond of any adventure where he was not recognized as Emperor. But was this philosophy? I think not, for when it was necessary to sacrifice some imperial caprice to the wishes of the nation, Joseph showed himself but little of the philosopher. Having arrived at Brussels in 1789, in strict incognito, he lived by preference in the delightful palace of Lacken, built many years before by his ancestors. Driving himself one day a very modest equipage, being a carriage to hold two people, with a servant out of livery, in the neighborhood of Brussels, he was overtaken by a shower a short distance after leaving the avenue that surrounded the city to take the road to Lacken. He had not gone two hundred paces when he overtook a pedestrian going the same way, and who made a sign to him that he wished to speak to him. This was an old Belgian soldier. Joseph stopped the horses.

'Monsieur,' says the pedestrian, 'would there be any indiscretion in asking a place beside you?—it would not inconvenience you, as you are alone in your caleche, and would save my uniform, for I am an invalid at the expense of his majesty.'

'Let us save the uniform, my good man,' says the emperor, 'and place yourself beside me. Where have you been walking?'

'Ah,' says the soldier, 'I have been to see one of my friends, who is one of the royal park-keepers, and have made a most excellent breakfast.'

'What is it you have had so excellent?'

'Guess?'

'How should I know—some soup, perhaps?'

'Ah, yes—soup indeed, better than that.'

'A fillet of veal well larded?'

'Better than that.'

'I cannot guess any more,' says Joseph.

'A pheasant, my worthy sir, a pheasant, taken from the royal preserves,' permitting himself to give a slight tap on the imperial shoulder next him.

'Taken from the royal preserves, it ought to be much the better,' replied the monarch.

'So I can assure you it was,' answered his companion.

As they approached the town, and the rain still continuing, Joseph asked his passenger where he lived, and where he would get down.

'You are too good, sir,' says the old soldier, 'I shall impose upon your kindness.'

'No, no,' replied the emperor; 'let me know your street.'

The pedestrian, naming the street, requested to know to whom he was so much obliged for such civility as he had received.

'Come, it is your turn,' says Joseph, 'to guess.'

'You are in the army, without doubt?'

'Yes.'

'Lieutenant?'

'Yes, but better than that.'

'Colonel, perhaps?'

'Better than that, I tell you.'

'Hullo?' says the old soldier, retreating to the corner of the carriage; 'are you a general or field-marshal?'

'Better than that.'

'Ah! it is the emperor?'

'As you say, so it is.'

There was no means of throwing himself at the monarch's feet in the carriage. The old soldier made the most ridiculous excuse for his familiarity, requesting of the emperor to stop the carriage that he might get down.

'No,' said the sovereign, 'after having eaten my pheasant you would be too happy, in spite of the rain, to get rid of me so quickly.'

THE QUEEN-BEE AT HOME.—The community of bees is an example of pure monarchy, unrestrained by any checks or power, yet never deviating into despotism on the one hand, or anarchy on the other. Some years ago, while our gracious queen was making a royal progress through her northern dominions, we witnessed a no less interesting sight of the progress of a queen bee, in the glass-hive of an ingenious friend and lover of nature at his country retreat. The hive was of that construction which opened from behind, and showed the whole economy within. In a few minutes the queen made her appearance from the lower part of the hive. Her elongated body and tapering abdomen at once distinguished her. She moved along slowly, now and then pausing to deposit an egg in one of the empty combs; and it was most interesting to perceive how she was constantly accompanied by nearly a dozen of bees that formed a circle round her, with their heads invariably turned towards her. The guard was relieved at frequent intervals, so that, as she walked forward, a new group immediately took the place of the old, and these, having returned again, resumed the labor in which they had been previously engaged. Her appearance always seemed to give pleasure, which was indicated by a quivering movement of the wings. The laborers, in whatever way occupied, immediately forsook their work and came to pay homage to their queen, by forming a guard around her person. Every other part of the hive, meanwhile, presented a busy scene. Many bees were seen moving their bodies with a tremulous motion, by which thin and minute films of wax were shaken from their scaly sides. Others were ready to take up this wax and knead it into matter proper for constructing cells. Frequent arrivals of bees from the field brought pollen on their thighs for the grubs, and honey, which they deposited into the cells. All was activity, order and peaceful industry. None were idle but the drones, who seemed to stroll about like gentlemen.—[British Quarterly Review.]

A DREAM WITH A FULFILMENT.—The Traveler tells a curious story of a physician of this city, who, in speaking of the late case of hydrophobia, related the following instance of remarkable after-fulfilment of a dream. He dreamed that as he was going in at the iron gate of a friend, a small dog flew out and bit him in the calf of the leg. He sprang up in bed, and to his wife's inquiry as to what was the matter, said that he had been bitten by a dog in the leg. His wife replied by a 'poh, that can't be;' but the doctor, imagining that he felt the pain, jumped out of bed, lit a light, and searched for the supposed wound, but found that his leg was untouched. He accounts for the pain by the concentration of vitality in the place supposed to be bitten. But the strangest part of the affair followed. About a week afterwards he was called to visit at the house which had been the scene of his dream, and as he entered the iron gate, a dog flew out from the house and bit the doctor in the calf of the leg, in perfect accordance with his previous dream. The family were much astonished to find that the dog should bite any one, but were still more surprised when the doctor related the antecedent circumstances.

TROPICAL DELIGHTS.—Insects are the curse of tropical climates. The bete rogue lays the foundation of a tremendous ulcer. In a moment you are covered with ticks. Chigoes bury themselves in your flesh, and hatch a large colony of young chigoes in a few hours. They will not live together, but every chigoe sets up a separate ulcer, and hath his own private portion of pus. Flies get into your mouth, into your eyes, into your nose; you eat flies, drink flies, and breathe flies. Lizards, cockroaches, and snakes get into your beds; ants eat up the books; scorpions sting you on the foot. Every thing bites, stings, or bruises. Every second of your existence you are wounded by some piece of animal life, that nobody has ever seen before, except Swammerdam and Merriam. An insect with eleven legs is swimming in your tea-cup; a nondescript, with nine wings, is struggling in the small beer; or a caterpillar, with several dozen eyes in his belly, is hastening over the bread and butter. All nature is alive, and seems to be gathering all her entomological host to eat you up, as you are standing, out of coat, waistcoat and breeches. Such are the tropics. All this reconciles us to our dews, fogs, vapors, and drizzle; so our apothecaries rushing about with sincture and gargles; to our old British constitutional coughs, sore throats, and swelled faces.—[Sidney Smith.]

Mr. George R. Gliddon, (the well-known lecturer on Egypt, and to whom the American public is largely indebted for information upon hieroglyphical subjects) is now in London, deeply engaged with the erudite Birch, of the British Museum, in the study of the recently discovered antiquities of Nineveh. These antiquities, reflecting a flood of light upon the early unwritten history of the East, are now claiming a large share of the public attention of the learned. It will be gratifying to the readers of the Literary World to know that it is the intention of Mr. Gliddon to prepare a series of lectures upon these antiquities, largely illustrated by cuts and drawings, and embracing the entire results of their investigation by European scholars. Mr. Gliddon, upon his return to the United States, (which will take place some time during the coming Summer) will also bring with him the later discoveries in Egyptian science, which have been neither few nor unimportant. Few men possess Mr. Gliddon's ability in popularizing abstruse subjects, and we anticipate much pleasure from his new labors in the field of archæological research.

TO YOUNG LADIES.—I have found that the men who are really the most fond of the society of the ladies, who cherish for them a high respect, are seldom the most popular with the sex. Men of great assurance, whose tongues are highly hung, who make words supply the place of ideas, and place compliment in the room of sentiment, are the favorites. A due respect for women leads to respectful action towards them; and respectful is usually distant action, and this great distance is mistaken by them for neglect or want of interest.—[Addison.]

AN INDIAN EXPEDIENT.—While a man and his family, a wife and several children, in a small canoe, were crossing a large bay, a shark rose near his canoe, and, after reconnoitring a short time, swam towards it, and endeavoured to upset it. The size of the canoe, however, rendered this impossible; so the ferocious monster actually began to break it to pieces, by rushing forcibly against it. The Indian fired at the shark when he first saw it, but without effect; and, not having time to reload, he seized his paddle, and made for the shore. The canoe, however, from the repeated attacks of the fish, soon became leaky, and it was evident that in a few minutes more the whole party would be at the mercy of the infuriated monster. In this extremity, the Indian took up his youngest child, an infant of a few months old, and dropped it overboard; and, while the shark was devouring it, the rest of the party gained the shore.—Baltimore's Hudson's Bay.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1849.

WAR AND LABOR.

We listened, not long since, to a discourse by an eloquent and learned divine, on the subject of "Peace and War." He attempted to show that War was a device of the devil to corrupt the nations—that nations, in fact, became vicious through its influence—and on the contrary, that Peace was fruitful in every virtue which can exalt a people or adorn a man.

We have heard many such discourses before, and read many essays upon the subject, and the more we read and meditate, the more we are convinced that these ultra Peace, or "non-resistance" doctrines are founded on a false philosophy and a shallow view of things. History teaches us that national virtue has flourished the most in War, and invariably declines in a state of Peace. And this fact presents a curious question to philosophers and philanthropists for their consideration. All men profess to deprecate War, and there are none that do not mourn over the misery and destruction it brings upon individuals. All men know that War cannot be practiced without immense sacrifice of life—that they who take the sword generally perish by the sword, and notwithstanding all this, War has ever filled the largest page in the history of nations, and to-day we are just as liable to rush into the deadly strife as ever.

Now, why is it that thousands and millions of men, with their eyes open, knowing that all their individual interests and their lives are put in fearful peril, rush to the conflict with an enthusiasm which raises them above all fear and gives them an aspect almost supernatural? Is it not because War and Labor, which are at bottom the same, are a radical law of the universe, existing in the nature and fitness of things? Nature is an immense battle-field, and in all her departments, we discover the eagerness of invasion and the obstinacy of resistance. The ivy twines along the trunk of the oak, and too weak to pierce its bark coils around it like an enraged serpent. The waves of the sea, attacked by the fierce storm, rise up, and frothy with wrath, dash upon and chase each other with fury from continent to continent. Blocks of granite and marble are attacked by penetrating frosts and shattered into innumerable fragments. The snows on the Alpine heights resist defiant, and resist through long ages the burning rays of the summer sun. The elements, in subterranean caverns are let loose in their blind force and fierceness, and the globe trembles to its center. Earthquakes awake in their wrath, volcanoes disembogue, and cities and towns and villages, and smiling landscapes are overwhelmed in one mighty ruin. Hurricanes sweep over seas and continents, destroying whole navies at a blast, and prostrating the sturdiest of forests.

And in animated nature the struggle is not less fierce or terrible. Above, the hawk pursues his prey through the sky, while below the timid hare flees before the merciless hound. The flying-fish, pursued in the sea by the dolphin, and in the air by the albatross, finds no repose nor security, from the first hour of its miserable life, to that when it falls the victim of its relentless foes. Around and within this earthly home of ours, apparently so placid and so wondrous fair, the most potent and fearful agencies are combatting in an everlasting war. War! war!! war!!! is everywhere. Peace nowhere. No race of beings, no being throughout God's universe, but is called upon either to attack or defend, but is wandering up and down seeking rest it never finds. All creation is struck with one universal unrest. Not a heart but throbs, not a leaf but trembles, not a solid rock but heaves and throes.

Here then is the FACT which stares us in the face, whether we consult the history of nations, or the mysterious workings of nature. But why, we may ask, why these incessant conflicts? It is that each being and each thing bears in itself, at the same time, the elements of production and destruction—that war is the painful but holy law which is imposed upon all beings and all things as a "means of progress." It is an ordinance of Providence, wide as the universe and inexorable as destiny, that the particular shall be sacrificed to the universal, and that the interests of man shall be sacrificed to the interests of humanity.

"Combat, therefore," such is the voice of nature to man, "combat, O mortal, for thy own existence—war against the blind forces which annoy thee from without, and the fiercer ones that assail thee from within. Combat to reform the society in which thou livest, if it is bad, or to preserve it if it is good. But if thou leavest to accident the care of thy future, if thou foldest thy arms in peace and submittest to material oppression on the one hand, or neglectest to work thy moral and spiritual deliverance on the other, thou shalt die in the wilderness, like the faithless children of Israel. Gird on thy sword and march forth with a manly heart, and lofty brow, to give liberty to the enslaved nations, and to advance the high interests of Humanity."

MR. LEAVENWORTH'S GOLD-WASHERS FOR CALIFORNIA.

WM. LEAVENWORTH, Esq., the well-known inventor of a celebrated type-cutting machine, which has superseded all others, has recently invented a "Gold Washer," which is admirably adapted to the California "Gold Diggings." We have thoroughly examined one of these machines, and are confident that they are superior to all others, and therefore commend them to our friends who contemplate going to California.

The usual mode of gathering the gold in California has been, to put a small quantity of the gravel or earth containing the gold, &c., into a bowl or pan, mixed with water, and stirred with a stick till the gold from its greater weight, settles at the bottom; when the earthy matter and water are poured off. The gravel is then removed by the hand, and the gold is found at the bottom, which is carefully gathered into bottles. This is a slow, tedious, and as they generally work in the water, a very unhealthy process.

By using MR. LEAVENWORTH PATENT GOLD-WASHER, the machine may be placed at any reasonable distance from the water, which is elevated by means of a pump, hydraulic ram, or otherwise, and conducted to the machines by India-rubber or leather hose. The hand machines are worked to the best advantage with three men, one to shovel the earth, one to pump the water, and one to work the machine; the three will thus do the work of a hundred men with their pans, and each may work on dry soil, under a screen of sail cloth, and not be exposed to the extreme heat of the sun in that region, which, during the dry season, frequently runs up to 110° in the shade. The most desirable method for sifting the soil of California, is to attach the machines to horse or other power; and particularly, for those unaccustomed to hard labor, as all the work may be performed with horses, mules, oxen, or cows, except that of simply feeding the machines, which may be done by Indians or common laborers, while the proprietor, may sit under his tent or screen, feeling sure that the valuable metals cannot escape, unless removed by the laborers.

As none go to California, but for the acquisition of gold, or its equivalent, and most, for the sole purpose of the immediate gathering it from the soil, it is therefore very important for them, that they go prepared with proper machinery and tools, to enable them to obtain the greatest amount in the least time, and with the least sacrifice of health, comfort, and expense. No sane man would now think of shelling his crop of corn with a cob, if he could obtain a machine, or pound his wheat in a mortar, if he could get it to a flouring mill within a hundred miles, or wash the soil of California in a pan, if he could get one of MR. LEAVENWORTH'S PATENT GOLD-WASHERS; for with all due respect to the inventors of the various machines for separating the precious metals from the earth, and all of them have merit no doubt, but his so far excels any, yet introduced in the market, it is hardly worth while to allude to them, though we have several different kinds on sale and exhibition. Emigrants must bear in mind that the thermometer frequently stands at 110° in the shade, in the valley of the Sacramento, and those unaccustomed to labor should particularly avoid it, if possible; and they may avoid personal labor, by procuring MR. LEAVENWORTH'S machine, and amass fortunes too, with little risk or expenditure. If an individual, has not the necessary capital to obtain the horse-power and nest of machines, let parties club together and get the outfit which will cost about $400 only, for four machines, horse-power, and tools, and $50 for each machine added; but no one should go without taking as many as he conveniently can; for, no doubt $500 will readily be paid for one, on its arrival in California. The horse-power may be worked with from one to six horses, and will drive from four to sixteen machines, and pump the water necessary to work them. Two men cannot shovel the dirt into one of the machines so fast as it will sift it, and, that, the machine will catch all the gold, &c., we think there can be no doubt, and this appears to be all that is necessary for a machine to do.

The expediency of substituting the machines for tin pans, &c., must be apparent to all. Individuals and parties should provide themselves with food and clothing here for as long a period, after arriving there, as practicable, as everything except fresh beef and water, will be extravagantly high for years, consumers and not producers are, and will be the class of emigrants to the gold regions of California, until the labor for sifting the soil for gold, becomes of no greater value than that of plowing and hoeing it, for corn and potatoes. A good India-rubber or sail-cloth tent, hammock, or mattress, and mosquito-net are indispensable. Screens of sail-cloth to protect you from the sun when at work, a stove and cooking utensils. Mechanics should take all the tools of their profession, and get them of the best American manufacture, with duplicates—for the labor of mechanics, when wanted, will pay just as well, as digging gold, even should they gather a pound a day—and it will be a great luxury to exchange work occasionally, and to read a good book when fatigued—as newspapers at present are a rarity in California.

We give below the certificate of Mr. W. P. Lander, the well-known refiner and assayer of the U. S. mint.

MR. WM. LEAVENWORTH, Dear Sir:—After examining the various Gold-Washers in the city, that have come to my knowledge, I have ordered one of yours for my own use in California, and am convinced from its scientific principles and mechanical arrangement, that it far excels any that I have seen. Having had many years experience in smelting, refining, and assaying gold, and gathering it with quicksilver, I feel warranted in advising all persons intending to gather the placer gold, platinum, cinnabar, and black sand in California, or elsewhere, with the greatest dispatch, and the least loss, to get your invaluable PATENT GOLD-WASHERS, and more particularly, as there is no detention of the machine to clear it of the earth and gravel, the machine expelling everything from it excepting the gold, &c., which cannot escape.

Respectfully yours, WM. P. LANDER,
Practical Refiner, Smelter, and Assayer.

MAGNOLIA LODGE, BROOKLYN.

As some persons have thought proper to misrepresent the actual condition of this Lodge, and the circumstances attending its re-instatement, we give below a statement of the facts, which may be relied on as absolutely true.

BRO. AUG. C. L. ARNOLD: On the evening of Nov. 7, 1848, a resolution was offered that the officers be directed to apply to the G. L. of this State, of which Geo. H. Andrews is the G. M., for re-instatement; and so that all might thoroughly understand what they were about, and to give Daniel P. Barnard an opportunity to be present, the matter was laid over until the 5th of Dec. (four weeks). At that time the members appeared in large numbers, (as per notification,) but the friends of the New Constitution now asked for a further delay of two weeks, especially to allow D. P. Barnard to be present. In accordance with their wishes, the members consented to a further postponement; and on the 19th the matter came up for final action, and was carried, by a vote of 46 to 22. A protest was presented from 20 persons, some of whom had no right to vote in the Lodge, and some names were signed by proxy. Since the passage of the resolutions, four of these have recognised, and do now acknowledge the majority as the legal Lodge.

In accordance with the resolutions we were re-instated, and G. M. Andrews, on the next evening, appeared to install the officers. He was first refused admittance by some person at the door, and was, by physical force, prevented from taking the chair, the minority calling upon the N. G. to open a Lodge that had acknowledged her suspension, and was now about to be re-instated. Rather than to have difficulty, the majority proposed to meet the minority in caucus. This was agreed to, and "all but the members" were requested to leave the room. They did so, and N. G. Kemble was called to the chair, and P. G. Skinner offered a resolution, that every member who might withdraw from Magnolia Lodge within three months, upon Constitutional differences of opinion, be entitled to, and shall receive, a pro rata of the funds and properties of the Lodge. Instead of this resolution being lost, as has been asserted, it was carried, by a vote of 25 to 7. But as we had agreed that a decision, to be binding, must be legal, we were therefore compelled, on account of a minority of seven, to adjourn without accomplishing anything.

The G. Officers again appeared, and proceeded to examine the members in the room in the P. W. Some six or seven members of other Lodges refused to give the P. W., and were then requested by G. M. Andrews to retire, and let the members of Magnolia Lodge proceed with their business. This they refused to do, saying they were invited there by P. G. Reed, and they should remain. To avoid a disturbance, and to comport ourselves as members of the Order, and as gentlemen, we retired to the Committee Room, not from choice, but from the causes above alluded to, and were there duly re-instated, and our officers installed; since which time we have continued our meetings as usual, and in accordance with our By-Laws, on Tuesday evening, in the principal and usual Lodge Room. We have performed, also, all the duties of a Lodge; have attended our sick, (now seven in number,) and paid their benefits; while the minority have only claimed to be Magnolia Lodge. They have received moneys from the members, and having a majority of the trustees, they have prevented us from getting hold of the funds; but they have never attended to the sick, or performed any of the duties or functions of a Lodge.

We have been compelled to loan from our members moneys to pay benefits. Now, to get over these difficulties, we have consented to leave the matter to three disinterested persons, to decide whether we are entitled to the books, funds, &c., or not.

SEVERAL MEMBERS OF MAGNOLIA LODGE, 166.

The minority, although they claim to be the Lodge, and although the By-Laws say that we shall meet on Tuesday evening, they have concluded to hold their meetings on Wednesday evening, until the matter is settled.

LETTER FROM PHILADELPHIA.

California Fever—Odd-Fellows' Cemetery—Accident—Amusements.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 15, 1849.

DEAR BRO.—We greet you again from our city, and though the yellow (gold) fever has carried off in its ravages, some of our best citizens and sterling Odd-Fellows, there are "still a few of the latter sort left." The brig Oniots sailed on Thursday morning last, conveying the steamboat Islander and a number of passengers, whose golden visions we hope may be realized. Each and all appeared in high spirits, and talked of the Sacramento, as if its waters washed the beach in the neighborhood of Cape May, at farthest. The brig Osceola is announced for to-day, among whose passengers we see the names of Capt. Salinsky, Majs. Leasing and Good, Cols. Dreka, Banks and Dekirt, W. W. Graham, W. H. Bunn, R. M. Patterson and a host of others, with Maj. Gen. Kepheldt of the Russian army.

The elections in our Lodges are over, the die is cast, and the officers elect bear it with composure, while the defeated candidates present nearly as serene an aspect as before the contest. Many of the changes have been for the better, and the Lodges generally have commenced the New Year with a determination to act upon the advice of one of the heroes of the Alamo and "go ahead."

"The Odd-Fellows Cemetery," now in course of preparation, is beautifully situated on "the Ridge Road," about three miles from our city, adjoining the "American Mechanics Cemetery," and between "Monument Cemetery," and "Laurel Hill." It contains thirty-two acres, a portion of which is already ornamented with shrubbery. The spacious building now standing will be re-modeled for the chapel; and we hope to see it, through the enterprise of the Order, one of the most appropriate receptacles for the "lamented dead," in our vicinity.

Our city was startled last Tuesday, by an incident which jeopardized the lives of nearly a hundred of its inmates. A large concourse of people had assembled on the Schuylkill river, on a cake of ice attached by a narrow strip to the shore. Dr. Stone, lady, and child, breaking through, caused a panic, which detached this cake, (containing an acre or more,) and it commenced floating toward the dam. A scene now ensued which defies all description. Mothers clasped their children to them as if to save them, bystanders shouted impracticable plans, while shrieks of agony rose above the uproar. A gentleman with more presence of mind, jumped into the water on the edge of the dam, and succeeded in getting many to follow his example, who would otherwise, most probably have perished; as it was, but three passed over the dam one of whom, a daughter of Morgan Ash, Esq., was severely injured, but is recovering, the other two but slightly.

Our places of amusement are numerous and well-patronised. The Walnut is open to fair houses with a capital stock company. Mad. Bishop is announced for the coming week. Gen. Welch is still a successful caterer for the public. The Athenaeum has had good houses since its opening, and is a beautiful place, where one can enjoy the luxury of an arm-chair, while laughing at Jefferson. Burke draws full houses in the capital local burlettas played at the Arch. We have also the Zoological Institute, the two great panoramas, Rossiter's paintings, serenaders, &c., and a new circus in the Northern Liberties, which rumor says is to be superceded by a new theater, Messrs. Lester & Son of the St. Charles theater, New-Orleans, proprietors.

We have a deputation of Chippewas here, en route to their "great father," at Washington, relative to retaining the lands they now occupy, on condition of becoming civilized. We wish them success.

Office-seekers are busy arranging plans for our President elect, many of which will exist only in the brains of their inventors.

But I must close, and to remain yours in the bonds which unite Odd-Fellows, I will ever DARE.

REV. MR. MCCLURE, vs. SECRET SOCIETIES.

We copy the following from the Boston Olive Branch, an excellent journal, edited by P. G. Master Norris. We think Bro. Norris lays it over Mr. McClure's shoulders "about right."

SECRET SOCIETIES.

We have just concluded the reading of a long, weak, wishy-washy article, under this head, in the Christian Observatory, edited by Rev. A. W. McClure. We are sorry, on account of our personal respect for the gentleman, to see anything so weak and uncharitable appear under his sanction and authority. It betrays ignorance which would disgrace a school-boy. The article is intended, particularly, as an attack on the Society of Odd-Fellows. He speaks of Jesuits, a Society under the sanction of the Roman Hierarchy, which we let pass.

The other institution, says McClure, to which we refer, is the great defunct Masonry. This single statement of the Rev. gentleman should banish him from the place of a teacher, and put him down as one of Solomon's fools, who affirmeth of the things of which he is ignorant; or as a very dishonest and wicked man, thus to speak of a society never more numerous or prosperous, with hundreds of whose members he meets every day of his life. The learned Doctor McClure says it is defunct. Oh, McClure, throw your pen into the fire, and don't tell the world how little you know. Publish in your next volume that you have dammed up the Niagara, or drained Lake Superior, and you will appear less ridiculous among sensible men.

But, says McClure, we pass to an institution of a very similar character—meaning Odd-Fellows, of which he then and elsewhere speaks—secrecy itself being sufficient proof that the members belong to the kingdom of Satan, and are secret, because their works are those of darkness. He says the occasional public charities of the society are on the principle of decoy ducks, to lure men into their snares, and that the whole is baptized, whining infidelity; and much more of the same character. Our paper is not the organ of any Masonic, Odd-Fellow, or other secret society, but having for more than a quarter of a century been a member, and much of the time an officer, in both of these societies, we feel bound, as an honest conductor of the public press, to protest against such wholesale abuse of our brethren.

The elder society certainly existed many ages before the Christian era. Its creed is, Brotherly Love, Relief and Truth. It has partly overcome the curse of the confusion of languages at Babel, and has instituted a system of intercommunication, which is not impeded by our belonging to a hundred nations, and speaking a hundred different languages; and has the means of knowing that the brother addressing in the dialect, if you please, of the brotherhood, has a good character; having been proved by good men and true, and being found worthy and well qualified, if in trouble, such relief is afforded him as his circumstances require, and brothers' means admit; though Mr. McClure thinks it very wicked to be secret, and wishes us Pharisaically to sound a trumpet before us. Masons choose, in ten thousand small streams, in quiet secrecy, to send relief to the widows and orphans of the brothers. For such purposes they became a brotherhood, and will not disorganize themselves to please Mr. McClure or any other wholesale slanderer of whole societies of good men.

Much the same may be said in favor of the smaller and younger society of Odd-Fellows. This is mostly confined to England and America, and is not world-wide like Masonry. In England, Odd-Fellows annually expend half a million in benefits and charity; in the United States about $125,000. There is very little noise in all this, and we think Mr. McClure's system of condemning them, because they decline to reveal their symbolical language and means of intercommunication, to be uncharitable, weak and wicked. He says the goodness of these men should not be admitted, because those esteemed good men say they are such. They are, he says, parties committed. Such may be said of even the testimony in favor of Christianity itself. All we have learned beyond what we see, taste, smell and feel, we have learned mainly by human testimony; and if this is to be wholly rejected, those who have not been there, have a right to doubt the existence of such cities as London and Paris. Millions of apparently good men have lived and died in the faith that Free-Masonry is a good institution; and hundreds of thousands are now living, who are members of that society, and sincerely think it good, very good indeed—the best merely humane society. The La Fayette and Washingtons were active members, and thousands of ministers of Protestant churches, and tens of thousands of communicants, belong to this ancient society; as do judges, magistrates, presidents and vice presidents. Such Christians and patriots are members; and yet an isolated, weak man, makes over all these men, wiser and better than himself, to his infernal majesty, to be banished heaven, and cursed of God forever! We would not, for all the gold of California, be such a weak and prejudiced bigot, as such opinions suppose their author to be. Let Popes, Jesuits, Spanish inquisitions, thus speak, but let Mr. McClure be a different sort of a man—which we most earnestly pray may be the case—to which let all Masons as well as Christians, say AMEN.

There is but one opinion among the members of the Order here, upon this subject, which is clearly manifested by the position of the Order. Time will show their position to be the only true one.

Yours Fraternally, AMICUS.

It gives me pleasure to add that the above Lodges are in a high state of prosperity.

Very truly yours, in F., L. & T.,

WANT OF INTEREST IN LODGE MEETINGS.

SACCARAPPA, MAINE, Jan. 15, 1849.

DEAR SIR AND BRO.: Knowing that any news of the Order is acceptable to you, I send you the names of the officers of Saccarappa Lodge, for the present term. Henry F. Sands, N. G.; Christopher Way, V. G.; George Riggs, Sec.; John Merrill, Treas. This Lodge has not made more progress than the neighboring Lodges. We are at a stand. There has been about the same number added during the past term as have "run out," as our neighbors, the Rechabites, say. We have nothing to excite us in the Lodges, such as "New Constitution," "Illegal Grand Lodge," and the like. In regard to such things, as far as I know, peace and harmony rule. Perhaps a little too much peace in the Lodges to insure a good attendance.

I notice the remarks of your Washington correspondent, T. W. J., that the whole burden is thrown, in his Lodge, on some 10 or 12. His is not alone. It is, and has been, the case for some time in our Lodge, (numbering about 190,) and also in the neighboring Lodges. Cannot some of our "learned men," those that are high in the Order, and hold high places, devise some means, some plan, that may be generally adopted, either in the "work," or in the usual routine of business, that may make the meetings more interesting and attractive to the members; something that all may participate in. I would not wish it to be public, or to have it inserted in the "rules of order," for the very same reasons that the "work" of the Order is not there. Many, especially in our Lodge, prefer the "old work" to the new, and probably so in other Lodges. Those scarcely ever attend now. I suggest these things, hoping they may meet the eye of some one who may be competent, as well as willing, to do the needful.

As T. W. J. says, "some never attend; and those who do, wish they were out again, for the purpose of gadding about the hotels, at the faro, billiards, bowling saloons, or drinking houses; always restive when in the retreat of Odd-Fellows." So in our small place, many would rather "loaf" around the stores. Now, if some means cannot be devised to make the Lodge Room more attractive than those places, let it be closed; at any rate, let the meetings be less frequent. I should be as much opposed as any to such a plan, but one or the other must soon be adopted. Yours, in F., L. & T. c.

OBJECTS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

✂ The following excellent remarks by a member of the Masonic Fraternity, in regard to his Order have equal force applied to the I. O. O. F.

LET us for a moment look at the nature and objects of Freemasonry.

This venerable society was first known as a combination of men, who were operative, or practical masons, architects, builders, or other workmen, and to its members alone were entrusted the secret of the new discoveries in any branch of the arts then in a rude and uncultivated state. By degrees however, these arts became more generally known. Men began to think and act for themselves. The institution as an operative one, became useless. But from long association, and the kindly feelings engendered by frequent communion and identity of interest, the brethren were unwilling to cast aside the bonds by which they had so long been held together. Masonry then became a school of science, and its disciples were made acquainted with the rudiments of those (to them) sublime mysteries, which the spread of knowledge and civilization have since placed in the hands of every child.

In modern days, we behold the association as a band of brothers, linked together by the silken ties of Friendship, Charity, and Brotherly Love. Their Lodges are so many sacred retreats, where the cares and sorrows of the world cannot enter,—where no religious or political dissensions ever distract the general harmony, for while we interfere with no man's creed, we claim that all men should pay that deferential awe, due from the creature to the Creator, and that in every country we should be subject to the duly constituted authorities.

Our grand object is to break down that universal Suspicion, which every man feels towards his neighbor, and to substitute a general brotherhood throughout the world. And that this has been the effect of Masonry wherever it has been known and appreciated we boldly assert without the fear of contradiction. Influenced by its benign principles, we behold a brother in the wild son of the forest saving the life of his enemy, we see the bonds of fellowship strengthening between the inhabitants of the most distant parts of the world, and in fact, by means of its mystic and universal language we see a beacon light that points on to the day when, "nation shall no longer war against nation," and mankind forgetting its selfishness, shall be united in one great family of friends and brothers.

We claim that through our Order, and others of a like nature, and through them alone, will man learn to act upon the square, to cultivate feelings of brotherly love for the whole human race, and in short to "do as they would be done by."

Is it too much then, gentle reader, for us to ask that you should, at least, suspend your opposition to us, until you have been made acquainted with our mysteries, till you have listened to the practical wisdom of our tenets, and have seen their effect even upon the most uncultivated minds? The opposition of fanatics of every kind has been waged against us, but we have ever seen the shafts of Envy, Malice and Mistaken Zeal, fall harmless at our feet. FEAR, we know not; for no oppression has ever been able to overpower us; "our armor is mercy," and "our shield is truth."—[Eperiment.

MAGNOLIA LODGE AGAIN.

We have received a note from Bro. Ward, the Treasurer of the soi disant Grand Lodge requesting us to state that although his Lodge, has returned to the fellowship of the Order, it was against his will. But we will let him speak for himself.

EDITOR OF THE GOLDEN RULE:—An article in last week's paper, headed "Magnolia Lodge Brooklyn," being calculated to convey a wrong impression in relation to my position in our Constitutional differences, I would observe that it is true that I was present when Magnolia Lodge voted to be reinstated, (as they called it,) some thirty of us, however, protested against any proceedings of the kind being had.

I shall continue to perform the duties incumbent on me as Grand Treasurer of the Grand Lodge of the State of New-York, I. O. O. F. I am asking nothing but what is fair to request your stating this, so that any wrong impression conveyed may be corrected. So far as Magnolia Lodge is concerned, matters have been referred to Grand Master Barnard, and Past Grand Skinner, to arrange a settlement, every member will choose for himself such jurisdiction as he may prefer, each having a pro rata share of the funds. Respectfully,

THEO. A. WARD.

JANUARY 15, 1849.

F. HITCHCOCK, Esq.—AMERICAN MUSEUM.—This gentleman, so long and favorably known as the efficient manager of the American Museum, is about to retire from that establishment, and to devote himself to mercantile pursuits. This withdrawal of Mr. Hitchcock we know will be regretted by all. Indeed, we know not how the Museum can go without him, he has been so long identified with it. Much of its success is to be attributed, most certainly, to his judicious management. Mr. Barnum must set apart one day and evening for Mr. Hitchcock's benefit.

We learn that persons connected with the Museum are having prepared a silver pitcher, as a testimonial of regard to the retiring manager. We hope Mr. Hitchcock's success as a merchant will equal his success as manager. We understand he is to be succeeded by Mr. Greenwood, a very worthy and intelligent gentleman.

BALTIMORE ITEMS.

THE PROGRESS OF IMPROVEMENT.—The improvements in the department of building and remodeling, which were swiftly carried on all through the past summer and fall, have not ceased. Multitudes of houses are yet in progress. The mildness of the autumn and winter, thus far, has been highly favorable to bricklayers and carpenters, who have suffered little or no interruption in their business.

A HINT FOR SOMEBODY.—"Resolved, That hereafter we will not permit any society, besides the Church, at their funerals on our burying ground, to deliver addresses or perform any other ceremonies, in addition to those established funeral services performed by the minister of the church, or by a substitute acknowledged or recommended by him; or, in his absence, by the vestry.

THE VESTRY OF THE SECOND GERMAN EV. LUTHERAN CHURCH."

We invite the attention of all whom it may concern to the above notice, which we cut from the Baltimore Sun. We presume the Order of Odd-Fellows is included in the prohibition. We would venture to suggest to those who own lots in the particular burying ground in question, that it would be well to inquire of "the Vestry," if they may be allowed the privilege of a hearse and mourners at their funeral.

NEW YORK CANAL REVENUES.—The New York Canals are pouring a golden stream into the public treasury. During the season of navigation for the year 1848, the canal tolls, including those received from railroads, amounted to $3,459,690. This is a mine a little ahead of any to be found in California, and is incomparably more conducive to the public weal.

An engine of ten horse power, is exhibiting in London, worked by the vapor of perchloride.

THEATRICALS AND AMUSEMENT.

THE entertainments at the different houses the past week, have not had much novelty or variety. This is always a period when amusements of this kind languish. Balls, parties, and the absence of strangers generally, produce this result. Yet, on the whole, the attendance has been better than could have been expected.

At the BOWERY, the beautiful spectacle of Boadicea, has a continued run. The feats of Lavater Lee and his company are truly wonderful.

At the BROADWAY, Monte Cristo, with all its gorgeous scenery and interesting incidents. As a whole, it is truly grand and imposing; and Lester and Dyott give great prominence and effect to their parts by their admirable acting.

At the NATIONAL, Wacousta, and a series of light and amusing pieces, played by an excellent stock company.

At BURTON's the same success, and the same characteristic pieces.

OPERA HOUSE.—The Fancy Ball was not as brilliant and well attended as, from the preparations on a large and extensive scale, it ought to have been. There is some satiety in the public mind in regard to amusements of this kind, and they, like some other follies, have seen their best days among us. We are glad to have a resumption of the regular Italian opera, that most delightful and innocent of all entertainments.

CHINESE MUSEUM.—This is a very interesting place of resort. The Chinese, isolated for so many ages as they have been from the rest of the world, and retaining the customs and modes of thought of the most remote periods, have of late attracted much attention. Since the war with England, they have been more accessible as a people, and commercial enterprise and religious zeal will greatly increase their intercourse with civilized people. Of course, that which throws light upon their manners and institutions must possess a deep interest and value. The collection of Mr. Peters, now exhibiting in Broadway, is rich and extensive. You have presented here a complete picture of Chinese life and manners. Their dress, their daily habits, their domestic scenes, their shops and modes of transacting business, their itinerant traffic, their various utensils used in every branch of art, their specimens of manufacture, and of the productions of the soil, their vessels, bridges, and their temples and houses; all are here faithfully exhibited, and afford as much information of the people, in an hour, as if you had passed years in the country. The mode of administering criminal justice, and the nature of the penalties inflicted for crimes, are forcibly illustrated. We advise all to visit this highly interesting institution.

NEW YORK CITY GLEANER.—Such is the name of a new paper which has been laid upon our table. It promises to be a well-conducted and interesting journal. W. H. Mosely is the editor.

THE PEOPLE'S OWN AND FLAG OF THE FREE.—Our indefatigable friend Hannegan has united these two papers, and changed the form to a large octavo, in which shape the journal makes a very handsome appearance. Mr. Hannegan is now publishing in the columns of this journal a romance of his own, of sterling merit, and thrilling interest, called "Raymond the Relentless."

SUGAR PLANTING IN ALABAMA.—The Mobile Register says that the planters in the interior of that State are beginning to perceive the evils of the present system of raising cotton to the exclusion of everything else, and are directing their attention to other objects of agriculture. One of these, the sugar cane, has been tested in various parts of the State with encouraging success.

Facts and Scraps.

HAZEL EYES IN THE ASCENDANT.—Major Noah discourses thus of hazel eyes: "They inspire at first a Platonic sentiment, which gradually, but surely expands, and merges into love as securely founded as the Rock of Gibraltar. A woman with a hazel eye never elopes from her husband, never chats scandal, never sacrifices her husband's comfort to her own, never finds fault, never talks too much or too little, always is an entertaining, intellectual and agreeable creature. We never knew but one uninteresting and unamiable woman with a hazel eye, and she had a nose which looked, as the Yankees say, 'like the little end of nothin' whittled down to a pint.'"

To which we say amen; experience and observation having revealed to us the same fate.

A correspondent "Calculator" writes:—"Your paper, along with others, has given a paragraph from the Bristol Journal, to the effect that a porter employed by a needle manufacturer at Redditch was robbed by a footpad of 118,000,000 of needles. This paragraph is a specimen of how thoughtlessly people sometimes talk about millions. The quantity of needles named would weigh not less than from 12 to 16 tons."

TREASURE TROVE.—A person in England, lately rummaging among his family documents, found written upon the back of an old deed some words indicating that a pot of gold was buried in a certain place in the garden. It was at first regarded as a hoax, but on digging up the spot, an iron pot came to light containing 15,000 guineas, and a scrap of parchment, much decayed, upon which was written: "The devil shall have it rather than Cromwell."

Banvard's catalogue or bill of the Panorama of the Mississippi in London is headed by a coat of arms, and the motto of his family, Bon-verd, at which the English critics turn up their noses. "In aspect," say they, "he is a true Yankee, thin, energetic and wiry, with the well-known intonation."

Mr. H. O'Reilly, the enterprising projector of the Western lines of telegraph has sent in a memorial to Congress, proposing to establish a line of telegraph to the Pacific Ocean, to be completed in eighteen months should the desired encouragement be given.

According to the most accurate accounts, only 4,000,000 Bibles were in use throughout the United States in the year 1840. The number has now increased to 80,000,000. In 1840 the Bible was printed in forty-eight different languages and dialects; in 1848 the different versions of the Holy Scriptures amount to 146.

The gold mines in Virginia promise to rival those of California. One pan-full of the ore last week produced $125 of pure gold, and Commodore Stockton, with three negroes, pounded out six pounds, worth $1200, in two or three days.

Mrs. Nixon, of Medina, Orleans Co., N. Y., who was riding to Albion with her husband, called at a drug store for morphine, to relieve a tooth-ache. The lad gave her strychnine, a fatal poison. She died almost immediately after applying it.

A stone cutting machine, now in operation in New Haven, Ct., which is worked by steam, is said to perform the work of a hundred men. The cutting instrument is composed of half a dozen circular saws.

FRIENDSHIP.—I lay it down as a fact, that if all men knew what they say one of another, there would not be four friends in the world. This appears by the quarrels which are sometimes caused by indiscreet report.

A shrewd old gentleman once said to his daughter, "Be sure, my dear, you never marry a poor man; but, remember that the poorest man in the world is one that has money and nothing else."

An extensive mine of Cannel coal has lately been discovered on the lands of W. M. Peyton, on Coal River, about 80 miles from its junction with the Kanawha, in Western Virginia.

Love, like the plague, is often communicated by clothing and money.

The Hon. Mrs. Norton, known as an authoress, has gone to Portugal.

A venerable man says—"Let the slandered take comfort—it is only at fruit trees that thieves throw stones."

IMMENSE DISCOVERY.—The N. O. Courier, publishes the following—which is, of course, perfectly true:

A French physician established at Vera Paz, who, beside practicing medicine, has the charge of extensive farming estates, upon making some excavations, undertaken with the view of forming a canal through which to carry his produce to the sea, discovered at the bottom of the Bay of Honduras, the opening of a monumental canal 75 meters wide, (about 240 feet,) and running in a straight line toward the South-west, its sides being constructed of enormous stones, rudely cut. The two walls, which continued parallel, had been followed to the distance of several leagues.

Having reached the foot of the mountain, where the volcano of Fuego is now in activity, and having cut away huge trees that obstructed the entrance, they passed under a vault of 100 meters in height, (about 335 feet, and of the same width as the canal. Nothing among the ancient Cyclopean structures in Greece could give an adequate idea of the tremendous masonry of the walls of this vault. The canal is filled with salt water 20 meters deep.

Our intrepid countryman did not hesitate to embark with some Indians in a pirogue, which he caused to be brought to the spot, and eighteen hours afterward, (if his story is to be believed,) he entered the great ocean, (the Pacific,) between Guatemala and San Salvador, through an immense natural grotto, called by the fishermen of that coast, the Devil's Mouth, which superstition had deterred them from ever entering. The whole vaulted part of this superhuman structure was lighted by shafts, cut through to the surface above, and through its whole extent it is navigable for the largest ships.

SINGULAR DISEASE OF THE EYE.—A singular case occurred last week at the Glasgow Eye Infirmary. A girl, sixteen years of age, having applied on account of loss of sight of her left eye, the cause was ascertained to be the presence of a living worm hydatid (the cysticercus of scientific naturalists,) in the eye, close before the pupil, which it completely obstructed. The species of animal consists of a round bag, about the size of a small pea, from which on one side springs its body, which is a filament, consisting of numerous rings, and capable of being elongated and retracted at the creature's will. The body ends in the neck and head, and the latter is supplied with four lateral suckers. All this was plain to the naked eye in this instance, but appeared still more so when the animal was viewed through a microscope. As the existence of such a creature in the interior of the eye not only prevents vision, but ultimately destroys the whole textures of the organ, it was resolved to remove it by operation. This was successfully effected on Saturday last. The patient behaved with perfect steadiness, and found her vision immediately restored. The hydatid continued to live for more than half an hour after being extracted. As only four similar cases are on record, the worm excited much curiosity, and was examined by numerous visitors, both lay and medical.—[Glasgow (Canada) Chronicle.

QUITE A CHANGE.—Monsieur Alexandre Vattmare, who has become so justly eminent for his labors to effect the establishment of a system of international exchanges, is a native of Paris, where he was educated as a surgeon, and was sent in 1814 with a convoy of sick soldiers to Berlin. His talents for ventriloquism and mimic representation, led him to relinquish his former career, and to resort to the exercise of those talents as a source of profit. In Great Britain, he thus personated one evening, forty different characters, which elicited from Sir Walter Scott, the novelist, a piece of impromptu poetry, which is well known and admired.

THE OLDEST PRESS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The St. Mary's Beacon, Maryland, is regularly printed on a press which has been in use for more than a hundred years! It no doubt works slowly, compared with modern improvements in printing machinery; but as a memento of the olden time, when Benjamin Franklin was a printer-boy, it is too sacred to be thrown away, so long as it can make a legible impression. It worked off editions which announced Braddock's defeat, the coronation of George III, and all those stirring events which subsequently occurred in our struggle for independence.

The Leicestershire Mercury, (Eng.) says that freehold land is now selling on what is called Diss Common, for building purposes, at the rate of £700 per acre, which, before the railway in that vicinity, was barely worth the tillage. This is the way rail roads enhance the value of real estate.

According to the Albany Argus, the receipts of flour and wheat at tide water for 1848, exceed those of 1847 by about 500,000 barrels!

ACCUMULATION OF GOLD.—The New York Tribune has seen private letters of a recent date, from the Pacific coast, which states that $2,000,000 worth of the dust was at San Francisco, waiting for transportation. The greater part of it will probably be taken by the mail steamer California. The English steamer Pandora carried away $300,000 in dust. Another letter completely contradicts the reports of the disturbances at the Mining Districts. The writer states that excellent order prevails, and there had been but two or three petty depredations since operations commenced in the region.

O, CURSED love of gold!
How worthless is the prize,
That human life doth hold
To our young cheated eyes;
For this from house and home we part.
And tear sweet nature from the heart.

In vain fond parents weep;
In vain a sister sighs;
To gather gold we sweep
To sickly climes and skies;
And when the stream begins to roll,
We gain the world and lose the soul!

An artist of antiquity worked reptiles so skilfully on a cup, that people were afraid to handle it. It was a temperance cup.

Could the poor inebriate, when he raises to his lips the bacchanalian cup, see the venomous reptiles that crawl around it, and lie hid in its deep recesses, eager to prey upon his vitals, he would dash it to the ground with horror, and never more dare even so much as to touch it.

GAETA.—The city of Gaeta, rendered famous by the sejour of Pius IX, is connected with Rome by one of the two routes which lead from the Capital to Naples. From Rome to Terracine the route follows the Appian way, traced by Appius Claudius; it passes through Albano, Velletri, Cisterna, and the Pontine Marshes. Crossing into the kingdom of Naples, it winds through Fondi and its delightful gardens of orange trees, and terminates at the Mola di Gaeta, near the port of Gaeta, a place of about 10,000 inhabitants, on the Mediterranean. Such has been the route of the Holy Father. Gaeta is a little more than half way between Rome and Naples. Mount Cassin, much spoken of lately, on account of its celebrated Convent of Benedictines, having served as a refuge to several members of the "Sacred College," is situated at a distance of about 16 leagues from Naples, on the route to Rome, which passes through Caprano and the old country of the Samnites. The mountain, upon which the monastery is built, is remarkable for its pyramidal form.

A GREAT CITY.—Mr. Walsh, in one of his letters from France, to the National Intelligencer, states that in China, the principal silk market is Sou Tchou, a city of the interior; the largest perhaps in the world; for Peking has but four millions, while, if we may credit Mr. Hedde, who visited it, Sou Tchou has a population of five millions within its walls, and ten millions within a radius of four leagues around. Situated on the great imperial canal, it has ten thousand bridges. Since 1718, when the missionaries quitted it, no individual, until Mr. Hedde succeeded, could get ingress. He did so, disguised completely as a Chinese trader.

ECLIPSES IN 1849.—In the year 1849 there will be four eclipses—two of the sun and two of the moon. The first of the four eclipses will be of the sun, on the 22d of February, and will be visible in the Western portions of Asia and the North-western portions of North America. The second, of the moon, on the 5th of March, and will be visible throughout the United States. The third will be a total eclipse of the sun, on the 17th of August; and the fourth an eclipse of the moon, on the second of September, both visible in the United States.

NEW FENCE.—A new kind of fence is coming into use in Northern Illinois. The fence consists of strips of sheet iron, one and a half inches wide, prepared in oil, so as to resist the action of the weather, and painted white. The strips are nailed to posts in the ground, two rods apart, with a perpendicular strip of board every other rod. The whole cost per yard is estimated at less than thirty cents; and it is superior to wire, as it does not sag, and being painted white the cattle will see it and not run against it.

The appropriations made from year to year for the Coast Survey, since it was commenced in 1807, forty years ago, amount to $1,509,317.

A new motive power, allied to magnetism, has been discovered by Professor Faraday. At least, so says the London Athenæum.

AMONG the new songs announced in London, we find a beautiful Duet, (words by Carpenter, music by Glover,) founded on the incident in "Dombey & Son," where little Paul talks to his sister Florence of the emotions produced by the sounds of the sea.

PAUL.
What are the wild waves saying,
Sister, the whole day long,
That even amid our playing,
I hear but their low long song;
Not by the seaside only—
There it sounds wild and free,
But at night, when 'tis dark and lonely,
In dreams it is still with me!

To which Florence replies:

Brother, I hear no singing;
'Tis but the rolling wave
Ever its lone course winging
Over some ocean cave.
'Tis but the noise of water,
Darling, against the shore,
And the wind from some bleaker quarter
Mingling with its roar.

Florence and Paul:

No! it is something greater,
That speaks to the heart alone,
The voice of the great Creator
Speaks in that mighty tone.

ZACHARY TAYLOR.—This name is doubtless of greater antiquity than most people imagine. In the list of immigrants from Gravesend, who embarked for Virginia, January 6, 1635, on board the "Thomas and John," Richard Lambard, master, occurs the name of "Zachary Taylor, aged 21."

The first hair seal ever taken on our Jersey coast, was captured last week on the shore off Cape Island, by Elisha Hughes. It was full grown. Seals have been frequently seen along our coast, but it is said one was never before taken within the memory of the oldest inhabitant.—[Newark Daily, Dec. 27.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER—By a resolution of Athen's Lodge No. 165, I have been directed to send you the following notice for publication:

WHAT IS TIME?

BY MONTGOMERY.

I ASKED an aged man, a man of cares,
Wrinkled, and curved, and white with hoary hairs.
"Time is the warp of life," he said, "O tell
The young, the fair, the gay, to weave it well!"

I asked the ancient, venerable dead,
Sages who wrote, warriors who bled;
From the cold grave a hollow murmur flowed—
"Time sowed the seeds we reap in this abode!"

I asked a dying sinner, ere the stroke
Of ruthless death life's golden bowl had broke—
I asked him, what is time?—"Time!" he replied,
"I've lost it!—ah, the treasure!" and he died!

I asked the golden sun and silver spheres,
Those bright chronometers of days and years;
They answered, "Time is but a meteor's glare,"
And bade me for eternity prepare.

I asked the seasons in their annual round,
Which beautify or desolate the ground;
And they replied, (no oracle more wise,)
"Tis folly's blank, and wisdom's highest prize."

I asked a spirit lost; but, O the shriek
That pierced my soul—I shudder while I speak!
It cried, "A particle, a speck, a mite
Of endless years, duration infinite!"

Of things inanimate, my dial I
Consulted, and it made me this reply—
"Time is the season fair for living well;
The path to glory, or the path to hell."

I asked the Bible; and methinks it said—
"Time is the present hour; the past is fled;
Live! live to-day! to-morrow never yet
On any human being rose or set!"

I asked old father Time himself, at last,
But in a moment he flew swiftly past;
His chariot was a cloud, the viewless wind
His noiseless steed, which left no trace behind.

I asked the mighty Angel, who shall stand
One foot on sea, and one on solid land; [o'er,
"By Heaven's great King I swear, the mystery's
Time was," he cried, "but Time shall be no more."

THE SINFULNESS OF SIN.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY MRS. S. MOWBRAY.

Thing most unseemly, most forlorn, most sad,
Depth ever deepening darkness darkening still Unawed by wrath; by mercy unreclaimed
Oh who shall tell
They unrepentant and ruinous thoughts? POLLOCK.
"The wages of sin is death."—Rom. vi chap. 23 v.

THE most delightful announcements of scripture in reference to our divine Lord, are those, which tell us that he shall 'save his people from their sins'—that he is the lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world, and that 'whosoever nameth his name, must depart from iniquity.'

Now, herein consists the peculiar character, which distinguishes the Christian faith, from all others on earth's surface. It makes no league with iniquity, nor allows any apology for it, and this circumstance of itself would be sufficient to determine it of divine origin. Every other theory which the ingenuity or depravity of men has invented, only offers palliations for this dreadful moral malady; embalming it, as it were, like the physicians of Egypt, when they used to paint their dead, in order if it were possible, to hide from the beholder the horrors and deformity of death. So philosophy, unenlightened by revelation, tries to reconcile the ugliness of moral evil with even its own low ideas of truth and beauty, by casting around it a fictitious loveliness, drawn from subtle sophisms of a false wit and degenerate reason. But this garment of filthy rags, in reality, only attempts to conceal the monster sin. Its hideous proportions, notwithstanding, are ever and anon appearing through the tissue drapery of such a vain envelop. It is the religion of Jesus alone, which is able, 'to deliver us from the body of this death.' Now it is certain that all men and all nations experience this abominable thing which God hates to be a serious inconvenience, notwithstanding its alluring blandishments and their own conceptions, for even the blindest of them can discern the dagger of destruction lurking in the sorcerer's belt, and to flee its certain vengeance they are sometimes willing to throw themselves into the Ganges or beneath the wheels of Juggernaut's Chariot, or under the dreaded austerities of a long, dreary Ramadan.]

Indeed, the very nature of sin is wholly incompatible with anything like peace. For when once the heart feels itself an insurgent to the King eternal, this precious dove departs, never, never to return, but through the intercessions of the great Mediator between God and man. And surely the bosom of the sinner when thus left is fitly emblazoned by the troubled sea, which cannot rest; since its boiling billows may best portray the utter unquiet of a sin tortured spirit. It matters not, that the enchantress often throws around her desert regions a mirage of flowers and fountains and song and dreams. It is all deceitful—a frost work, or, at best, a fairyland. Nay, it is much worse than all this. For its vines are vines of Sodom, and its clusters are clusters of Gomorrah, possessing a real, an imaginary malignancy, their poison, moreover, is the poison of asps, always sure to communicate death. Alas! that every soul of man should so have eaten of those bitten fruits, as to have become insensible to their mortal effects, dead in trespasses, yet knowing it; not the moral bane does its ruinous work most subtly, paralyzing every emotion that in anything resembles virtue, until at last the man becomes a fiend—a vile leper, standing afar off, from Heaven and holiness, without hope and without God in the world. Can any condition be more deplorable than this! Alas, what a world of tribulation, of wrath and anguish, are treasured up in such a destiny. No wonder that the scripture saith that the rejoicing of the wicked is short, or, rather they have no joy, it is madness all, the mere mirth of fools, on the glare of the lightning amid the tempest's darkness. Oh! who would not shun such a fate, now that it is possible, now that God hath found a ransom, so that even these dead men may live again. Oh! how very delightful was that assurance of our Saviour! 'I am come' says he, 'that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly. Then why will not the sinner arise from the dust of spiritual death and leave the serpent's meat and come and eat of the tree of life and live forever.'

To be happy, and to be so always, is the constant desire of all created intelligence, but moral beings are only so in proportion as they are holy. Nay, the very felicity of God himself, is supreme alone, because of his infinite moral excellence. Now one would think that under the conviction of this truth, men would at once forsake sin, with its wages of death and hasten into the lists of holiness, lured as it were, by the unspeakable peace and those prospects of everlasting life which the gospel unfolds; but such, alas! is not the case, for what the poet says of the world, may here be very justly said of sin:

Strange fondness of the human heart—
Enamored of its harm!
Strange world, that costs us so much smart,
Yet still, hath power to charm!

Men still 'go on, wondering at the best—amused, as it were, by theameleon hues and strange phantoms of painted peace and wild pleasure, which follow in its train, and though they see what desolation sin hath wrought, in churches and in states—in families and in fanes, polluting every shrine that Heaven had sanctified—now desolating a heart, and now a hearth; yet they continue to press madly forward, with the multitude to do evil, and in the spirit of their self immolation, are ready to fall in hecatombs beneath the car of this horrible idol. Yet they have Moses and the Prophets, but they will not hear them though continually calling: 'Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die, saith the Lord.'

NEW YORK, JANUARY, 1849.

That which makes man so discontented with his own condition, is the false and exaggerated estimate he is apt to form of the happiness of others.

CHLOROFORM STEAM ENGINE.

THE "Combined Vapor Engine," as it is called, on the principles of M. du Tremblay, a French Inventor, is now attracting the attention of London mechanics and savans at the yard of Messrs. Horne, engineers of Whitechapel, who have one of 10 or 12 horse power, in full work. We condense the following description from the London Sun:

"The engine was originally brought out in Paris, in 1846; subsequently the French government had one constructed, and appointed commissioners to experiment as to its value. This commission made a report in July last, in which they stated that the power of the steam engine was more than doubled by the addition of M. du Tremblay's apparatus, without any additional fuel being required. The invention, it appears, is applied 'either to a single engine with two cylinders and pistons, or, as is usual for maritime purposes, two distinct engines with a cylinder and piston each.' To the engine exhibited, a small pipe is attached from a boiler, by which one of the pistons is acted upon by steam, as in the ordinary steam engine. Upon the escape of steam from the first cylinder in which it so acts upon the piston, it is received in an air-tight case, termed a vaporizer, in which there are a number of small copper tubes filled with chloroform.

Upon the steam coming in contact with the tubes the chloroform becomes vaporized, and works the other cylinder, while the steam is condensed and returns into the boiler, as warm water, to regenerate fresh steam, or motive power. In the mean time, the chloroform, after exerting its force on the second cylinder, is, in its turn, condensed, and, by means of a force pump, returned to the vaporizer, which is thus kept regularly supplied, the chloroform being alternately vaporized and condensed. In addition to the advantage of giving greater power to engines than by the ordinary steam process, the vapor being nearly as 1-2 to 1 more powerful than steam, it is stated that a saving of nearly 50 per cent is effected in fuel. M. du Tremblay originally used ether as his vaporizing agent, but, at the suggestion of M. Arago, the eminent French astronomer, he has substituted chloroform, which, although it did not vaporize at quite so low a temperature as ether, has the advantage of being perfectly incombustible and inexplodable, thus removing an objection which was made to the invention as originally brought out, of the inflammable nature of the liquid used. One of M. du Tremblay's engines, of 35 horse power, has been constantly at work for 14 hours a day at a glass manufactory in Lyons for more than 12 months, during which time the liquid used has been ether, without any accident or disarrangement of the machinery having occurred. The invention has been patented."

ATTACHMENT RECIPROCAL

The following capital story is told of an Alabama sheriff and a pretty widow :

Court was in session, and amid the multiplicity of business which crowded upon him at term time, he stopped at the door of a widow, on the sunny side of thirty, who, by the way, had often bestowed melting glances upon the sheriff aforesaid. He was admitted, and soon the widow appeared. The confusion and delight which the arrival of the visitor had occasioned, set off to greater advantage than usual, the captivating charms of the widow M. Her cheeks bore the beautiful blended tints of the apple blossom; her lips resembled rosebuds, upon which the morning dew yet lingered; her eyes were like the quivers of Cupid, the glances of love and tenderness with which they were filled resembling arrows that only wanted a fine beau (pardon the pun) to do full execution. After a few common place remarks,

"Madam," said the matter-of-fact sheriff, "I have an attachment for you."

A deeper blush than usual mantled the cheeks of the fair widow. With downcast eyes, whose glances were centered upon her beautiful feet, half concealed by the flowing drapery, gently patting the floor, she, with social candor, replied :

"Sir, the attachment is reciprocal."

For some time the sheriff maintained an astonished silence; at last he said—

"Madam, will you proceed to court?"

"Proceed to court?" replied the lady, with a merry laugh; then shaking her beautiful head, she added: "No, sir! though this is leap year, I will not take advantage of the license therein granted to my sex, and therefore greatly prefer that you should 'proceed to court.'"

"But, madam, the justice is waiting."

"Let him wait; I am not disposed to hurry matters in such an unbecoming manner; and besides, sir, when the ceremony is performed, I wish you to understand that I prefer a minister to a justice of the peace."

"Madam," said he, rising from his chair with solemn dignity, "there is a great mistake here. My language has been misunderstood. The attachment of which I speak was issued from the office of Esquire C——; and commands me to bring you instantly before him, to answer a contempt of court in disobeying a subpoena in the case of Smith vs. Jones."

THE TIMES WERE NEVER SO BAD.—For two years the badness of the times has been the cry of the world in general, and the excuse for dunning tradesmen in particular. Every body to whom one owes money has had "a little bill to make up," ever since 1846; and the "tightness" has been the pretext for one half the world to bother the other half about those "small trifles" which have been "standing since Christmas."

It is a popular notion with the tardy debtor, that the tradesman who cannot wait has no right to continue his business; and that to ask for his "small account" is to confess a deficiency of the requisite capital to carry on his dealings in a respectable, or at all events, in a creditable manner. Without going so far as this, we may confess that we hate grumbling, and are glad, therefore, to hear a change in the tone of the national voice, and an acknowledgment that things are beginning to look a great deal brighter than they have done. For ourselves we have little care, though we like cheerfulness in our neighbors, and therefore we have been indifferent as to "railway panics," "monetary panics," "pecuniary tightnesses," "financial crises," and all the other ills that commerce is heir to. We have always felt that if the worst comes to the worst, we could send Toby on to the stage and let him take that station among the dramatic dogs of the day to which his histrionic genius would entitle him.

We are convinced that in such pieces as The Dog of Montargis, The Butcher's Dog of Ghent, and The Jolly Dog of the Abruzzi, he would make a hit, or, to speak more appropriately, bite his name in our histrionic annals. He would far surpass in sagacity that popular but injudicious mongrel who, while performing at the Victoria, lingered too long over the sausage that formed the bell-pull. Our own dog Toby would never disgrace himself by such an unprofessional neglect of the business of the scene; and therefore, as we said before, the stage was always open to him if the worst had come to the worst. Happily, the worst is coming rapidly to better, and even railway shareholders are beginning to wear a smile. We seldom predict until after a thing has occurred; but we venture, on this occasion, to anticipate for the country a merry Christmas and a happy New Year.—[Punch.

LAW FOR DINNER PARTIES.—And be it enacted, that dinner parties generally shall consist of two sects of persons:—1st. Those who know one another; and 2nd. Those who wish to know one another; whereby awful pauses may be chiefly avoided at table; and that seven o'clock shall in future signify that hour, and not a quarter to eight; and that guests bidden at that hour shall assemble within a few minutes of the same, under the penalty of having to carve the most popular side dish; and that certain nicknacks, and illustrated works, be put about on the drawing-room tables, not in the notion that they will really amuse any body, but that they may form, as it were, harbors of refuge for the gapers, yawners, and uninitiated, who will then appear occupied, and not stand in painful and silent expectancy, or ask if there is any thing fresh in the evening papers, or scrutinise the lustres, and find that they have not the full complement of candles, or peruse the card bowl, and dig up undesirable ones from the bottom thereof.—[The Social Parliament, by Albert Smith.

STARVING A JURY INTO A VERDICT.—We grant it to be an absurd and monstrous custom—a mere senseless relic of barbarism—to keep a jury free from intemperance. Spelman tells us that the Council of Nice ordained that "judices nisi jejuni leges et judicia de carnant;" that Charlemagne ordained, let "judices jejuni causas audiant et discernant;" "and from these ancient rites of the Church and Empire," he says, "is our law derived, which prohibiteth our jurors, being judices de facto, to have meat, drink, fire, or candle light, till they be agreed of their verdict." There can surely be no reason for continuing this absurd usage at the present day; it ought, certainly, to be in the power of the Judge, as well to order the jury refreshment, after they have retired to consider their verdict, as he does all through the trial, in cases where they are not allowed to separate. Beyond a doubt, he ought to have a discretion in the matter so as to guard against the indulgence being abused as he has now a discretion as to the time which he may keep the jury before they are discharged. But this practice of keeping the jury without food is wholly distinct from that of requiring them to be unanimous in their verdict: the one may be altered and we may yet retain all the security for a careful investigation, for a just judgment, and for an administration of justice at once merciful and efficient, which is provided for us by the other.—[Dublin University Magazine.

AN INDEX TO THE MARKET.—In the neighborhood of Alfreton there resides a miller, who is so obliging to his customers, that when corn is fluctuating in its price, (and especially when on the advance,) he will take the trouble to go immediately and acquaint them how the London markets were going the day before. In the spring of last year, when the price of corn was advancing rapidly, this miller would set out from home very early on a Tuesday morning to give information to his shop customers. The inquiry at that time was, "Has Mr. — gone past this morning?" "Yes." "How did he go?" "He was in his gig, and, he drove very fast." "That's a bad sign." "He had only time to call at Mr. —'s gate, and say, 'Wheat rose yesterday from 8s. to 10s. per quarter; you must raise flour 6d. per stone.'" On another week, "Has Mr. — passed by?" "He has ridden on his horse, but he did not ride fast." "That's not a good sign." "He called on Mr. —, and I have been to inquire the price of flour. Wheat advanced only 4s. yesterday, and flour is raised 2d. per stone." On another week, "Has Mr. gone by this morning?" "No; he is coming yonder on foot." "That's a good sign." "He has stopped to talk with Mrs. —. We will go and ask her how corn is this week. Mrs. has been asking me if we want a sack of flour, for it is 2d. a stone lower. We thought it a good sign when we saw him on foot, and felt sure of it when he had time to stop and talk to a person on the road." This same obliging miller commenced his journey again a few weeks since, but owing to a change in the weather the corn began to slacken in its advances, and now he has again slackened in the alacrity of information; and this, the people say again, is a good sign.—[Sheffield Times.

BENJ. C. MILLER, Secretary. JOE L. LORD, Agent. JAMES STEWART, M.D., Medical Examiner, (Residence, Abington Square,) is at the office daily, from 2 to 3 o'clock. 1m236

GRAND MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE, NO. 127 CHAMBER-STREET NEW-YORK.

FOR the Treatment of all Diseases in Men, Women and Children; whether Acute or Chronic; whether Local or General—whether Aerofulous, Syphilitic, or Epidemic—or all Maladies belonging to the line of Medicine and Surgery.

I. Cases of all kinds will be examined every day in the week from 7 o'clock A. M. till 7 P. M. Sundays excepted.

II. No CHARGE made for EXAMINATIONS, or for our OPINION in any case.

III. Patients will find our examinations unlike those of any others which they have ever known or heard, and if we do not tell them more about their case, without their telling us any history of their disease, than they have ever known or learned before by their own observation, or that of any of their Doctors, we advise them not to submit to our treatment.

IV. All that Class of Diseases in which delicate and sensitive persons are exposed, by most Doctors, to Surgical and bloody operations, and to means and treatment which burn and torture, and confine the patient to the sick bed, are treated at this office without pain, exposure or confinement.

V. Patients will be convinced beyond all doubt, by our Examinations and Treatment, that their diseases in most, and the worst cases, originated in their childhood, or were inherited from their parents, or arose from a great variety of causes, which neither they nor their doctors ever imagined—and though they may seem to have a dozen different diseases, that in nearly every case they all spring from one root or cause, and will be driven out together by very simple means.

VI. Those Diseases of certain parts of the human system, which are almost universally treated in the first state with Balsam of Copaiba, Capsules, Cubes, by Injections of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead Water—Yellow or Black washes; with Blue or Mercurial and other Ointments; with Bougies, Catheters or Syringes—or in the second state, with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate for Corrosive Sublimate; with Hydriodate of Potash, Sarsaparilla, Syrup, and other like slops—we say before heaven and earth, that by such treatment and such means, as are generally used, we know and can demonstrate, that these diseases have never been and can never be healed. They deceive the patient—they drive the disease into the system, and to other and more important parts—they produce Strictures, Callouses, Piles, Abscesses, Ulcers, Fistulas, Catarrhs, Dropsies, Rheumatic pains, Diseases of the Bones, of the Liver, Kidneys, Lungs, Throat and whole system; and either render the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of these Quackish, Ruinous and Swindling remedies, we promise to every curable case we treat, a permanent and radical CURE FOR LIFE by very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell—neither purges or vomits—nor hinders from business—nor exposes the patient in any way whatever, and which is only to be taken every other night. We can furnish patients with References to Terrible Cases which have been carried out of the Broadway Hospitals as incurable, to die, whom we have raised from the gates of the grave, after all other means have been used in vain.

VII. Knowing, as we do, that most Medicines in the hands of Apothecaries and Druggists are adulterated, and for various other reasons are not to be relied on; we have, therefore established a CHEMICAL LABORATORY, where we manufacture all our Medicines—for this reason we can warrant that our medicines shall do all that we promise in every case.

VIII. In every case in which we promise a cure, if we fail to effect this, the money paid for medicine will be returned.

To all who wish we will furnish names and residence of patients in the city and country, whom we have treated for all forms of disease, who will give them all the facts in their case—the nature, extent, and duration of their sickness, and the success of our treatment.

We therefore invite all sufferers however afflicted, or however hopeless their case may appear, to give us a trial—put our knowledge to the test in an Examination of their case—it will cost them nothing—and they will find beyond doubt that ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which are called Consumption, Spinal disease, Cancer in the Womb, or elsewhere, &c., &c., are totally mistaken—there being nothing of the kind. This we have demonstrated in hundreds of cases.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

MY MOTHER'S LAST KISS.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY A. WIGT.

THE setting sun, with mild and chaste'n'd splendor,
Through a veiled window a soft radiance shed,
Tinting with hues, most exquisitely tender,
The couch where was lying my dear mother's head.
The leaflets quivering in the evening breeze,
Made to my ear a low and saddened tune,
Birds faintly warbled from the glowing trees,
And all seem'd hush'd by the same mystic gloom,
Shadowing my heart with dark foreboding's wings,
That sweepeth sadly life's æolian strings.

'Twas in my childhood's home, the hand of death
Hung poised to give the final, fatal blow;
Murm'ring from trembling lips, scarce 'bove a breath,
And noiseless footsteps gliding to and fro;
Tears from dim eyes abundantly were flowing,
Shaping strange fancies to my childish heart—
Much wond'ring what dark evil round us growing,
Causing tears from my stern father's eyes to start;
One whom I had ne'er known to weep before—
Some danger undefin'd my childish fancy bore.

Amid bewildering thoughts I stood confused,
Half-doubting to receive my good-night kiss;
(To which I ever fondly had been used.)
When she entwined me in her arms of bliss!
And oh! that frantic kiss yet sadly lingers,
And steals along my fevered forehead now,
The thrilling touch of her pale icy fingers,
As parted she the locks upon my brow,
While on her cheek a tear did coldly glow—
A drop congealed upon a couch of snow.

With tearful eyes, perplexed with fear and dread,
To my accustomed couch I softly crept,
And trembling drew its drapery o'er my head,
And, as all children will, then soundly slept
Until the radiance of the morning sun
Was brightly flooding half my little room;
When dark returning thoughts came, one by one,
Revealing in sadness the night's fearful gloom.
I listened, and silence reigned upon all around,
Save the clock's dull ticking, monotonous sound.

Then quickly I flew where my heart was in keeping,
And stealthily glanc'd through the half-open door;
My mother in death so sweetly was sleeping,
One scarcely would deem'd life's struggle was o'er:
Yet I knew it was so, by the strange mystic splendor
That encircled her face with a seraph's pure glow,
And the glances that met me, so sadden'd and tender,
From friends who were weeping in anguish and wo.
I stood with heart throbbings, tho' wond'ring the while
Why death should be feared, so sweet was his smile.

And still that blest smile to me ever is speaking,
In my hours of bereavement it hath ne'er ceas'd to shine,
Like a rainbow of promise its fond vigils keeping,
With a glory that glows with a radiance divine:
Tho' wayward my pathway, for deeply I've sinn'd,
And many the snares that were spread for my feet,
But the star of my life hath been only bedimm'd,
To glow with fresh lustre, more holy and sweet.
God grant me the prayer, that the light which is given
May never grow less, but lead me to Heaven.

French Novelette.

A LION IN LOVE.*

BY FREDERIC SOULIE.

CHAPTER VII.

THE arrival at the rail road was less pleasant than Sternny had anticipated. When the friends, (especially the female portion of them,) of the Laloiné family saw the handsome Leonce enter the passenger's hall, in company with the shopkeepers, they whispered to each other:
'How is this?—Are they going to bring that fine gentleman along?—The Laloinés must be crazy!—He is not invited, we don't know him.'

Sternny saw at a glance the discontent he gave rise to, and Lise perceived it too. She was sad in consequence, for it reminded her of the distance that separated her from Leonce. At that moment, she could have asked his pardon for having brought upon him this ungracious reception. But Sternny was not a man to allow himself to be either irritated or abashed by such an event. He saluted the gentleman with whom he had had the sugar argument, as if he were delighted to see him again; and without any ill-humor, without any affectation, he told him that he was going to St. Germain, to see a country-seat. The moment it became known that he did not belong to the pleasure party, no attention was paid to him; but that was not Sternny's object, he wanted to be of the pleasure party and, he had made up his mind that the sugar merchant should invite him, somehow or other.

With this view, he managed, by artfully circumventing the object of his attack, to broach with the utmost care a question of the highest order in political economy. The hour of departure arrived; Sternny left the depot, still keeping up the discussion with Mr. Guraufiot, (that was the sugarman's name,) and got it, along with him into one of the cars, without the latter having the least idea that the marquis was actuated by another motive than the wish to profit by his sapient observations.

Meanwhile, the flow of Mr. Guraufiot's eloquence was inexhaustible; and as the journey is a short one, Sternny, who wanted to change the subject of conversation, began to grow impatient; and all at once pulling out his watch, he exclaimed:

'There! I shall miss my appointment!'

'Hey?' cried the other, who was thus unceremoniously cut short.

'I beg your pardon,' said Sternny; 'but I had made an appointment with an architect to go and examine the building with me, and I don't suppose he has waited for me.'

Sternny took advantage like an expert story teller, of the personages he had created for the benefit of Mr. Laloiné.

Then it must be a very considerable purchase that you are about to make?

'I can't say,' said Sternny; 'the information we derive from the public prints is very vague in such cases. A country-seat for sale, generally means something that is worth from ten to a hundred thousand francs; so that I am proceeding somewhat at a venture.'

'Excuse me,' said Mr. Guraufiot, 'but I am well acquainted with St. Germain; whereabouts lies the house you wish to see?'

'Judge for yourself,' said Sternny, showing him the paper.

'Why it is an elegant place; I know it well; it fronts upon the forest; it is very extensive, and I am told the interior of it is very splendid.'

'Ah, so much the better.'

'Then you don't know anything about it?'

'I never was in it. What I wish particularly to know is, whether the house is substantially built; and I confess my utter inability to judge of such matters.'

'That is not so difficult a matter as you might imagine.'

'Perhaps not, for a man like you, sir, who seem to have a practical knowledge of every subject; but for me!'

'I believe, that if I had anything to do with the matter, I would not allow myself to be imposed upon,' observed Mr. Guraufiot, with a self-complacent air.

'You are a lucky man; but when one is so unfortunate as to be utterly ignorant of such subjects, and to be deprived of the advice of professional men, the risk is enormous; although upon the whole, I have no very implicit confidence in the good faith of architects in general.'

'I believe you, sir.'

'And I should greatly prefer the advice of a disinterested connoisseur, like yourself, for instance.'

'Oh, sir!'

"Then were you deceived. He lives, alone, lives near you, yet is unknown to you, and thus he has been for years."

"Oh, heavens! this is most strange. But tell me, tell me more. If this be true, there still is more to learn."

"Yes, girl, there is more. Your mother, who was she? She was not mine by sisterhood. Let me say all at once—I am your father. You are the offspring of unhallowed love." The old man thus with an effort revealed everything and fell back exhausted by his exertions to keep composed. Alora, astounded by the words and of her newly discovered father, knew not what to do. She finally summoned the servants to attend and minister to him, and after seeing him revive once more, she retired to her secret chamber overwhelmed with surprise and grief.

Thus terminated the announcement, and this was the eve before her marriage.

CHAPTER II.

SOME months have passed since the marriage of Alora to the young Count —.

He was summoned to the wars by the breaking forth of hostilities between the Turks, who were then the redoubtable enemies of the Christian nations, and his own countrymen. The Knights of Malta, who were continually engaged in attempts to destroy the commerce, and weaken the might of the first named people, acted with the Venetians in this struggle. The decisive naval action at Lepanto was fought, and, with the news of this victory, there came to the city of the sea a bulletin of the citizens wounded and killed in the engagement. Among the former was the husband of Alora. He had been cut through the arm, as he informed her by letter at the same time, while boarding one of the Turkish vessels; he gave her every reason to believe that he could soon recover the use of the disabled limb, and moreover added the intelligence that he would shortly return, with a number of his comrades, to his native city.

His expressions of attachment were powerful and eloquent. Alora was fully convinced of the sincerity of them. However, his kind and encouraging words could not banish the sickness she felt at heart. Every day since her father had revealed the unpleasant story of her birth, she had been growing more despondent. Love himself, in the person of the youthful Count, had not effectually succeeded in banishing melancholy from her mind.

She trembled lest some time her secret should escape from her lips, in hours of sleep, and thus reach the ears of her husband.

She dreaded this; for she had good reason, as it seemed to her, to expect that, in case of his learning of the blot upon her birth, he would reject her love and companionship for ever.

This thought was the torture of her life. She suspected there were others, besides her father and herself, acquainted with the relationship existing between them, and if so, might they not, from some motive or other, make a revelation of it to the Count? These were good grounds for uneasiness to one as sensitive as she, and some days after receiving the letter of her husband, she withdrew herself from the eyes of her servants and taking the necessary articles, penned the following lines to her husband:

"When you read this, I shall be at rest. It will show you what influences me in my sad determination to leave you."

"We have been a year wedded. Until a day before our marriage, I had expected for each of us a long life and a happy one. How ill fortune deals with us. On the eve of our nuptials, a story was told me, the knowledge of which has been as a canker at my heart. I am weak—I am sensitive—perhaps too much so, and yet a woman should be both, to make her dependent on her lord, and affectionate towards him. If nothing had come to distract me, how happily could we have lived together! But I, whom you took to your bosom confidingly, have kept a secret from you which deeply affects us both,—on which would depend all the joys or griefs of my after life, should I confess it to you and consent to live. You know not when you wooed me so long—when you besought me so tenderly to become yours at the altar, that I was the offspring of an unlawful love. You would as willingly have taken a viper to your bosom as me, had you known this. I believed so and therefore lived in continual dread lest my story would some time be known by you, and I be cast forth, with a malison.

"This accounts for my unhappy life since our union. Now you know why my tears so often flowed; why I was so often detected weeping in silence and solitude. Often have I arisen from the couch where you slept in sweet quietude, untroubled by a care, untroubled by a thought, and sought some secret recess where I might deplore my wretched fate. Would, I have cried, would I had never been born? Happiness and wretchedness are so sadly mingled in my cup. I have resolved sometimes to destroy myself, and, in the frenzy of the moment, rushed to the terrace at our window, whence I might precipitate myself into the waves below, when your voice (you seemed always to be aroused at these critical moments,) summoned me back from destruction. I have sometimes meditated forsaking your roof, when the darkness of midnight shrouded the city; and all this from a very love of you.

"You cannot doubt my affection for you. A few more hours of breath, and the offspring of our mutual love would be before my eyes; and yet what vile blood—what tainted blood would tingle in the blue veins of the innocent! It is the fruit of an accursed tree: the sins of its race would be visited upon it. Should this be so? Would I had never looked upon the page which tells me of so deadly a retribution. Better that I should be alone accursed, than to transmit a curse unto my children! Better that it should perish in its innocence than come into a world where nought awaits it, save misery! Enough.

"Before to-morrow's sun has warmed the happy earth, this body of mine will perchance be floating out upon the deep sea, a thousand leagues from land. I shall perish—he shall perish who is my sire—the unborn child shall perish with us.

One of us will surely ascend unto the saints. The others will need the influence of thy prayers, and of all good christians' prayers, to raise them from perdition. If you can forgive me, do so. Let the name of her, who was thy wife—and of him who was her father be mingled in thy supplications. This alone I ask, and leave with you—all which I can leave—the blessing of my heart. Farewell."

This letter she left in her chamber, sealed, and addressed to her husband. * * * *

A beautiful night illuminated the Italian skies. Moon, stars, and sea were like silver in brightness; the trees declined their green boughs as though in slumber, and all was silent save the voices of the nightingales, and the occasional dash of the waters on the pebbly shore.

This evening, as was her wont, Alora was walking in the company of her father, the Padre, along the margin of the sea. They were remote from the palace, and still continued to proceed, increasing their distance from it. Opposite them was a small island which went by the name of the Isola d'Oro. They could see the ruins of a castle and gardens on it, as they looked towards it from the main shore. When they came in sight of it, the old man related its history, and that of its owner. It was a tragic story of love, and hate, jealousy and murder; of events such as too often have occurred in that land,

"Where the cypress and myrtle
Are emblems of deeds that are done in their clime,
Where the rage of the vulture, the love of the turtle,
Now swell into sorrow, now madden to crime."

"Think you not that was a fearful tale, Alora?" asked the old man, when he had concluded.

"Ay! and yet, perhaps, not so unusual. I have heard many which were as dark as that. I had a dream last night which was more fearful. Would you hear it?"

"I care not, child, for I have often heard of the wildest dreams, and have had some myself," answered the Padre.

"Then follow me. This is the very spot which I saw in my dream, and this even the very hour it seemed to be when I was here in my sleep. Let me assist you to ascend these cliffs; for yonder rock that leans over the sea is the place where we should sit and talk of this."

Saying these words she took her sire by the hand, and so they ascended the small ridge of rock, which extended into the water. They reached in company the position she had designated from below, and the old man sunk down upon the flat surface of the stone to rest, while she began relating her dream.

"I dreamed we two sat here together. It was late as now. The sea was quiet: the earth about us was at rest. All, save I, was at peace; and I had led you hither, I know not why. You told me strange stories of bloodshed, which made my hair stand on end and my flesh creep, despite my exertions to be calm. That of the Isola d'Oro was one of them."

"This is strange, girl; but we often have wondrous dreams," said the old man.

"Ay, but this was not all. It seemed to me that while you were telling this tale, you described particulars so minutely, that I turned to you in amazement. 'What' cried I, 'how could you know so much?' You trembled; you fell at my feet, and avowed yourself the chief actor in the drama, and that the person murdered was my mother."

The priest during all this time had been sitting quietly near her, gazing steadfastly at the ground. Raising his head suddenly he inquired with apparent calmness:

"And what think you of the dream? Do you put faith in it?"

"I should be loth to say so. Yet since there is so much truth in part of it, can all the rest be false? Your history is strange; your actions and words, your love of those fearful stories is also strange. Tell me or not is my dream true? There is more to be said, which shall not be until you answer. Fear me not, and answer; the hour is nigh."

The priest rose from his seat; he paced hurriedly backward and forward upon the rock. Anon he stopped before her and gazed wildly into her face, and then strided furiously as before. Suddenly he halted, fronting her.

"What!" cried he, "must I be accused of murder by my own child? Will my offspring turn against me in my old age, and drag me to punishment? No, child, I need not fear you. Though you are the fruit of rash love, still you are my child, and I am your father. I am the guilty wretch that you suspect me. Now you have all the secrets of my life. I am at your mercy."

"Not at my mercy, father. The good God alone can decide your destiny. He alone will be your judge. But further of my dream.—Come hither with me to the edge of this rock. Look down; here is the deep water. Look above us; there are the bright stars beyond them; we can see nothing. The world to be is as impenetrable by our present vision. We are alone; none see us; none hear us. Would to God that I had never lived to see this hour. Had not some strange destiny prevented the deed I should ere this have been among the dead. Fate has decreed this hour to be my last; in my dream it seemed to be the last. I dreamed that after you had confessed all things to me, I led you to this precipice: I embraced you for the last time, called upon God to be merciful, and—"

Her last words were lost, for as she spoke, she suddenly grasped the old man in her arms, and leaped from the cliff into the waters beneath.

There was a sudden splash of the waters as the victim, struggling in the embrace of his child, sunk with her into the deep. The bubbles rose above them, and the waters foamed and dashed at the foot of the precipice. Now they grew quiet: the bubbles and foam subsided into the waves which rolled in regularly to the shore, and the priest and his daughter were seen no more.

The moon and the stars looked down from the sky making luminous the night. Silence reigned over the drowsy land, and the hours hastened towards morning. A dream had been told; the crimes of a life acknowledged, and two more spirits were added to the unnumbered hosts whose home, men tell us, is beyond the stars.

Origin of Shakspeare's Plays.

SHAKSPEARE SHORN OF HIS PLUMES.

[FROM HART'S HISTORY OF YACHTING.]

The following is a curious article, but our reverence for the Old Bard will not allow us to believe all of it.

THE TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA.—The writer of this play is indebted for many of its incidents to two works, the Arcadia of Sidney, and the Diana of Montemayor: the latter work translated into English during the latter part of the 16th century. By some commentator this drama is held not to be Shakspeare's. The commentator adds, "we should by no means contend that he wrote the whole, or even the greater part of his drama. During the earlier years of his professional career he rather improved the inventions of others than invented himself. It was easier for him to remodel old pieces than to write new ones. Hence the reproach of Greene that he was beautified by the feathers of others."

THE COMEDY OF ERRORS.—Whoever wrote this play was indebted to the Menæchmi of Plautus, which was translated into English some years before Shakspeare left Stratford. Yet whether Shakspeare (if he is the author) was immediately indebted to it, or to a Comedy founded upon it, entitled the "History of Error," and performed before Queen Elizabeth in 1576, is doubtful. It is supposed he did no more than slightly retouch the old comedy; and some commentators reject the play as being Shakspeare's altogether. "He retouched it," says one, "probably at the request of the manager!" This commentator has hit the fact exactly, not only in regard to this play but to all the others attributed to him, except perhaps one, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," which is probably Shakspeare's from its obscene "internal evidence." In a note at the bottom of the page where some of the above facts are stated, the following words appear:

"Six old plays, on which Shakspeare founded his Measure for Measure, Comedy of Errors, Taming the Shrew, King John, King Henry IV., King Henry V., King Lear."

LOVE'S LABOR LOST.—We read of an old play of Holofernes, acted before the Princess Elizabeth as early as 1556; and on this the comedy before us was based. In fact there was no one drama prior to 1600, perhaps not one after that year, that was not derived from some other play! "During the earlier years of his dramatic career he did little more than alter a piece that had become obsolete."

MERCHANT OF VENICE.—This play was derived partly from the Pecorone of Giovanni Fiorentino; partly from the Gesta Romanorum, an old English ballad, and Marlowe's Jew of Malta. In Gosson's School of Abuse, published as early as 1579, there is a distinct allusion to a play containing the characteristic incidents in this MERCHANT OF VENICE.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.—The fable of this play is not now considered Shakspeare's. Mr. Tyrwhitt supposes one part of it to be taken from the Pluto and Proserpina of Chaucer: but Greene's James the Fourth is doubtless the foundation of the play; and both Chaucer and Greene are supposed to have had some common current legend of the day from which they derived their materials.

THE TAMING OF THE SHREW.—This play is founded entirely on an old comedy of the same name, inserted in the old published book of the "Six Old Plays," which existed before the day of Shakspeare.

ROMEO AND JULIET.—The story of this play was first related by a novelist of Vicenza, as early as 1535. It also formed the subject of a novel of Bandello, printed in 1554. Bristeau, a French novelist, soon gave it a French form; and Brooke, in 1552, translated it into English verse. Painter, also, in the Palace of Pleasure, took his story of Romeo and Julietta from the French, and not from the Italian novel. The writer of "Shakspeare's" Romeo and Juliet followed Brooke, but availed him of some things from Painter. With all this knowledge before one commentator, who is determined to hear nothing against the "genius" of "the bard," he says—"The genius of Shakspeare cannot suffer from the fact that he borrowed the foundation of all his plots. What others left unfinished, he perfected: he turned the dross of others into fine gold." I am forced to the opinion that he, or the one who wrote the articles in question, took the gold itself, "mor suo," without resort to the process of transmutation by the crucible of his "genius."

AS YOU LIKE IT.—This play has no greater originality than the preceding. It is taken from a novel of Thomas Lodge, entitled Rosalinde. The "crow in borrowed feathers," spoken of by Greene, refers to this piracy as well as to others. "Shakspeare," said Malone, "has followed Lodge's novel more exactly than is his general custom." "Whole sentences, besides the plot, are taken from it."

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.—The original is from Ariosto; but Shakspeare knew nothing of Italian, and it is therefore to be presumed that this play is written by some other hand. A novel of Belleforest, translated from Bandello, contains the same story of the play, and in default of a reference to these, the Genevra of Tuberville could well furnish the material. The story is an old one; and dramatising a novel, using the materials freely, was as common a thing then as now. But who at this day thinks of claiming credit or laying claim to "genius" for such paltry "literary fishery?"

HAMLET.—With the exception of the grave-digger's scene, inserted to catch the groundings, which may possibly be the production of the "genius of Shakspeare," this play owes its paternity elsewhere. The foundation of Hamlet is notoriously to be found in Saxo Grammaticus, which Shakspeare could not read, notwithstanding Mr. Pope supposes he must have been a great scholar. If he wrote Hamlet, Pope was probably near the truth; and it is upon the supposition that he wrote all the plays attributed to him, that Pope says he must have been conversant with the classics, familiar with Plautus, Dares Phrygius, and Plutarch, and he might have added Plato. What confiding men biographers and historians are, when they have a favorite theme to carry out! In addition to a printed story called The Historie of Hamlet then extant, there was a play called Hamlet, (acted as early as 1589;) and another play of Hamlet was also acted at a rival theatre in London, in the year 1594, at which old Henslowe was treasurer. His entry is thus:—"Received at Hamlet VIII s." A poor night's receipts that! Shakspeare probably got this play afterwards, and inserted the grave-digger's scene to render it popular with the playgoers. That was his vocation. At any rate the soliloquy of "To be, or not to be," is a literal translation from Plato, and judging from that, and the deep philosophy of the whole piece, (always excepting the Shaksperian blot upon it,) it must have been the creation of an educated man, which Shakspeare was not. It is probably a partnership concern. The only man of that day, of poetical power sufficient to write the higher parts of this tragedy, was Ben Jonson, the greatest Dramatic Poet England ever produced. Langhorne, in his preface to Plutarch, referring to the time of Shakspeare, says—"The celebrated soliloquy, 'To be, or not to be,' is taken almost verbatim from that philosopher, (Plato;) yet we have never found that Plato was translated in those times."

THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.—If any play of the whole catalogue is Shakspeare's, this comes nearest the mark. The impress of his vulgar and impure mind is upon every page. Tradition asserts that it was at the express command of Queen Elizabeth, who "wished to see Falstaff in love." It is probably, like all the other traditions relating to the "genius" of Shakspeare, without foundation, except in the brain of his admiring commentators. But he has no originality even in this revolting piece of trash. The author was indebted to a translation of Pecorino, and to Tarleton's News out of Purgatory, for his plot and incidents; and his Sir John Falstaff is the Sir John Oldcastle of Drayton, Wilson, Munday and Hathaway.

TROILUS AND CRESSIDA.—Whoever wrote this play took the plot and materials from the Italian, and from Chaucer, and from Lydgate's Roke of Yroye. The authorship is settled by an entry in Henslowe's Diary on the 7th of April, 1599, in these words:—"Lent unto Thomas Downton, to lend unto Mr. Dickens and hary cheateil, in earneste of their boocke called Troyeles and Creasedays, the some of iij li."

MEASURE FOR MEASURE.—Founded on and taken from Whetstone's play of Promos and Cassandra, one of the "Six Old Plays," already referred to.

OTHELLO.—Was derived entirely from the Italian of one of Cinthio's novels; but as Shakspeare knew nothing of Italian, even the translation could not be his, independent of the structure of the play. A French translation appeared in 1584; but of the French Shakspeare was as ignorant as of the Italian.

KING LEAR.—The story of Lear is drawn from Geoffrey of Monmouth; but the play is one of the "Six Old Play" to which something was contributed by way of amendment, perhaps, from the Arcadia, and the Mirror of Magistrates. Henslowe had the play at his theatre, as is evident from an entry in his book: "8th of April, 1594, received at King leare XXVI s." It is therefore not Shakspeare's—for he had no interest in the rival play house, and Henslowe must have owned the play as his "property."

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.—May be found in Boccaccio. In Painter's Palace of Pleasure the story is called Giletta of Narbon. This play may have been among the "properties" of the theatre to which Shakspeare was attached, upon the suppression of that dramatic nuisance, by the Lord Mayor and citizens. The only wonder is that Betterton and Rowe, in getting up their "Shakspeare speculation," did not give us a second series of a like number of plays while they were about it, and called them new discoveries. Who does not remember the "Shakspeare forgeries," of Ireland, which deceived the very elect!

MACBETH.—The incidents of the story, founded on Scottish history, are all in Hector Boece; "but of Hector," observes one critic, "Shakspeare knew as much as he did of Hesiod." Could he read Hesiod, think you? The writer of the play probably consulted Hollinshed for a guide. Buchanan thought the subject a fit one for the stage, and some of the "wits" of the day took his hint and produced it. Part of this play is borrowed from Middleton's production entitled The Witch. So says Steevens, or rather he says the "bard of Avon" was not the originator.

TWELFTH NIGHT.—Derived remotely from the Italian of Bandello and more immediately from Belleforest: and partly from The Historie of Apolonius and Silla, a tale in the collection of Barnaby Riche.

JULIUS CESAR.—From Plutarch, inaccessible to Shakspeare's "genius." He could not read it in the original, nor in the French translation of it by Amiot. The Earl of Stirling had already written a tragedy of that title. The Julius Cesar attributed to Shakspeare is undoubtedly the following, as noticed by old Henslowe, the theatrical treasurer: "22d of May, 1602. Lent unto the Company to geve unto Antoney Monday and Mikell Draytion, Webster, Mydleton, and the Rest, in earneste of a Boocke called sesers Falle, the some of V li." It is possible that Shakspeare's managers purchased this play, and set it upon their stage.

HAPPY OLD FARMER.—Said a venerable old farmer of eighty years, to a relation on a visit to him: "I have lived on this farm for more than half a century. I have no desire to change my residence, I have no wish to be any richer than I now am. I have worshipped the God of my fathers with the same people for more than forty years. During that period I have scarcely ever been absent from the sanctuary on the Sabbath, and have never lost more than one communion season. I have never been confined to a bed of sickness for a single day. The blessings of God have been richly spread around me, and I have made up my mind long ago, that if I wished to be any happier, I must have more religion than I have at present."

THE WEDDED PAIR.

THAT festal night—that festal night—when first I saw you trace
With fairy feet the merry dance, so full of radiant grace—
In beauty's pride you shone so bright, so far above the rest,
Methought a lovelier being ne'er had mortal vision blest;
I gazed until my heart grew sick, I cannot tell you why,
Perhaps it was to think that one so pure should ever die;
But now you're mine, but now you're mine, and still as fair as bright
As when you ravish'd first my eyes upon that happy night.
I'll ne'er forget, I'll ne'er forget, that day you deign'd to hear
The ardent tale of love and hope I whisper'd in your ear,
With downcast eyes and glowing cheek my vows of truth you heard,
Then sigh'd in maiden bashfulness the dear enchanting word—
'Twas then I felt the power of love—a love as deep and rare
As if you'd bared my very heart, and stamp'd your image there.
And here you sit, and here you sit, a wife and mother now,
As fondly loved as when you first did listen to my vow.
I cannot tell, I cannot tell, what other days may bring,
But, oh! the past has been to me one bright, unclouded spring;
I know the happiest lot on earth some painful changes find,
And that the cares which chequer life will fret the purest mind;
I know, however beautiful and graceful thou art
now,
That age will blanch that rosy cheek, and mar that polish'd brow;
But, then, thy heart—thy faithful heart, is ever young and fair,
For Time, that stamps his seal on all, will leave no impression there.
Whate'er betide, whate'er betide, oh! be as now thou art,—
A crown of pride and joy to me, the solace of my heart;
Then, whether fortune smile or frown upon our humble cot,
I'll look on thee and deem me blest beyond the common lot;
And, oh! when earth and all its joys are fading from my view,
And none beside my dying couch to close my eyes
but you;
Then will the hope—the blessed hope, remain to cheer my heart,
That we shall meet in perfect love, and never, never part.

ANGELA.

"AN O'ER-TRUE TALE."

CHAPTER I.

"Upon entering Paris with the allied troops," observed my friend, "previous to the abdication and flight of Napoleon, I experienced that strange unpleasant feeling natural to one who is unacquainted with a single individual in the motley throng of nations, all bent upon beholding a mighty and fallen capital, but now the seat of an imperial power, which shook the world. 'Odd enough,' through I, 'if I cannot meet one old friend in this great war-Babel, resident here among my countrymen!' I called to mind that some time before the grand Russian Campaign, a young professional acquaintance had talked of completing his medical studies in the French hospitals. We had attended lectures together at Gottingen and Berlin; he was an excellent chemist as well as a deep student, and promised to distinguish himself in whatever branches he might choose to follow up. I, too, was fond of chemistry and botany, and had spent a considerable period since we separated in Switzerland and in Italy, chiefly to visit the universities and to indulge my early tastes. Being an only son, I had the power to do so, and leaving old 'fatherland' to take care of itself, had become by dint of travel as habituated to the customs of other countries as to those of my own. To sum up all, I had had the misfortune to lose both my parents ere I left it.

"What a spectacle opened to my eyes, surpassing all I had seen in the capital of a great military people, occupied by the troops of all those nations which they had single-handed so recently subdued. All was so astounding, that the first days were spent in a sort of whirl of strange sights too great almost for the imagination to embrace, much less cooler reasons to analyze. I hurried to catch a view of those glorious treasures of art—the spoils at once of an antique and modern world—before they should be dispersed at the word of military command, to enrich the thousand collections not so much of those from which they had been stolen as some imperial plunderers. After satiating my curiosity with the thousand and one wonders—no fictions but stern and dread realities—the course of future crimes and convulsions, I tried to calm down by recurring to my old pursuits and pleasures. I explored the university, the hospitals, and the anatomical theatre, for here, if anywhere, I was sure to hear of my old fellow-student. On my introduction to the professor, his name was the first upon my lips. If here at all, I felt convinced that he must be well known; even among the most brilliant his name was not a light to be placed under the eclipse of a bushel.

"'Oh,' was the reply, 'he is one of our first lecturers in Paris. As a student, he carried off all the prizes, and he is now running away, as a teacher, with all our students. His discoveries are of the most valuable kind, especially in anatomy, yet with all his knowledge and reputation, he is the most unassuming, quiet, and retired member we have.'

"After expressing my warm satisfaction, I obtained the address of my old fellow-student, marvelling whether the manner of my reception would be in the least modified by the distinguished name he had already won.

"Not one of my military companions were more to me than casual acquaintance generally are; I turned from them with a boy's longing, now the war was over, to my school and college days, to my earliest friend and fellow-student, from whose example I had acquired tastes to enable me to bear prosperity without extravagance and without enmity, and I hastened to congratulate and shake him by the hand. Few moments surpass this healthy young feeling of our boyhood's unalloyed delight.

"In one of the more calm and retired localities if such can be predicated of such a city—I found my friend's residence, and was shown by a servant into an upper floor. A door was opened; I had entered, and was announced at once; he was seated at a writing-desk—with his back towards me, and in a tone of indifference he inquired without looking up, 'What was my business?'

"'Harry!' I cried, in our old school days; manner, a word at which he sprang from his chair, exclaiming 'Fred!' in the same well known voice, 'is it you indeed?'

"And we hugged each other like two long separated lovers. But for this, I should never have recognised him again. He was strangely altered,—not a trace of the playful boy, the eager high-spirited youth, the zealous animated student the bold aspirant to honors was to be seen. Not only was he pale and thoughtful—that was natural enough; he looked attenuated, feeble, and haggard. Time, with its sharpest tooth, seemed to have entered deep into those too clearly defined, pointedly marked, and almost aged features. The eyes sunk deep in their sockets, yet fearfully lustrous, ever and anon obscured with a dark unearthly expression; his fine erect form sadly bent and angular, and all the young fresh ardor of a bold keen spirit, once eloquent in every look and gesture, subdued to the quality of a cold, measured, and even painful effort of living power. Not that he was dull, inanimate, or nervous; he seemed like one unequally laboring under a heavy burden; and after the first emotions of surprise and pleasure at our meeting were over, that sharp, fixed, earnest expression so painful to behold, resumed its unresisted sway.

"So absorbing was this feeling while we conversed, that I had failed to observe the appearance of the room in which we sat. It was wholly that of a professional man, yet far more simply furnished than you generally see. From what I had heard, I expected to see him surrounded by the elegancies, if not by the luxuries of life; instead of which, there was an evident scantiness, and negligence, and want of neatness and order that grated on good taste. But what was still more at variance with it, I perceived at the furthest end of the room from the point where a side screen projected, a marked difference in this respect—all was studiously nice, prettily arranged, and ornamented; and at the extreme end, that appeared to open by folding doors, was a silk curtain, richly wrought and valanced, which hung from the cornice to the floor.

"My friend, who had yet said little, observing my inquiring and perplexed looks, at length rose, and began to turn the conversation to the subject of his scientific pursuits. He pointed out to me one or two works which he had written, and we then stood almost close to the beautifully veiled recess on which my eyes were still somewhat curiously bent. He observed me with a look of anguish I shall never forget—I, feeling as if I had given offense, looked another way—then again to the spot, and suddenly started as I beheld standing before me—the curtain having been suddenly drawn aside—the form of a very beautiful and exquisitely shaped woman, gazing at me with rosy cheek and smiles, yet with an expression of delicacy, and a sweetness in the look of the eyes, mouth, and every feature, that seemed to say: 'Are you my Harry's friend, won't you come nearer and speak to me?' But I could not; something riveted me where I stood—I only bowed and gazed—then, finding she did not speak, said, 'Perhaps she is displeased at the sudden sight of a stranger:—will you introduce me, or shall we retire?'

"It was then my name was pronounced in a low trembling voice that went to my heart; I felt my hand grasped almost convulsively, as with the greatest affection he pressed the full delicate arm of the lovely lady, who there, in the attitude of the Medician Venus, held it gracefully stretched forth. Then, touching her hand with his lips, he murmured, 'My own Angela!' yet in a tone which penetrated to the inmost bosom.

"'Is something wrong—what does she want?' I timidly inquired.

"'The soul—the soul!' he exclaimed, passionately, at the same time striking his breast; 'yet here she lives and loves as she looks, in fadeless beauty. Yes! and I have snatched the fair casket that held my treasure from the common lot—love has cheated death of half his prize; she is mine—mine for ever.' And he tenderly embraced what to my utter astonishment I found to be but an exquisitely finished picture of the life.*

"So exquisite and truthfully devised, she seemed to live and breathe—almost as if secretly and lovingly to return his sad embrace. No one incident of a long, chequered, and adventurous life ever so completely shocked and bewildered me; the sudden impression of it is indescribable. It was a relief to feel my eyes filled with tears as I gazed silently upon my newly-found friend, who now, in his waking dream or ecstasy—for I can call it nothing else—seemed sometime as if unconscious of my presence.

"Involuntarily I at length exclaimed, 'My poor Harry! what is it all?—Alas! I fear—'

"My voice seemed to break the spell; he unclasped his arms, rose from his knees, and turning to me perfectly composed, with a mourn-

* That this scientific mode of attempting to perpetuate the recollection of some beloved object was not unknown in other times as well as in our own, many curious instances have been recorded. Among the latter, it may be sufficient to allude to the wish expressed in the will of the late celebrated writer—Jeremy Bentham, and the compliance with it on the part of his executor—Dr. Pye Smith, at whose residence, we believe, the exterior likeness of the great political sage is still to be seen in the deeply contemplative attitude and the expression which recall him most vividly to mind.

ful smile he said, 'I am not, perhaps, so poor as you imagine. She is mine—my own—and is she not there—always with me. To me she yet lives—to me she lives;—my art triumphed—preserved her for me; but for that, this precious form had been a heap of dust and ashes. Now she is here with me; and no fear her beautiful ideal youth and beauty suffer decay. If I could not withhold the spirit from its natural home, this figure still recalls the precious treasure it contained. She was my tutelary angel on earth, and the lovely semblance ever reminds me of her divine original from whom she sprang, endowing me with faith, and courage, and resignation, to merit a re-union, revealed to me with a power I no more question than I do my own existence. Still I could not endure the idea of her mortal beauty becoming the spoil of our common lot. And so she is mine in life and in death, and she will continue fair and lovely as in life, when I shall have mingled with the dust.'

"He soon recovered his usual serenity of manner, and begged me to come nearer, for I still preserved the same attitude of wonder and surprise. Her fine dark auburn tresses fell in natural ringlets—that perfect illusion that had deceived me—over her snow-white neck and brow. The blooming cheeks, and the full red-ripe lips so well mimicked life, it seemed almost impossible that they should not yield to the touch. Every feature appeared to breathe so mild and charming an air, the whole countenance so full of grace and harmony, that you could not believe the soul was wanting to give them language, expression, and breath. There was something far more attractive than mere beauty—a chastened charm of heavenly-mindedness,—a devotional tendency and compassion, mingled with dignity, which I felt to be peculiarly impressive. The dress in its perfect simplicity and grace, corresponded exactly with the feeling produced, as if none but herself could have arrayed her with so much taste; and I could not help remarking it to my friend.

"'I could not dress her otherwise,' was his reply. 'Such was the bewitching power of her whole appearance, I could not forget a single particle of it. What she loved,—what she wished,—was so deeply impressed on me, that the plastic hand had merely to obey her spirit's impulse. It is never lost—for I have dressed her anew more than once, and I am never less satisfied with myself.'

CHAPTER II.

"'WHERE did you meet with her, and how?' I now inquired, for he seemed to invite conversation on this one strange absorbing idea.

"'Come, sit down, and I will tell you,' he began, after pressing his lips to that cold hand with an air of respectful tenderness, and he seated himself beside me, his eyes still resting upon the figure. 'You are aware that when I first set out to complete my studies here I hardly knew a single person. Reputation was my idol; to worship that aright I sometimes preserved the most persevering self denial and retirement. Visiting the hospitals, and the sick, taking medical notes, and making observations occupied me almost entirely. The last terrific war had filled the sick-wards to overflowing; new forms of fever and epidemics sprung up, and defied our greatest efforts to eradicate them. Sisters of Charity, however numerous, were unequal to the task required; many died, and the nurses were too few, and equally decimated. It was then that in the very face of death, as you will ever find it, one of woman's noblest attributes, her devotion to the wants and suffering of man, stepped forth to save and secure. The high-born, and wealthy, and the happy, many of them voluntarily left their homes of peace, and wealth, and elegance, to succor disease and famine in the grim abodes of human wretchedness; and foremost among the good and generous,—in one of the most suffering localities, I met with her who bore the name,—who fulfilled the mission and won the crown, I trust, of an angel. Her time, her fortune, her active aid, and her religious consolations, were alike lavishly bestowed; and notwithstanding the warnings of others and of myself, she confronted death in his most horrible forms, and yet walked free and scatheless on her way, as if she bore a charm even for evil and contagion, and the powers of darkness flew before her. In the hospital where I attended, one of the worst, she was looked upon as its heaven-sent power to save, and such she was, for in a very short time, while numbers continued to die in others, in ours very few were left sick within the walls. 'It is not for me to fear,' she would often say, 'all is the will of God, when one of his suffering creatures remainst to be succored.' In our respective duties, indeed, however voluntarily assumed, we two seemed to imitate each other in our efforts, in fearlessly exposing ourselves to all risks; my admiration rose into reverence, into the loftiest, noblest, species of love man can feel; and I have reason to believe that such a love, sprung from such a source, would not have gone, and will not yet go unrewarded.

"'Though not a word of it was spoken, our souls had met and understood each other's feelings. It was impossible not to love her: no words between us could have produced half the passionate devotion of that silent and terrible bond which united thought with thought and soul with soul—which no power, even of death, could break, as we met and sealed the sacred compact for ever, over the couches of the dead and of the dying.

"'Strange that when all fears and danger seem to have disappeared, and a glorious hope, an ineffable future, seemed just opening, lending fresh enchantment from the distance, I was seized with the fearful fever we had both till then so successfully combatted and routed. Its dark fire at once invaded the seat of reason and I was in a wild delirium. Had it only left me one glimpse—one suspicion of the truth—that she for whom I would have periled a hundred lives, was at my side, ever watchful, and praying for the least symptoms of hope, that glimpse would have sufficed to show my impending calamity—to have driven her far, far away from the fated wretch. Day and night, night and day, as I lived and died not to be told, was she there imbibing the pestiferous poison of my scorched brain and blood; if strong and fearless before, she was now doubly so, and no arguments of others could convince her that she was sacrificing herself uselessly for me; that it was her duty, even for my sake, should I possibly recover, to live.

"'Shall I abandon to the care of strangers,' she replied, 'him to whose generous example I owe so much, who has rescued so many suffering fellow-creatures from a premature tomb? Yes; and who may live to rescue so many more? What is the value of a life like mine, compared to his?'

"'I continued during many weeks in the same hopeless state. At length returning reason dawned, and I beheld the angel of my life—but so pale, so unearthly beautiful—tears of joy for my restoration glistening in those soft blue eyes.

"'What a beaming smile lighted up her features as our looks met, and I exclaimed:

"'You here, Angela... Ah, why, why...'

"'Be calm,' she gently said, 'you must not speak... I promised the physician, and now the crisis is over you must not refuse from my hand these cordial drops.'

"'She drew a small vial from her bosom, poured the contents into a cup. I could only thank her with my eyes; I had fainted, perhaps sunk, but for that reviving draught at that very moment; the last I was doomed to receive at her hands.

"'Her answer to that one look of grateful love shall I ever forget?'

"'Could I have breathed into it, dear Harry, the last remaining breath of life to do you good, it should have been yours.'

"'Like the cordial through my veins, those words inspired fresh life into my soul. Not once, but many times, had she already thus snatched me from death, rested my fainting head upon that gentle bosom, bathed my burning temples, and moistened my parched and blackened lips.

"'Tell me, Angela,' I murmured, 'how long I have been thus—what is it? Ah, speak. God in Heaven!' I cried, 'I see... I know it all. Oh fly, fly!'

"'Never! be calm, dear one; there is, there can be no danger... to those I mean who have faith as we have had. I have not quitted you night or day; it would be as cruel, as it were vain and idle now.'

"'That I felt to be true, and I groaned in the anguish of my spirit, for I feared the worst.

"'Fear not for me,' she said. 'I feel quite well now. Only be composed, and then all will be well.'

"'The delusion was too delicious not to win belief; the physician came and sanctioned it—for precautions were vain now, and I still feel intense gratitude to Heaven for those ineffably happy hours we experienced during my recovery, and which drew our hearts, if possible, yet closer.

"'Yes, Angela had recalled me from the chambers of the grave to new life, and what a life of promised honor, and usefulness; and fortune, too, from both sides, had showered her favors lavishly upon us. Each morning I awoke from the delicious golden slumbers, such as are enjoyed only by the daily fast-improving fever patient freed from 'the perilous stuff' that choked life's springs, we discussed together some fresh project for the improvement of our institutions, the rescue of the poor, the reform of the people, so little relished or thought of, yet the most wanted of all reforms, and how those blissful hours that seemed like moments, flew uncounted by.

"'I had often read and smiled at the description by our old medical authorities of the power of love, its strange transforming genius and its soft intoxicating effects. But I was no longer a skeptic, and the most grateful thoughts; 'thoughts that did often lie too deep for tears'—convinced me of the truth and reality of such a power. For the day of our union was already fixed.

"'It was then, in the very bloom and fragrance of our young joys, after so marked a contrast of perils and anxieties, and I felt myself stronger and better than I had ever been, that I noticed a change scarcely perceptible to others in the being whom I so intensely appreciated and loved. Though not sudden, it was to me alarming; and what rendered my feelings the more agonizing was, that I had just congratulated myself that all my fears of contagion were at an end—as this new insidious foe made his appearance. The heightened color, the short cough, the fever animated eye, and those exhausted spirits were not to be mistaken. She sought to conceal her rising fears and increasing sufferings from me, and that her illness was in the remotest degree connected with her attendance upon me. So completely had my hopes and her own sweet assurances possessed me, that by the time I really took the alarm there was little hope of preserving so rich a treasure to humanity, or securing the happiness and blessing of my grateful life. Every thing that art, climate, and treatment could effect; of exhausted prayer, as well as skill and care; were tried, but all in vain. Her beautiful spirit vanished noiselessly as a phantom from my eyes; from her fellow suffering spirit yet on earth; and this is the sole silent companion, the lost, the loved form of her who devoted her life to mine.'

"'With a feeling of reverence seldom experienced, I knelt before the altar where so pure and noble a love had been sacrificed, yet superior to its earthly doom, had sprung like the Phoenix from its ashes, and found its consolation in perpetuating the visible image—as an ever-present memory of the soul of love, and truth, and beauty, which had once animated it.

"'You do well, my dear friend,' I exclaimed, as I rose from that silent prayer, to mourn not as those who have no comfort; you were loved as few were ever loved, and doubt not that she still loves you; that so perfect a being, capable of such a sacrifice, must ever preserve that love inextinguishable—be ever watchful and near you, hold communion with you, to strengthen, to elevate, and finally to restore. And what a triumph of your noble science; what tribute to excellence; what more costly monument to the most worthy and heavenly-minded, as she was, can compete with this? It is, indeed, a work of love, as worthy of you as, I doubt not, like herself.'

"'Yes,' he replied, after a long heart-touching pause; 'yes, that is the God-given faith which she confirmed and left me—a dower far richer than the fortune she bequeathed me—though intended to be, I know without that charge, for the benefit of the sick and the poor. Her wishes, like her last words—engraven on my heart—shall be strictly fulfilled. For that duty only I live; to finish the noble and heavenly career she had chalked out for herself and for me on earth. Forgive me then, my Angela, the life-enduring woe I cannot but feel, even in discharging such a Christian office for thee, till I shall deserve to be re-united to thee; and say that it has been faithfully performed. Thou, blessed one, wilt smile upon my sad labors, as thou didst look down upon me on my sick bed, with such ineffable tenderness when thy matchless love first restored me to reason and to life!

"And what, dear friend, were those last words you mentioned as so ineffably impressed?"

"She conjured me to live for her sake, and for the sake of those innumerable poor and helpless whom she had left—without a friend. She bade me to be all she could have wished me to be with her, and then to follow her."

Addressed to every eligible 'Marrying Maiden' in general, but to Miss Emilie Hope in particular.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

"A MAIDEN'S Dilemma" came under my eye, As about to bid care and Manhattan 'good bye,' For, palmer-like, I had determined to strut All the way to the Bay of Francisco, on foot.

And there I sat, chewing a wasted cigar, At my window, intent on the course of a star, A stray one it seemed, in the firmament thrown, As I in this city of Gotham, alone.

And I watched it, astrologer-like, for a guide, When slowly another appeared at its side, And I cried out in extacy, excellent omen! That star is myself, and this new one A WOMAN!

Then a waiter came in with the "Union Gazette"—I opened the "Ladies' Department," and met "A Maiden's Dilemma"—"I want to elope"—Etcetera, etcetera, and—"Emilie Hope."

Mrs. MADISON.—The maiden name of this eminent lady was Payne. Her parents were natives of Virginia, though she was born in North Carolina, while they were visiting some friends there. Her parents soon after their marriage, having joined the society of Quakers, she was educated in the tenets of that sect—but the simplicity of their habits or the absence of elegant accomplishments, did not render less inviting the many attractions which it was her happy fortune to possess. At an early age she was married to Mr. Tod, a young lawyer of Philadelphia, but she was soon left a youthful widow with an infant son. Her many personal charms and her engaging manners caused her to be surrounded by numerous admirers; among them was Mr. Madison, then a conspicuous member of Congress. His suit was favorably received, and in the year 1794, she became his wife. Entirely devoted to each other, they passed a long life of domestic felicity. The marriage left her nothing to wish for, and her generous heart and benevolent disposition sought only to distribute as extensively as possible the blessings she enjoyed. When Mr. Jefferson became President of the United States, Mr. Madison, as Secretary of State, removed with his family to Washington, where, during the absence of Mr. Jefferson's daughters, she presided at the Presidents's house, and her talents, manners, and disposition, were spells to awaken the unfeigned admiration of all who were fortunate enough to become acquainted with her. In all the elevated stations she has been called upon to fill, she has been distinguished by the same affability of manner, and gentleness, and generosity of disposition. She is still alive, esteemed and honored by the whole nation, as on account of the distinguished man who was her husband.

SHE WOULDN'T BE A QUEEN.—In 1798, Sergeant Bernadotte, being then at Grenoble, fell in love with a pretty girl, and made her an offer of marriage; but a watchmaker was also a candidate for her hand, and she thought him the better bargain than the soldier. She is still alive—a decrepid, crooked, wrinkled old woman—a servant in a common inn, and in a state of utter poverty.

"Ah, sir," said she, in lately concluding her story, "I should have done much better in marrying M. Bernadotte. I should have been a queen now—yes, a queen, instead of waiting upon everybody here. I should have had a crown and subjects, and fine clothes. I should have been a queen. Ah, I made a great mistake—a sad mistake. I ought to have foreseen this, for I assure you, sir, M. Bernadotte was not a common man. I had a kind of presentiment that something would happen; but what would you have? When we are young we do not reflect; we are not ambitious; we refuse kingdoms and make fools of ourselves."

Saying that she shed tears. When asked if she had heard anything from M. Bernadotte, she answered:

"Never, sir; I have written to him several times since he became king, but he has never returned any answer. My husband says it is because I did not pay the postage on my letters. It is very likely; and then, perhaps he may feel annoyed at my having refused him. If we were both free again, and I had money, I would go to Sweden. Perhaps he would marry me, at any rate give me his linen to wash. That would be something after all."

From a diadem to a tub. Could love himself have imagined anything more romantic?

ADVICE FOR YOUNG MEN.—CHOICE OF A PROFESSION.—Some young persons entertain ridiculous notions as to the choice of a profession. Carried away by the glitter of uniforms and the splendid pageantry of a soldier's life, nothing will please them short of entering the army; or, perhaps, carried away by the narration of maritime adventures, they resolve on following the hazardous profession of the sailor. But a very little experience of the realities of life generally banishes these idle dreams. Others pitch upon the clerical profession as most suitable to their ideas of living an easy and dignified existence, and enjoying the reverence of those around them, without reckoning on whether their parents or guardians are able in the first place to procure them the necessary course of education, or if they would subsequently have the good fortune to find a benefice. Many more equally delude themselves with regard to what are called professions. As a matter of course, they must be something better, though only in appearance, than their father; and so they frequently turn their attention to occupations which to them look remarkably genteel, but which all the world besides know to be superficial and unprofitable. The young in the middle and lower ranks of society should by all means be governed in these matters by their seniors, for they are certainly the best judges with respect to what particular department of industry they should attach themselves.

Sketches of Character.

THE INFAMOUS JUDGE JEFFREYS.

THE person selected was Sir George Jeffreys, Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench. The depravity of this man has passed into a proverb. Both the great English parties have attacked his memory with emulous virulence; for the whigs considered him as their most barbarous enemy, and Tories found it convenient to throw on him the blame of all the crimes which had sullied their triumphs. A diligent and candid inquiry will show that some frightful stories which have been told concerning him are false or exaggerated; yet the dispassionate historian will be able to make very little deduction from the vast mass of infamy with which the memory of the wicked judge has been loaded.

He was a man of quick and vigorous parts, and constitutionally prone to insolence and to angry passions. When just emerging from boyhood he had risen into practice at the Old Bailey Bar—a bar where advocates have always used a license of tongue unknown in Westminster Hall. Here, during many years, his chief business was to examine and cross examine the most hardened miscreants of a great capital. Daily conflicts with prostitutes and thieves called out his powers so effectually that he became the most consummate bully ever known in his profession. All tenderness for the feelings of others, all self-respect, all sense of the becoming were obliterated from his mind. He acquired a boundless command of the rhetoric in which the vulgar express hatred and contempt. The profusion of malediction and vituperative epithets which composed his vocabulary could hardly have been rivaled in the fish-market or the bear-garden. His countenance and voice must always have been unamiable; but these natural advantages—for such he seems to have thought them—he had improved to such a degree that there were few who in his paroxysms of rage, could see or hear him without emotion. Impudence and ferocity sat upon his brow. The glare of his eyes had a fascination for the unhappy victim on whom they were fixed; yet his eye and brow were said to be less terrible than the lines of his mouth.

His yell of fury, as was said by one who had often heard it, sounded like the thunder of the judgment-day. These qualifications he carried, while still a young man, from the bar to the bench. He early became a common sergeant, and then recorder of London. As judge of the city sessions he exhibited the same propensities which afterwards in a higher post, gained for him an unenviable immortality. Already might be remarked of him, the most odious vice incident to human nature—a delight in misery merely as misery. There was a fiendish exultation in the way he pronounced sentence on felons. The weeping and imploring seemed to titillate him voluptuously; and he loved to scare them into fits by dilating with luxurious amplification on all the details of what they were to suffer. Thus when he had an opportunity of ordering an unlucky adventurer to be whipped at the cart's tail, "Hangman," he would exclaim, "I charge you to pay particular attention to this lady; scourge her soundly, man. Scourge her till the blood runs down. It is Christmas; a cold time for madam to strip in. See that you warm her shoulders thoroughly!" He was hardly less facetious when he passed judgment on Ludwick Muggleton, the drunken tailor, who fancied himself a prophet. "Independent rogue," roared Jeffreys, "thou shalt have an easy, easy punishment!" One part of this easy punishment was the pillory in which the wretched fanatic was almost killed with brickbats.

By this time the nature of Jeffreys had been hardened to that temper which tyrants require in their worst implements. He had hitherto looked for professional advancement to the Corporation of London. He had, therefore, professed himself a Roundhead and always appeared to be in a higher state of exhilaration when he expiated to popish priests that they were to be cut down, and were to see their own bodies burned, than when he passed ordinary sentences of death.

But as soon as he had got all that they could give, he made haste to sell his forehead of brass and his tongue of venom to the court.

Chipmunk, who was accustomed to act as broker in infamous contracts of more than one kind, lent him aid. He had conducted many amorous and political intrigues; but he assuredly never rendered a more scandalous service to his masters than when he introduced Jeffreys in Whitehall. The renegade soon found a patron in the obdurate and revengeful James, but was always regarded with scorn and disgust by Charles, whose faults, great as they were, had no affinity with insolence and cruelty. "That man," said the king, "has no learning, no sense, no manners, and more impudence than ten carted street-walkers." Work was to be done, however, which could be trusted to no man who revered law or was sensible of shame; and thus Jeffreys, at an age at which a barrister thinks himself fortunate if he is employed to lead an important cause, was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

His enemies could not deny that he possessed some of the qualities of a great judge. His legal knowledge, indeed, was merely such as he had picked up in practice of no very high kind; but he had one of those happily constituted intellects which, across the labyrinths of sophistry, through masses of immaterial facts, goes straight to the true point. Of his intellect, however, he seldom had the full use. Even in civil causes his malevolent and despotic temper perpetually disordered his judgment. To enter his court was to enter a den of a wild beast which none could tame, and which was as likely to be roused to rage by caresses as by attacks. He frequently poured forth on plaintiffs and defendants, barristers and attorneys, witnesses and jurymen, torrents of frantic abuse, intermixed with oaths and curses. His looks and tones inspired terror when he was merely a young advocate struggling into practice. Now that he was at the head of the most formidable tribunal in the realm, there were few indeed who did not tremble before him. Even when he was sober his violence was sufficiently frightful; but in general, his reason was overclouded, and his evil passions stimulated by the fumes of intoxication. His evenings were ordinarily given to revelry.

People who saw him only over his bottle would have supposed him to be a man gross indeed, sottish, and addicted to low company and low merriment, but social and good-humored. He was constantly surrounded on such occasions by buffoons, selected for the most part from among the vilest pettifoggers who practiced before him. These men bantered and abused each other for his entertainment. He joined in their ribald talk, sang catches with them, and when his head grew hot, hugged and kissed them in an ecstasy of fondness. But, though wine at first seemed to soften his heart, the effect a few hours later, was very different. He often came to the judgment seat having kept the Court waiting long, and yet having but slept off his debauch, his cheeks on fire, his eyes glaring like those of a maniac. When he was in this state, his boon companions of the preceding night, if they were wise, kept out of his way, for the recollection of the familiarity to which he had admitted them, inflamed his malignity, and he was sure to take every opportunity of overwhelming them with execration and invective. Not the least odious of his many odious peculiarities, was the pleasure which he took in publicly browbeating and mortifying those whom, in his fits of maudlin tenderness, he had encouraged to presume on his favor.

The services which the government had expected from him were performed not merely without flinching, but eagerly and triumphantly. His first exploit was the judicial murder of Algernon Sidney. What followed was in perfect harmony with this beginning. Respectable torments lamented the disgrace which the barbarity or indecency of so great a functionary brought upon the administration of justice; but the excesses which filled such men with horror, were titles to the esteem of James. Jeffreys, therefore, after the death of Charles, obtained a seat in the Cabinet and a peerage. This last honor was a signal mark of royal approbation; for, since the judicial system of the realm had been remodelled in the thirteenth century, no Chief Justice had been a Lord of Parliament.—[Macaulay.

LOVE.

From the Swedish of Bishop Tegner.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

LOVE is the root of creation; God's essence; worlds without number
Lie in his bosom like children; he made them for this purpose only,
Only to love and to be loved again, he breathed forth his spirit
Into the slumbering dust, and upright standing, it laid its Hand on its heart, and felt it was warm with a flame out of Heaven.
Quench, O quench not that flame! It is the breath of your being.
Love is life, but hatred is death. Not father, nor mother
Loved you, as God has loved you; for 'twas that you may be happy
Gave he his only son. When he bowed down his head in the death hour
Solemnized Love its triumph; the sacrifice then was completed.
Lo! then was rent on a sudden the veil of the temple, dividing
Earth and Heaven apart, and the dead from their sepulchres rising
Whispered with pallid lips, and low in the ears of each other
Th' answer, but dreamed of before, to creation's enigma,—Atonement!
Depths of Love are Atonement's depths, for Love is Atonement.
Therefore, child of mortality, love thou the merciful Father;
Wish what the Holy One wishes, and not from fear, but affection;
Fear is the virtue of slaves; but the heart that loveth is willing;
Perfect it was before God, and perfect is Love, and Love only.
Lovest thou God as thou oughtest, then lovest thou likewise thy brethren;
One is the sun in Heaven, and one, only one, is Love also,
Bears not each human figure the godlike stamp on his forehead?
Readest thou not in his face thine origin? Is he not sailing Lost like thyself on an ocean unknown, and is he not guided
By the same star that guides thee? Why should'st thou hate then thy brother?
Hateth he thee, forgive! For 'tis sweet to stammer one letter
Of the Eternal's language;—on earth it is called Forgiveness!
Knowest thou Him, who forgave, with the crown of thorns round his temples?
Earnestly prayed for his foes, for his murderers? Say, dost thou know Him?
Ah! thou confessest his name, so follow likewise his example,
Think of thy brother no ill, but throw a veil over his failings,
Guide the erring aright; for the good, the heavenly shepherd
Took the lost lamb in his arms, and bore it back to its mother.
This is the fruit of Love, and it is by its fruits that we know it.
Love is the creature's welfare, with God: but Love among mortals
Is but an endless sigh! He longs, and endures, and stands waiting,
Suffers and yet rejoices, and smiles with tears on his eyelids.

RELIGION THE TRUE END OF LIFE.—So certainly is religion the great end of life, that it may be truly affirmed of all who die without it, that however long they have lived, or whatever in other respects, they have attended to, they have lived in vain. However they may have spent their time, it is, as to its higher purpose, all lost. Whatever they have been engaged in they have done nothing; but have been ingeniously negligent. They may have gained much; much knowledge, wealth, reputation, comfort, pleasure; but they have been losing all the while, infinitely more than they have gained, for they have lost their soul. They have been busily employed in building up their earthly fortunes, but they have been no less busy in pulling down their immortal interests. They have gained a name and a place in the temple of fame, but they have lost infinitely more reputation with God than they have gained with men. They may have lived for the temporal good of all nations and all posterity, but they have neglected to live for their own eternal good; and therefore, in every view of the case, they have lived below the ends of their Creator in their existence; and if they had right views of their mistake at last, they would go down to the grave, though laden with years, and riches, and honors, uttering the melancholy confession, "Life with me has been a lost adventure."

'WHERE THE WEARY ARE AT REST.'

BY ELIZA COOK.

GRIEF is bitter o'er the dust,
When we hear the churchyard knell;
But echoes of an upward trust
Float around the tolling bell.
Selfish, even in our love,
Sorrow may become too deep;
And faith and patience often prove
The stroke is kind that bids us weep.
Think, while mourning, broken-hearted,
O'er the friends that cheer'd and bless'd,
We shall follow the departed,
"Where the weary are at rest."
It is well that we should sigh
When the dark death-shadows fall;
But there's an eternal sky
Behind the tear-cloud of the pall.
Though the hour of parting brings
Anguish that we groan to bear,
Hope, sweet bird of promise, sings
In the yew-tree of despair.
Let us hearken while her story
Whispers to the aching breast,
"Those ye mourn are crown'd with glory,
Where the weary are at rest."

GOLDSMITH'S PATIENT.—A poor woman understanding that Dr. Goldsmith had studied physic, and hearing of his great humanity, solicited him in a letter to send something for her husband, who had lost his appetite and was reduced to a most melancholy state. The good-natured poet waited on her immediately, and after some discourse with his patient, found him sinking in sickness and poverty. The doctor told them they should hear from him in an hour, when he would send them some pills which he believed would prove efficacious. He immediately went home and put ten guineas into a chip-box, with the following label: "These must be used as necessities require; be patient and of good heart." He sent his servant with this prescription to the comfortless mourner who found it contained a remedy, superior to anything Galen or his tribe could administer.

TRUE RICHES.—The hasteners to get wealthy by rushing after the golden phantom on the shores of the Pacific, would do well to ponder the following sober language of Mr. Henry Coleman in the last number of his excellent work on European Agriculture: "The true wealth of a community, is its labor, its productive labor. A man is not the richer for houses, which he cannot occupy; lands, which he cannot use; money which he cannot spend. He might own a continent in the moon, but what would that avail him? He might die of starvation in the vaults of the Bank of England, or in the undisturbed possession of the riches of the mines of Peru. Labor is the great source and instrument of subsistence and wealth."

EXCELLENCIES OF KNOWLEDGE.—There are in knowledge these two excellencies; first, that it offers to every man, the most selfish and the most exalted, his peculiar inducement to good. It says to the former, "Serve mankind, and you serve yourself;" to the latter, "In choosing the best means to secure your own happiness, you will have the sublime inducement of promoting the happiness of mankind." The second excellence of knowledge is, that even the selfish man, when he has once begun to love virtue from little motives, loses the motive as he increases the love, and at last worships the Deity, where before he only coveted gold upon its altar.—[Bulwer.

Choice Miscellany.

CALIFORNIAN'S FAREWELL.

THE following song was sung by L. S. Collins, one of the Camargo Company destined for California, on board the brig Thomas Walters for Tampico, as she left the wharf at Philadelphia on the 31st Jan.

SHALL home and kindred be forgot,
And never brought to mind?
Shall memory cling to no dear spot,
Nor loved ones left behind?
Though all our treasures held most dear
For gold we now resign;
Come, comrades, give a hearty cheer
For days of Auld Lang Syne.

The richest veins of gold we trace
In Sacramento's mine,
Shall never from our hearts efface
The treasures left behind;
And though o'er Ocean's stormy breast
Right joyfully we sail,
We'll not forget /his ark of rest
When distant climes we hail.

Remember us, as o'er the sea
In search of wealth we go,
And pray for us, when round our bark
The fearful storm-winds blow;
Then, when the dangers all are o'er,
To which Love terror lends,
We'll, kneeling, kiss the golden shore,
And drink your health, dear friends.

AN HONEST FELLOW.—'Did you ever try falling in love?' asked Beauchamp, with a quiet smile, as he glanced his eye over the fine form and handsome features of his companion; it is an excellent pastime, I am told. 'No,' answered Ned Hayward, quickly and straightforwardly: 'I never did, and never shall. I am too poor, Mr. Beauchamp, to marry in my own class of society, and maintain my wife in the state which that class implies. I am too honest to make love without intending to marry; too wise, I trust, to fall in love where nothing could be the result, but unhappiness to myself, if not to another also. He spoke those few sentences very seriously; but then, resuming at once his gay, rattling manner, he went on: 'Oh, I have drilled myself capitally, I assure you. At twenty, I was like a raw recruit, bungling at every step; I found myself saying all manner of sweet things to every pretty face I met; I felt my heart beating whenever, under the pretty face, I thought I discovered something that would last longer. But I saw so much of love in a cottage and its results, that, after calculating well what a woman brought up in good society would have to sacrifice who married a man with 600*l.* a year, I voted it unfair to ask her, and made up my mind to my conduct. As soon as ever I find that I wish to dance with any dear girl twice in a night, and fall into reveries when I think of her, and feel a sort of warm blood at my fingers' ends when my hand touches, I am off like a trigger; for if a man is bound to act with honor to other men, who can make him if he does not willingly, he is ten times more strongly bound to do so toward women, who can neither defend nor avenge themselves.'

With a sudden impulse, Beauchamp held out his hand to him, and shook it heartily; and that grasp seemed to say, 'I know you now to the heart. We are friends.'

Ned Hayward was a little surprised at this enthusiastic burst of Mr. Beauchamp; for he had set him down for what is generally called a very gentlemanlike person,—which means, in the common parlance of the world, a man who has either used up everything like warm feeling, or has never possessed it, and who, not being troubled with any emotions, suffers polite manners and conventional habits to rule him in and out. With his usual rapid way of jumping at conclusions—which he often found to be very convenient, though, to say the truth, he sometimes jumped over the right ones—he said to himself at once, 'Well, this is really a good fellow, I do believe, and a man of some heart and soul.'—[Beauchamp, or the Error.

SINGULAR FATALITY.—While perusing a work lately published, by Madame Charlotte de Sor. says the Courrier des Etats Unis, under the title of "Le Duc de Bassano, souvenirs intimes du temps de l'Empire," we were forcibly struck by the following lines,—which besides their historical curiosity offer at the present time a sort of prophetic appropos: "This same month of December, which has played such a great part in the life of Napoleon, has just inaugurated the fortune of his nephew. What presage is to be read in this strange coincidence! The month of December occupies an immense place in the heroic phases of the Empire; and bright or dark it has been closely connected with the life of Napoleon. On the 19th of December, 1793, he captures Toulon; first glimpse of his bright star! December 26th, 1799, he is nominated first Consul. December 24th, 1800, he miraculously escapes death. On the 2d of December, 1804, General Bonaparte, chosen and elected by the people, is crowned Emperor!"

"On the 2d of December 1805, by one of those remarkable favors of fortune, on the battle field of Austerlitz, the crowned soldier magnificently pays his debt to the nation, in tearing to pieces its most implacable enemies! The pledge of the victory was the glorious treaty of Presbourg. Four years after, on the 16th of December, the Empress Josephine, a poor political victim, descended the throne, to make room at the side of Napoleon, for a daughter of the Casars. And four years later, by one of the frightful and unaccountable freaks of fortune, in the month of December, the earth gave way under the feet of the hero who had caused the earth to resound with the fame of his giant exploits. To unheard of triumphs, had succeeded unheard off reverses! The month of December 1813, saw in its short period unroll themselves more wonderful events than are generally to be witnessed in a whole century.

"And, after a lapse of twenty-seven years, long after all things on earth had been hushed for him, an impenetrable decree of Providence, as if to throw a last bright ray upon the memory of the Conqueror of Europe, caused the Prisoner of St. Helena, wrapped in his cold shroud, to reenter France, his well beloved France, and to take his last resting place by the side of his old companions in arms, of his ever faithful friends! The thought must wander dreaming on these strange coincidences! Who can ever explain these mysterious decrees of fate? Their secret influences will overrule a whole existence."

ANCIENT BUILDING IN VIRGINIA.—The most remarkable of all the buildings in the Northern Neck is that of Stratford, Country of Westmoreland, on the south bank of the Potomac, for a long time the property of the Lees. It was built by Mr. Thomas Lee, father of Richard Henry Lee. He is known by the name of President Lee, or Governor Lee—having been President of the King's Council and Governor of Virginia, while a colony. While governor, his house was burnt down, and either the British government, or the merchants of London, built this house for him, at great expense. There is, we presume, no structure like it in our country. Probably some ancient seat was the pattern. The bricks were brought from England, and are of the best quality. The walls of the first story are two feet and a half thick; of the second story, two feet. The present number of rooms in the main building is ninety. Originally there were more. The late General Henry Lee, of the Revolution, took down some of the partitions. The present hall is large enough for four rooms. Besides the main building, there are four offices, one at each corner, containing fifteen rooms. There is also, a stable, which with the space allowed in our city stables, would hold one hundred horses. When it is considered that all these buildings are of brick brought from England, and the whole work of the best kind, it is not to be wondered at that tradition makes it out to have cost sixteen thousand pounds sterling.

Michelet says, in writing of educating children, "They can imbibe but a little every day. Like a vase with a narrow neck, pour little or pour much, you will never get a great deal in at a time."

ANECDOTE OF TWO DOGS.—I will mention an anecdote recently communicated to me by a well-known officer of high rank in the British army. He had two dogs of the terrier breed, the one rough-coated, and of rather large size, of great intelligence and great attachment, named Pincher. The other was a very small smooth coated, snarling little animal, but an excellent house guard, named Jacko. These animals lived together on very friendly terms, domiciled generally in the housekeeper's room, where they were great favorites. One Sunday evening, the servants were summoned to prayers, leaving the room with their supper on the table, the cook only remaining in the kitchen adjoining the supper-room. In a short time Pincher went into the kitchen, and pulled the cook's gown, who, supposing he was begging for food, chid the animal and drove him away. In a few minutes he returned, and again pulled at the cook's garments, when he was again reprov'd. A third time he came, and pulled at her gown with more vehemence; when, wondering at the cause, she followed him to the supper-room, where the first thing she saw was little Jacko helping himself to the supper. In this instance it is impossible not to suppose that Pincher knew right from wrong, and that he thought it his duty to report the wrong done, although by his play-fellow and friend, to the person in authority. Here, in fact, a degree of intelligence was shown which is nearly allied to reason.—[Jesse.

NAPOLEON'S HEART.—When Bonaparte died, it is well known that his heart was extracted, with the design of being preserved. The British physician, who had charge of the wondrous organ, had deposited it in a silver basin, among water, and retired to rest, leaving two tapers burning beside it in his chamber. He often confesses to his friends, while narrating the particulars, that he felt very nervously anxious as to the custodian of such a deposit, and though he reclined he did not sleep. While lying thus, awake, he heard, during the silence of the night, first, a rustling noise, then a plunge among the water in the basin, and then the sound of an object falling, with a rebound, on the floor—all occurring with the quickness of thought. Dr. A. sprang from his bed, and the cause of the intrusion upon his repose was explained—it was an enormous Normandy rat dragging the heart of Napoleon to its hole. A few moments more, and that which had been too vast in its ambition to be satisfied with the sovereignty of continental Europe, would have been found in a more degraded position than the dust of Cæsar stopping in a beer-barrel—it would have been devoured as the supper of a rat! "To such vile uses must we come at last!"

FRENCH POLITENESS.—A young gentleman lodging in a narrow street of Paris lately conceived himself enamored of a lady who appeared occasionally at an opposite window. With the freedom of modern Lovelaces, he enclosed a copper coin in a billet-doux, to give it the necessary weight and threw it with sufficient force against the closed sash as to break the pane of glass and go through. His own window was left open, and in a few minutes after, a cold roast chicken entered from the opposite side, to the leg of which was tied the following note:

MONSIEUR—You take advantage of a means of corresponding with my wife which prove you to have read the Spanish romances to some profit. While I allow your ingenuity, however, allow me to express a wish that, in your future love-letters to her by the same post, you will let the enclosed weight be of silver instead of copper, that I may be able to repair the broken pane of glass at your expense. Your ser't, L.

CHANGES IN MAN'S LIFE.—About five years ago we saw a man light his cigar with a twenty dollar note of the Farmers and Mechanic's Bank. At that time he was full of life, and in the possession of real estate in the city of Philadelphia, valued at $80,000. Alas! what changes both Time make—on Saturday last this foolish man was seen begging alms in our public streets. He looked wretched, was ghastly pale, and miserably clad.—[Pennsylvanian.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1849.

FRATERNITY.

UNITY, or Fraternity, is a principle, essential to the construction of all civilized communities, and may be simply defined as a union of Mind, tending to the realization of certain objects. The entire governmental theory, and the very existence of society, are the results of this Fraternity of Thought, directed to the construction of modes of government and communal institutions; so, in many great popular movements we find this Unity of Intellect, conjoined with increased knowledge, assisting in the vindication of political and social requirements.

Taking but a cursory view of the many great popular struggles which have taken place from time to time throughout the civilized world, a casual observer might suppose them more impulsive than premeditated. However, on a closer scrutiny, they will be found, for the most part, to be the results of a concurrence of Thought, molded and organized for the accomplishment of certain preconceived plans. Do we not owe much to Unity? to that heroic union of thought and action which vindicated the unalienable rights of man, tore the "scepter from the tyrant's grasp, and bequeathed to us that most inestimable of birthrights—Liberty?" It is therefore almost unnecessary to say that Fraternity is essential to the furtherance of all great views; the world's history and man's own experience, must convince him that it is so.

The history of the last year affords us a painful evidence of the frustration of great projects through the want of that Fraternity, so essential to their success. Accessory as it is, in so great a measure, to the re-establishment of freedom and human happiness, it is natural to suppose that it exercises an extensive influence upon society at large. It is not to be estimated, only in relation to its assisting connection with political organization.

Apart from its political bearing, Fraternity possesses a moral influence, scarcely less important than the former. View it in connection with the Order, as binding men together in a vast association, which has for its object the extensive diffusion of benevolence, and the establishment of Love and Truth: an Order, acting as an engine of Charity, and directing its energies to purposes of practical good. Behold the operations of this system, organized for the performance of deeds of mercy; no prying eye witnesses its acts of kindness and brotherly love, nor are its tender assiduities around the dying brother's couch blazoned forth by the "trumpet tongue of fame," it is good twice done, for it is done unseen. At a political influence the Order does not at all aim, but through the operations of its great law, Love, it corrects acerbities, arising from the differences of opinion existing in our political world.

The spirit of the Order embodies the kindest affections which the heart of man is capable of feeling. Its stores of good are inexhaustible, and its mission of Love earnestly continuous. What can be more congenial to the heart of man, or more pregnant with meaning, than that spirit of the purest Fraternity which permeates the entire system of our noble Order? It is a vast community of brothers, spread throughout the wide expanse of our mighty Union, and even to the rocky shores of the Pacific and the glittering sands of the Sacramento, the spirit of Odd-Fellowship is, or shortly will be extended. Thus we see that Fraternity, as embodied in the Constitution of the Order, possesses vast capabilities for the diffusion of happiness. The resources of the Order are increasing yearly, and such is the extent of its immense store-houses of Love and Benevolence, that the philanthropist may justly entertain the most glorious anticipations for the future.

Nor is its moral power, as exercising a protective influence on the morality of society, to be left out of consideration. The force of its operations are sensibly felt throughout the wide extent of its beneficent scope. Much, however, as Fraternity is to be admired in a political view, still more will we estimate it as an essentially component part of the most extended scheme of Benevolence that has ever been constructed among men. The mission of our Order is onward—progressive—like the spirit of the age. Who can arrest the progress of this mighty association? Want of Unity can. Yes, that want of community of thought and action, by which so many a noble cause has been wrecked, that could defeat its aim. But, united, our course is not to be impeded, though fanatics may howl or bigots cant.

The irresistible current of its philanthropy will flow onward for ages, elevating in its progress the moral and intellectual condition of man, diffusing happiness throughout, until it finally accomplishes the great mission upon which it set out, the foundation on an extended social basis of Friendship, Love and Truth.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

The Weather—Peculiarities of the City—Grand Sire of the I. O. of O. F.—Literature—Hotels—California Fever.

FRANKLIN HOUSE, Philadelphia, Feb. 1, 1849.

RAIN, snow and mud!—mud, snow and rain! Yesterday, to-day and always when we have the misfortune to visit Philadelphia. For the last three years we have been a frequent visitor to this city of fraternal affection, and we are quite certain we never saw here a gleam of sunshine, or dry and pleasant weather. The "shadowless man," might walk these streets with perfect impunity, for, as the sun never shines here—to our knowledge—all are shadowless.

But notwithstanding the unpleasantness of the weather, we have found much to interest us. The citizens of Philadelphia are distinguished for a warmth of feeling and a habit of hospitality quite agreeable to a stranger. We have always found the people here, courteous and obliging, full of intelligence and fond of society and conversation. We observe two things here, which give the city an appearance somewhat foreign. One is the fashion of having one's place of business, or his office and dwelling in the same building. Almost all the lawyers and officers of the city and county, as well as a large number of shopkeepers, have their offices and shops in their houses. On the whole, we like this. It looks domestic, and is conducive to good habits and correct morals. The father and husband is always at home.

The other peculiarity we do not like so much. It is the ugly and prison-like appearance of the houses. Instead of the light and airy green blinds as is the fashion in New-York, and all eastern towns and cities, the Philadelphians barricade their windows with solid and heavy shutters made of thick plank. And then, their inhospitable shutters are secured by ponderous iron belts, of a most ferocious appearance, which remind us of Sing Sing. Let a New-Yorker or Eastern man pass through the streets of this city a little apart from the chief business localities, any time before noon, and he would imagine himself in a city of jails. Now, why do the people of this city of brotherly love think it necessary to secure their persons and property in this remarkable manner? Is it that they have less confidence in each other, or that robbery and theft are more frequent in Philadelphia than elsewhere? We shall recur to this peculiarity at another time.

We had, yesterday, very pleasant interviews with P. G. M. Perry, and the M. W. G. Sire of the G. L. U. S., Hon. R. Kneass, Esq. Brother Perry is our well-known correspondent. The Grand Sire is a remarkably social gentleman, of superior intelligence and firmness, and every way fitted to preside over an Order like ours. We are under great obligations to him for his kindness and words of advice.

We called, also, on William Curtis, Esq., G. Sec. of the G. L., I. O. of O. F. of Pennsylvania, but unfortunately did not find him at home. Bro. C. is a very efficient and popular officer. Odd-Fellowship appears to be in a very flourishing condition in the city and State, and is accomplishing much good.

In Literature, Philadelphia is not behind any city in the Union. Her men of letters are more active and manly than ours, have less of vanity and foppery, and are never seen strutting in tawdry and grotesque dresses at Fancy Balls.

Of the poets of Philadelphia we must place Augustine J. H. Duganne in the first rank. His style is excellent, his thought is lofty, far-reaching and prophetic, and his verses are smooth and full of harmony. We have often published his grave and serious pieces, and now take the liberty to present our readers with the following Anacreontic, which is a gem in its way, and proves Mr. Duganne to be one of our first poets.

Lesbia! I charge thee, fill for me
A goblet of the orient wine,
Now Luna's yellow tresses twine
Their gold amid the jet of thine,
I drink, my love, to thee.
Ay, twine thy glowing arms, my girl,
Around my neck, and lay thy brow
Upon my bosom closely now,
Until my breath shall fan the curl
That wantons with my lips—
The jealous noon will learn full soon,
Thine eyes are her eclipse.
Fill high, fill high—or live or die,
I clasp thee in my arms—
By heaven, I swear, that sky and air
Are drunken with thy charms.
My soul is trembling on my breath,
One kiss, and thou may'st taste it!
Soft, dearest, soft, it murmureth—
Take not thy lips away, it saith—
Taste all, but do not waste it.

Many things we wished to speak of in this letter, we are obliged for want of space, to defer to another time.

We must not forget however, to say a word in relation to this Franklin House, where we are now writing, and its worthy and gentlemanly host. We wish our friends to bear in mind that this house is now in new hands, and is raised to a hotel of the first class.

Mr. Burrows, the present proprietor, is winning golden opinions in all quarters, and his house has become a favorite with the traveling public. We can recommend this hotel to all our friends, as the very best in the city. We shall give a more detailed description of this establishment when we return from our Southern visit.

The "California Fever" is as extensive and potent in its ravages here as elsewhere, carrying off a hundred a week. The love of gold has be-deviled all the inhabitants of the Quaker City. May Heaven save them.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN CALIFORNIA.

AMID the general excitement which now pervades every State in the Union, and almost all parts of the world, in relation to the "Ophir of the West," Odd-Fellowship has not been forgotten. We cannot imagine any thing more necessary or beneficial in a state of society, such as must exist in California, than carrying out the principles of Friendship, Love and Truth. We hope that those who are about leaving, and there are very many who belong to the Order, will exercise, when they arrive at their destination, the genuine obligations of Odd-Fellowship in such manner as shall cause their influence to be marked with evidences of good, and remember how great soever the distance may be from the Lodge Room, your obligations are not the less binding. The U. S. Grand Lodge, at its last session in Baltimore, appointed Capt. V. Fraser, of the Revenue Service, Special Deputy Grand Sire for California, Oregon, Sandwich Islands, and ports in the Pacific. Capt. F. goes out with full authority to grant dispensations for Subordinate Lodges and Encampments.

LETTER FROM PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 3, 1849.

DEAR BRO.: Once more we drop you a few lines from the city of rectangles, but with little new or strange to write about; even California, the topic of topics, has become so hackneyed as to furnish poor material for home letter-writers. The theme is so general here, that ask a neighbor's health, and he answers, "twenty carats fine," or speak of business prospects, and he replies, "a rich placer just discovered." A colored man in the southern portion of our city, became so infatuated with the prevailing mania, as to dig a pit of considerable depth in the cellar of his house, in search of the gold located there in his dreams.

We have had for the last few days, slush and mud on the pavements, and mud and slush in the streets; but we are now enjoying delightful weather, which, with the beautiful blue above, serves to dissipate "the blues" here below.

The rival fire companies of our city of "brotherly love," (or rather of the adjacent districts,) have been indulging in the luxury of "firemen's fights," resulting, on Saturday night last, in the total demolition of a hose carriage and hose, and on Monday night, in the brutal murder of a young man, by several adherents of a rival company.

Amity Lodge No. 19, buried last week, our late Bro. W. Hannen; and this week, Industry Lodge No. 180, our late Bro. W. D. Johnson, and Covenant Lodge No. 114, late P. G. John A. Martin, late of Olive Branch Lodge, Wisconsin. To-morrow the body of the gallant Lieut. John B. Goodman, who was killed at Cherubusco, and late a P. G. of Berrien Lodge No. 6, of Michigan, will be followed to the grave by Wayne Lodge No. 8, of this city.

"Ah! it is sad when one thus linked departs; When Death, that mighty sevrer of true hearts, Sweeps through the halls so lately loud in mirth, And leaves pale sorrow weeping by the hearth."

Kah-ge-gah-bowk, an educated Ojibewa chief, has returned from a visit to the Southern Legislatures, and delivered a very feeling address before the Legislature of this State, in behalf of his red brethren. His object is to interest the various State Legislatures, that they may memorialize Congress to set apart a portion of our North-western Territory for the exclusive use of the Indians.

The corps dramatique has been withdrawn from the Athenaeum, and Dr. Valentine is making wry faces and comical addresses to delighted audiences. The Arch and Walnut-st. Theaters are both drawing crowded houses to Monte Christo, which, with its numerous cast and gorgeous appointments, promises a long run. Capt. Kidd is the hero at the National, which vies in brilliancy with its rivals. Signor Blitz is performing wonderful feats for the amusement of wonderful people, and the two Panoramas appear to have their full share of public patronage.

The new theater announced in my last, proved a great hoax. The supposed proprietor, Lister, having engaged architects, masons, lumber, &c., for a magnificent building, purchased a row of houses, contracted for a vessel for California, &c., when his drafts were dishonored, the bubble exploded, and the scoundrel decamped, leaving various law suits entailed upon his unfortunate dupes.

But I must close. Accept my best wishes for the "Golden Rule," and hope to maintain our principles, it will ever

MORE SECESSIONS TO GOLD-DOM.—The ship Geo. Washington which left this port the past week, for San Francisco, takes out among a hundred other passengers, Past Grand Rep. THEODORE DIMON, M. D., of Utica, N. Y.; P. G. APLEY, of Rome, N. Y. and Bros. T. J. MATTESON, of Lee, Oneida, Co. and P. KIEFFER, Stone Mills, Jefferson Co., N. Y. Those portions of the Fraternity with whom they are endeared by their many sterling qualities and philanthropic acts will doubtless feel this separation most keenly. But while we sympathize with them and others in the departure of the choice spirits around us on so uncertain and hazardous an expedition as this pilgrimage to the "gold diggings" necessarily is, under any circumstances, we also rejoice in the concretion of all such elements toward the fruit of the mountain now in labor on the shores of the Pacific, and big with the fate thousands. May kind Heaven bless the bringing forth!

ODD FELLOWSHIP in this district is in an exceedingly prosperous condition, and is doing its appropriate work in the true fraternal spirit which should ever be the leading characteristic of the Order. A WORD TO SONS OF TEMPERANCE, MASONS
AND ODD-FELLOWS.

Meanwhile, we have seen the Order crumble into ruin. We have seen members by tens and hundreds violate their obligations. We have known the Recording Scribe to tax up a countless list of worthless dues upon his books—making of them-

At the close of the address, the company proceeded to the Protestant Episcopal church, which was kindly offered for the occasion. The church was beautifully decorated with evergreens, and presented a lovely picture for the ceremonies. The R. W. G. M. read the services of the church, with that solemnity which caused the writer to say, "Surely this is God's own house." As soon as the services were finished, a lecture was pronounced by the writer, at the close of which, the brothers and the ladies again returned to the Lodge room, where in

FOREIGN MISCELLANY.

SOME, not satisfied with the present state of Europe, find no interest in the late European news. Many wished to see blood shed like water; others, of the royal school, complain that despots have not yet succeeded in restoring absolutism, as in former years. As for us, who go for the progress of nations, and the good of humanity, we find yet in Europe great matter of interest; we see that moderate and enlightened men are destroying despotism with their wise doctrine, and are preparing to build new commonwealths, in spite of all the horrors of red republicanism, and of royal tyrants.

FRANCE

Has elected a President, or rather to say a puppet, who, at his first ray of glory and triumph, appears to have forgotten his exile and imprisonment, the Presidency and its duties, as he addresses his ministry, not as a republican magistrate, but like an absolute king. Vive la France! The election of Louis Napoleon will prove injurious, not only to the French democracy, but will shame all the world. France, by English gold and infamous intrigues, has sacrificed the best of her great men, as Lamartine and Cavaignac. They would have saved the country in any peril; they would have been an honor to their nation, and in a short time would have destroyed despotism all over Europe. But this is what generally happens in a Republic; often we see a man, the true pillar of the commonwealth, sacrificed by demagogues to an obscure and unworthy candidate. Then the ruin of this Republic is unavoidable. The true patriotic and zealous citizen is forgotten; it only remains to him but to weep in solitude over the misfortunes of his country! Louis Napoleon is ambitious of the pompous title of Emperor. Perhaps the fancy of an Empire may cost him, not only a failure, but may yet cause his Napoleonic head to be rolled on the scaffold of democracy.

ITALY

Is at war with Austria. Perhaps while we write, the cannon thunders already on the desolate plains of Lombardy, and sweeps away with its destroying elements, many thousand precious lives. The Italian newspapers received by us, are full of incidents, and of barbarities committed by the ferocious Austrian General Radetzky. France and England have undertaken to settle the difference with Austria, but there is no benefit to be expected from their mediation. The awful fact is, that Lombardy looks like a city visited by the cholera. The emigration from this country to Piedmont has been to an enormous extent; the fugitives being chiefly young men of the age of 18 to 25, who are in military service. The best families have fled, and the vengeance of the tyrant is waiting to be poured on the countries. The soldiers are the only ones who are well dressed, and who have plenty of money in their pockets, at the expense of the unhappy people. It is said that the Austrians are marching on Piedmont, and it is to be hoped that it will prove true, that the cholera will not find their graves in the seven hills.

The Pope has been formed to form a government, and to make an offensive alliance with the other Italian States. The day of glory was it for Rome and the Romans, when the funeral bell of the Capitol, which tolls only on the death of a Pope, announced the death of a kingdom! All the troops marched in array with colored banners, and the clubs of Florence and other cities of Tuscany took part in the civic fete. The Pope has sent his third protest, but too late. The Romans have proclaimed that the dynasty of the Popes has come to an end, and will no longer be supported by the children of the greatest Republic of the world.

A Cardinal was dispatched by a stroke of apoplexy, after a very warm discussion with the Pope. He wished that Pius IX would call on the foreign powers to restore to him the chair of St. Peter, and to abolish every liberal institution in the Roman States. He departed in a good moment, and we hope that his infamous desire will never be accomplished.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

Are fighting and shedding rivers of human blood. It appears that the Austrian army succeeded in entering Pest, and many other cities of the Hungarian kingdom. But in spite of her bloody triumphs, we fear that Austria has not yet conquered the Hungarians; and we hope that Kossuth, in his retreat toward Szegedin, will stop the march of the barbarians of Austria.

SWITZERLAND.

This beautiful country, so long desolated by ultra-Catholic and Jesuitical bands of fanatics, after a year of glorious peace, has magnanimously granted a full amnesty to all political offenders. We wonder if the barbarians of Sunderland had been victorious, if they would have ever pardoned their political enemies?

POLAND

Is invaded by the cholera; and since its appearance to the 18th of December, there has been 51,214 cases—26,983 recovered, and 23,560 died. There is nothing of any interest from this country, in a political point of view. The Poles wait for better days, like the captive for the moment of his redemption.

SPAIN

Recalls to our memory the dreadful epoch of 1831. It appears that the civil war between the Carlists and Christinos is increasing with all the horrors and cruelties practiced by that ferocious people. Our Spanish correspondent says that a bloody conflict has taken place between Cabrera and General Nourilas. The rebels, guided by many ex-monks and exiled priests, all partisans of despotism, had taken a strong position in the mountains near Vich, from which they were driven after a violent struggle, which lasted some hours. The Spanish Government denies the project of annexing Cuba to the United States. We believe that Mr. Polk is not so much interested in the subject.

IRELAND

Is quiet—starving—and John Bull proudly raises his head over this unfortunate country; while the amiable Victoria seems not to care a fig for the famished children of Erin. The judges in the writ returned in the O'Brien case, have decided in favor of the Government, and the Government has so thoroughly disappointed its law officers, for their blundering and want of skill in the prosecution of this noble patriotic cause, that they have resolved to sever the connection as soon as possible.

ENGLAND.

The cholera has reached its most destructive limits. The mortality is again at the same high level. The Government has sent 11 vessels had sailed for California, and many more are expected next week.

INDIA.

The intelligence received from Bombay is from December 3rd. Lord Gough, with 2000 men and ten pieces of artillery, had reached the seat of war. There are 40,000 men in the field. There have been several skirmishes, and one Sepoy regiment had gone over to the enemy. Some batteries were captured, and five hundred of the Moultauese killed.

CONSTANTINOPLE

Has been visited by the Asiatic cholera, and the government has published very salutary laws to prevent its ravages. The Courier de Constantinople says that at the arsenal, and among soldiers generally, the number of victims from cholera, during the different periods the pestilence had visited that city, has been very great. During one entire year, the soldiers were limited to meat and rice alone—no fruits, no vegetables, no herbs of any kind were allowed to enter the barracks. During the Ramazan, however, the strictness of this rule having been momentarily relaxed, dangerous symptoms instantly manifested themselves.

G. F. SECCHI DE CASALI.

NEW YORK FREE ACADEMY.

THIS institution, which is so creditable to this city, was opened to public inspection on Saturday. The building is located at the corner of Lexington Avenue and 33rd street, and was erected under the supervision of James Renwick, Jr., Esq., and in a Netherlandish style of architecture. It is 125 feet by 80, and the rooms are all arranged with a view to the highest comfort and convenience. On the occasion of its opening, an address was delivered by Robert Kelly, Esq., President of the Board of Education; from which we make the following extract, addressed specially to the teachers:

"But let the spirit of Christianity pervade your teaching, as it pervades the land and the administration of justice. Teach that the truths of nature rest upon the truth of God. Let the serene light of a pure religion permeate every science, brightening and blending with its beauty and truth, like a lamp set within a vase of alabaster, bringing out into bolder relief and more exquisite effect the forms and ornaments that are sculptured upon it. I trust that a spirit of infidelity, materialistic, atheistic, or pantheistic, may never gain a foothold within these walls, to exert that incalculable power for evil, which it will control, by guiding the minds of youth, in their investigations in the higher regions of knowledge. When exhibiting the scroll of the heavens, and pointing out the golden characters emblazoned upon it, you tell your scholars that these characters are the symbols of worlds; let not the guidance of a mad devotedness lead them to inconclusive reasoning, but let this be the spirit of your teaching. 'When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man, that thou visitest him?'"

A TELEGRAPH ON THE OCEAN!—We thought that the abundant and rich mines of California were full enough of attraction and of visionary projects, but it seems that some merchants of Philadelphia, who belong to the "go ahead" class, have founded a new project not placed on rocks or gold dust, but on the Almighty Ocean. They have presented a petition to Congress to grant them the privilege of

if they ever decide anything upon this important matter, and afford the projectors an opportunity to pay a visit to the bottom of the Ocean, to secure the services of Mr. Neptune to fix the telegraphic poles. "We live in a world of progress," said to us the other day a preacher; missionaries throw away their Bible for gold, and the Romans the Pope for a Republic!

THE LAUNCH.—Two splendid steamers, the Atlantic and Pacific, were launched last week from the yards of Messrs Bell, Brown and Webb. They went off without the least difficulty, and are fine specimens of American ingenuity and skill. A large number of people had assembled, who, in anticipation of the event, appeared to regard it as a new and interesting feature of our city. In model, finish, and in every respect, they are highly creditable to the country. The names of the owners was demonstrated by a magnificent banquet at the close. We wish they may be the ones of all who take an interest in this great enterprise, and in the communication between this and the other side of the world.

"THE COVENANT." This periodical, so happy to see, has been revived, and is under the administration of Mrs. Seymour and Bro. Paschal Donaldson. It is now a lady's magazine, and the number before us is certainly very excellent, and promises well for the future. We wish it success.

GRAND SECRET OF MASONRY.

THE following incident needs neither preface nor comment. It speaks for itself:

On a visit to a neighboring city recently, I called at the house of my friend B—, with whom I had been long and intimately acquainted. To my astonishment, I found his lady reading a Masonic paper. I asked her what change had come over her, that she could not only admit such a paper to her house, but could sit down to its perusal; for I knew her father's family were among the most vindictive, bitter, proscriptive anti-Masons, that ever left the infected district of New York. She replied, that she had discovered the grand secret of Masonry; and if it would be agreeable to me, she would relate how she came to make the discovery. I requested her to proceed, which she did as follows:

"Soon after you left here last fall, I learned to my extreme mortification, that my husband had become a Mason. I attributed it to your influence, and I need not say what my feelings were toward you or my husband. I at once came to the conclusion that my domestic happiness was at an end; but I resolved that my conduct in all the relations of wife and mother, should see that I had done all a woman could do. Some three or four months after I learned my husband had joined the Masons, a circumstance occurred that, for the first time, gave me any reason to doubt his integrity. It was one of the coldest nights of last winter, that my husband returned at a late hour, and said to me, 'Margaret, cannot you do without your blanket shawl?' I replied that I could. He asked me to get it for him, and bring him a bedspread or comforter. I handed the articles to him, and he immediately left the house. My first thoughts were to follow him. I went to the window, and by the light from the lamps I discovered another man with a large basket—the shawl and comforter were placed in it, and they both soon disappeared. My husband returned in about half an hour. I expected in the morning, as a matter of course, he would have some story prepared to explain his mysterious conduct, but not a word did I get out of him. I determined to keep a sharp look out for my shawl, for if I could once get my eyes on that, I would be able to unravel the whole mystery. It was not long after, as I was in the street, that a female whisked along past me, upon whom I discovered my shawl! The good for nothing huzzy! thought I; while a glow of triumph thrilled every nerve, and quickened my pace in the pursuit. I followed her closely from one street to another into the fourth story of a bindery. I saw her very composedly lay aside my shawl, and sit down to her work—where, urged on by that insatiable desire to get the clue to my husband's derfity, I soon learned the street, the number of her residence, and immediately left for it. I was not mistaken, neither, for I saw my comforter there. The whole secret flashed on my mind at once, as clearly as if it had been written with a sunbeam from Heaven. There I found a widowed mother in the last stages of consumption, and three children dependent upon the pittance earned by the elder sister, whom I so suspiciously followed. I learned from the lips of the dying woman a lesson, that in all my philosophy I had never dreamed of—such a tale of sorrow as I had never before listened to—and when she had related the deed of charity, that had been the cause of all my unhappiness, I felt that there was not room in my bosom to appreciate the disinterested benevolence of my husband. She said, 'I do not know how we should have lived, but for the kindness of two persons who came here late one night, and left a basket filled with provisions, and some bed clothes, a shawl and five dollars. They just opened the door, and set in the basket, saying: 'Accept this, and ask no questions'; and left before I had time to inquire even their names. I do not know who they were, and I have had some doubts from where these things came. But I never forget in my daily prayers to Him who openeth his hand and filleth the poor with bread, to ask if these were men, He will keep them and theirs from the sorrows and afflictions with which I am visited. I left the house a better woman than when I entered it.'

"But the grand secret of Masonry," said I, "I thought you were to tell me what it is."

She replied, "It is this—to do good, and not to and Semiramis, who reigned 2017 years Christ, had armies amounting to nearly two fighting men. The first guards and troops, as a standing army, were formed 11,000 years B. C. So says Eusebius.

GOLD.

As everything pertaining to the Gold Regions is interesting at this time, we gather the following information from the valuable Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures and Mines, by Andrew Ure, M. D.:

"Gold is found only in the metallic state; and the small grains are not fragments broken from a greater mass, as many suppose; but their flattened, ovoid shape, and rounded outline, show that this is their original form. It never predominates to such a degree as to constitute veins by itself. It is either disseminated, or, as it were, impasted in strong masses, or spread out in thin plates or grains on their surface, or, lastly, implanted in their crevices, under the shape of filaments or crystallized twigs.

"It has never been observed in any secondary formation, but pretty abundantly in its true and primary locality, among the trap-rocks of igneous origin, implanted on the sides of the fissures, or disseminated in the veins.

"Gold is much more common in alluvial grounds than among primitive rocks. It is found in spangles, in the silicious, argillaceous and ferruginous sands of certain plains and rivers; and very many, even at this time, suppose that if the sands of the rivers contain grains of gold, the mountains whence the rivers spring must be full of it. Many have sought, in vain, for the native bed of this metal.

"It is obvious that the gold in the sands of rivers belongs to the grounds through which they glide, from the following observations: 1. The soil of these plains contains, frequently, at a certain depth, and in many spots, spangles of gold, separable by washing. 2. It happens almost always, that gold is found among the sands of rivers, only in a very circumscribed space. On ascending these rivers their sands cease to afford gold; though did this metal come from the rocks above, it should be found more abundantly near the source.

"It has also been remarked, that the gold of alluvial formations is more pure than that extracted from rocks.

"Gold is distinguished by its splendid yellow color; its great density; its pre-eminent ductility and malleability, whence it can be beat into leaves only 282,000th of an inch thick. It is insoluble in any acid, except the mixture of muriatic and nitric acid, styled by the Alchemists, Aqua Regia, because gold was deemed by them to be the king of metals."

WEALTH OF THE UNITED STATES.—The report of the Patent Office recently made, presents interesting statistics relative to the wealth of the Union. The population of the United States is set down at 20,744,000, and the aggregate of personal and real property estimated at $8,294,570,000. New York is the richest State, her property being $912,000,000. Pennsylvania next, 850,000,000; then Ohio, 740,000,000; then Virginia, 508,000,000. The remainder of the States rank as follows: Indiana, 384,000,000; Tennessee, 380,000,000; Kentucky, 342,000,000; Massachusetts, 340,000,000; Illinois, 294,000,000; Alabama, 276,000,000; Mississippi, 276,000,000; South Carolina, 242,000,000; Missouri, 240,000,000; Maine, 240,000,000; Maryland, 198,000,000; Louisiana, 188,000,000; New Jersey, 167,000,000; Michigan, 148,000,000; Connecticut, 132,000,000; Vermont, 120,000,000; New Hampshire, 120,000,000; Arkansas, 60,000,000; Texas, 56,000,000; Iowa, 52,000,000; Rhode Island, 52,000,000; Wisconsin, 36,000,000; Delaware, 32,000,000; Florida, 30,000,000; District of Columbia, 18,000,000; Oregon, 8,000,000.

POST-OFFICE IN OLDEN TIME.—Mr Cist, in a letter from Washington, published in his Advertiser, says:

"I was shown by the chief clerk in the interior department of the Post-office, the first letter opened by the United States, during the administration of Dr. Franklin, the first Postmaster-General in the service. It is a blank book, of some three or four quires, very little superior to an every-day blotter of the present age, but it sufficed to hold all the post-office accounts for three or four years, from the establishment of the office in June 19th, 1775. I observe Dr. Franklin charges himself with one year's salary from that date—$1000. It serves to give a forcible impression of the progress of this department since that; all the entries are made in his own writing, while at this time there are over one hundred and twenty persons employed in various capacities in this department."

The first translation of the Hebrew Bible into Greek, called the Septuagint, was made, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 227 years before Christ. Seventy-two interpreters were engaged, and it was completed in seventy-two days.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY.—At a regular meeting held on Tuesday evening, Jan. 2d, Hon. L. Bradish in the chair; a large number of members were present for so cold an evening.

Mr. Bartlett, foreign corresponding secretary, read a letter from Hon. M. Pouissi, French Minister, in reply to a letter from Mr. Marshall, of Buffalo, with remarks on the subject of a paper read at a late meeting, by Mr. Greenough, on the probable residence of Fenelon in North America. The letter states that Francois Salinac de Fenelon was ordained, according to published accounts, in Canada, June 11, 1658, and left Canada in 1673. Charlevoix mentions that Messrs. Fenelon and Trouve left Quebec in 1673. Several other facts and dates, wanting to Mr. Greenough, are supplied by this letter.

AUSTRALIA.—Since the return of Mr. Kennedy, the following interesting particulars have been added to the description of good country in the official dispatch. A new tract of country has been discovered, that is described as most splendid, more especially beyond Warrigoo, to portray which even the glowing language of Sir Thomas Mitchell falls short; being clad in verdure, and bearing timber of magnificent growth. Several rivers and creeks have also been discovered, or explored for the first time; and, to crown all, in a healthy region, none of the party having been attacked with sickness of any kind since leaving Sidney. We must not forget to add, the party left Sidney with no animal food, their guns being the only commissariat on which they had to rely in this particular; and the contemplated supplies and means of acquiring them never failed. For eleven months they traveled the bush, and never knew the want of animal food. Mr. Thomas Wall, the indefatigable naturalist of the party, has made some valuable additions to the Sydney Museum, in ornithological and entomological specimens. That part of the journey bordering upon the arid and stony Desert of Strurt is dryly described as having been "a benefit."

THE POPE TO CAVAGNAC.—Gen. Cavaignac, as the Chief of the Executive Government of France, has received the following letter, dated Dec. 7th, 1848, from Pope Pius IX.:

"Monsieur le General: My heart is touched, and I am penetrated with gratitude for the spontaneous and generous movement of the eldest daughter of the Church, who shows herself anxious and already in action to hasten to the succor of the Sovereign Pontiff. A favorable opportunity will, without doubt, offer itself to me to manifest in person to France my paternal sentiments, and to be able to diffuse over the soil of France, with my own hand, the benedictions of the Lord, as I now supplicate him by my voice, to consent to diffuse them in abundance over you and the whole of France."

"PIUS PAPA NONUS."

A CONGRESS ON HORSEBACK.—"Irenaeus," of the Observer, writing from White Plains, mentions that the Provincial Congress of the State of New York, adjourned in the city to meet there two days before the Declaration of Independence. The members performed the journey from New York to White Plains on horseback, the President, Pierre Van Courtlandt, riding in front of the procession. On the journey, an express from General Washington overtook the body, with business that required immediate action; whereupon the President called the Convention to order, and held a session on horseback, several resolutions being duly passed, and the business done in an orderly manner.

A PROPHECY.—The singular prophecy made by Fleming in the year 1702, is now well en route to a fulfillment. Nearly a century and a half ago that singular Vates foretold the French Revolution of 1789, that the Papacy would then receive a severe blow through the sides of the French Monarchy, and that the final overthrow of the Pope would take place in 1848, although he said there was a possibility that the Pope of Rome might linger in the Vatican (completely shorn of power,) until the close of the century.

MODERN NOBILITY.—Theodore Parker, in a late sermon, said, that the grandfathers of many men, who, now-a-days, are studying heraldry, to get at their coat of arms, had not even a coat to their arms.

THE SEA SARPENT.—The astonishing phenomenon of two vessels having seen the American sea serpent within so short a date, (almost the same day, and at such extraordinary distances from each other,) is accounted for now, by the very simple circumstances that one vessel saw the head, while the other only saw the tail of this decidedly the longest monster that is known—on record.—[Punch.]

Scientific and Useful.

LADY CONTRIBUTORS TO SCIENCE.—A visitor to the National Institute at Washington makes the following mention in the Intelligencer of two collections of Sea Mosses or Marine Plants, which, he says, will alone repay one for the trouble of a visit to the museum of the National Institute:

The first collection consists of twenty-four specimens, which were gathered from the Lynn beach, by a lady named Avis Keene, and presented by her, through the Commissioner of Patents, to the National Gallery. The specimens are not only very beautiful in themselves, but they are arranged in the most tasteful manner, and as agreeable to the eye as a series of highly wrought paintings. They are of almost every color, from the richest brown to the most delicate scarlet; and it requires no great effort of the fancy to see in them accurate representations of trees, leaves, feathers, and other picturesque objects in nature. The second collection to which we have alluded was made on the coast of Rhode Island, by the lady of Gen. Daniel Parker, in the year 1827, and by him presented to the National Institute. Of these there are no less than ninety-nine specimens. Having been arranged with scientific care, the spectator has it in his power to wander from the vegetable to the animal kingdom in regular order. In this collection are several specimens of the coral formations, which are exceedingly interesting and valuable.

INDIA RUBBER A CENTURY AND A QUARTER SINCE.—Every generation is wisest in its own conceit, and the present is continually overrated at the expense of the past. Who would have thought that India rubber cloaks were worn in South America upwards of a century since? yet such, forsooth, is the plain fact of history; and disinclined as we are to rob Mr. Mackintosh of the merit of his adaptation, the invention must be awarded to another age; indeed, it is almost one of the antiquities of the New World. In a work entitled "La Monarchia Indiana," printed at Madrid in 1722, we find a chapter devoted to "very profitable trees in New Spain, from which they distil various liquors and resins." Among them is described a tree called ulquahuil, which the natives cut with a hatchet, to obtain the white, thick, and adhesive milk. This when coagulated, they made into balls called ulli, which rebounded very high, when struck to the ground, and were used in various games. It was also made into boots and sandals. The author continues:—"Our people (the Spaniards) make use of their ulli to varnish their cloaks, made of hempen cloth, for wet weather, which are good to resist water, but not against the sun, by whose heat and rays the ulli is dissolved." India rubber is not known in Mexico at the present day by any other name than that of ulli. And the oiled silk covering of hats very generally worn throughout the country by travelers is always called ulli.

HOT BLAST.—The prophecy of Sir Humphrey Davy, that water would, at the some future day, be used as fuel, seems to have come to pass. We were recently shown a very ingenious invention, by Mr. Crawford, which he calls a hot blast for steamer boilers. It consists of a tabular heater (the tubes extending through each end of the heater) into which a portion of the exhausted steam from the engine is admitted, which heats the air in its passage through the tubes. At one end of the heater is attached a receiver, with a pipe leading to the ash-pit—the ash-pit being closed in front; by this means the furnace is supplied with hot air instead of cold, which is, of itself, a matter of great importance as regards the saving of fuel. It is well known among scientific men, and men of experience in such matters, that the same amount of fuel will give more heat with hot air, than with cold; but in addition, a column of steam is thrown in, by which the draft of air can be increased to almost any degree, and at the same time the same steam becomes decomposed by the heat, and a large addition of the inflammable gasses, oxygen and hydrogen, is added, which is so much fuel supplied.

Messrs. Blair and Guthrie, on Deer Creek, have one applied to their boilers, and they informed us, that they save, on an average, thirty bushels of coal per day. Call and see it.—[Cincinnati Paper.]

TERRIFIC THEORY.—Professor Silliman mentions the fact, that in boring the Artesian wells in Paris, the temperature of the earth is increased at the rate of one degree for every fifty feet, toward the center. Reasoning from causes known to exist, he says: "The whole interior portion of the earth, or, at least, a great part of it, is an ocean of melted rock, agitated by violent winds, though I dare not affirm it, is still rendered highly probable by the phenomena of volcanoes. The facts connected with their eruption have been ascertained and placed beyond a doubt. How, then, are they to be accounted for? The theory, prevalent some years since, that they are caused by the combustion of immense coal beds, is perfectly puerile, and is entirely abandoned. All the coal in the world could not afford fuel enough for a single capital exhibition of Vesuvius. We must look higher than this; and I have but little doubt that the whole rests on the action of electric and galvanic principles which are constantly in operation in the earth."

STEAMBOAT PROPULSION.—The result of many years' inquiry and experiment into improved modes of propelling steamboats was recently exhibited by Captain Carpenter, R. N., at the Polytechnic Institution. Lord Auckland, the First Lord of the Admiralty; Capt. Ellis, R. N., comptroller of steam machinery; Mr. Loyd, principal engineer to the Admiralty; the Dean of Westminster, and other scientific gentlemen were present. Taking the screw as the base of the experiments, Captain Carpenter has arrived at the conclusion that "the maximum of speed is to be obtained only in one way, and that is by using two propellers with flat blades, or curved vanes, one under each quarter, which in position is typical of nature in the aquatic bird." That is to say, instead of retaining the screw at the stern, a propeller is placed under each quarter, which in operation is the same as the movement exhibited by the aquatic bird when in the act of swimming it is propelled onward by a web foot on each of its sides. This was the idea, and it has been ingeniously, and to all appearance, successfully carried out. Two models were put in motion in the reservoir of the institution—the one illustrating the operation of the screw and the other of a propeller under each quarter. Movement was communicated by clock work, and both models sped their way through the water cleverly and steadily. A comparison could not be drawn between them, the power and size not being equal; but the model illustrating the action of the two propellers exhibited the greater speed. It now remains to show by actual trial the adaptability of Captain Carpenter's invention to vessels of all sizes.—[London Paper.]

MANAGEMENT OF FIRES.—There is not one in five hundred who knows how to manage a coal fire properly—not even if he buys the coals himself. I have been on steamboats of all sorts and sizes, both in England and Scotland, and I have traveled on most of our great lines of railroads; I have also seen fires made in large foundries, and I can safely say that I never saw a stoker in any of these places manage a fire properly. If a gardener who has had much to do with fires were made a railway king, he could save thousands of pounds yearly in the coal bills alone. The way fires are mismanaged is this: when the coals are about half burnt, or rather so far coked as to burn clear with little or no smoke, a great fellow comes with a long black poker, and stirs them up, clearing away the ashes and small cinders from among the fire-bars. The fire then burns quite clear, and is perfect, and if left to itself in that state for a time, would be sufficiently strong for any purpose. But no; we are never satisfied with things as they should be. No sooner has the poker done its work but the coal-shovel must begin to undo it, by heaping on a fresh layer of coals all over the burning mass, and a black volume of smoke immediately destroys the efficiency of the clear fire. By the time this second feed of coals begins to burn clear—the state in which it is most powerful—the poker and shovel go the same unvaried round; and it is no exaggeration to say, that one-half of the coals used in this way are mere waste and useless smoke.—[Dr. Beaton, in the Cottage Gardener.]

A FEMALE PHYSICIAN.—Miss Elizabeth Blackwell, of Philadelphia, who has been pursuing her studies, for three years past, at the Geneva Medical College, received the degree of M. D., at the annual commencement of that institution, on the 23d ult. The subject of her thesis was "Ship Fever." The appearance of the female Æsculapia on the stage was greeted with marked approbation. On receiving her degree, she was heard to say, "With the help of the Most High, it shall be the effort of my life to shed honor on this diploma." Her case, which is the first of the kind in this country, has been made the subject of newspaper notice before.

The Chinese ascribe the invention of the mariner's compass to their Emperor Hong-Ti, who, they say, was a grandson of Noah. The honor of its European discovery is generally given to Flavio de Gioja, a Neapolitan, in 1302.

A carving machine has been invented which does the labor of ten men.

EXAMINATION DAY.—The science of a school examination is very prettily explained by a school-master's anecdote. A country school teacher, preparing for an exhibition of his school, selected a class of pupils, and wrote down the questions he would ask them on examination day. The day came and so came the young hopefuls, all but one. The pupils took their places as had been arranged, and all went glibly on until came the question for the absentee, when the teacher asked:

"In whom do you believe?"

The pupil who sat next the vacant seat, without noticing whose question it was, answered:

"Napoleon Bonaparte."

"No no!" angrily exclaimed the teacher, "in whom do you believe?"

"Napoleon Bonaparte!"

Here the teacher began to smell the rat, and said:

"You believe in the Holy Ghost, do you not?"

"No!" said the pupil amid roars of uncontrollable laughter, "the boy what believes in the Holy Ghost hasn't come to school to-day; he's at home, sick a-bed."

TAKING A SHOWER-BATH.—Doctor: "Well, how did your wife manage her shower-bath, deacon?"

Deacon: "She has had real good luck. Madam Moody told her how she managed. She said she had a large oiled-silk cap with a cape to it, like a fireman's, that came all over her shoulders and—"

Doctor: "She is a fool for her pains; that's not the way."

Deacon: "So my wife thought."

Doctor: "Your wife did nothing of the sort, I hope?"

Deacon: "Oh! no, doctor; she used an umbrilly."

Doctor: "What! used an umbrella! What the mischief good did the shower-bath do her?"

Deacon: "She said she felt better. Her clothes weren't wet a mite."

PUZZLING A DOCTOR.—Dr. M., an army surgeon was very fond of a joke, (if not perpetrated at his own expense,) and had, moreover, a great contempt for citizen-officers, who were more renowned for their courage than their scholarship. One day, at mess, after the decanter had performed sundry perambulations of the table, Captain S., a brave and accomplished officer, and a great wag, remarked to the doctor—(who had been somewhat severe in his remarks on the literary deficiencies of some of the new officers).—"Dr. M., are you acquainted with Capt. G.?" "Yes, I know him well," replied the doctor, "he's one of the new set. But what of him?" "Nothing in particular," replied Capt. S., "I have just received a letter from him, and I will wager you a dozen of old port that you cannot guess in six guesses how he spells cat." "Done," said the doctor, "it's a wager." "Well commence guessing," said S. "K, a, double t." "No." "K, a, t." "No! try again." "C, a, t, t, s." "No! you missed it again." "Well, then," returned the doctor, "C, a, double t." "No, that's not the way; try again—it's your last guess." "C, a, g, h, t." "No," said S., "that's not the way; you have lost the wager." "Well," said the doctor, with much petulance of manner, "how the devil does he spell it?" "Why, he spells it C, a, t," replied S., with the utmost gravity. Amid the roar of the mess, and almost choking with rage, the Doctor sprang to his feet, exclaiming, "Captain S., I am too old a man to be trifled with in this manner."

HONEST EPITAPHS.—In a country grave-yard in New Jersey, there is a plain stone erected over the grave of a beautiful young lady, with only the inscription upon it:

"Julia Adams, died of thin shoes, April 17, 1836, aged 19 years."

That is a town where the ladies are very fashionable, and the gentlemen very patriotic—so much so, that almost all are active politicians, and office-seekers. Hardly a grave stone is erected over an adult male, who is not titled with an Hon. a Gen. a Col. a Capt. or an Esq.; and most of them record offices civil and military which the deceased never held an office. An honest man..

A good deacon making an official visit to a neighbor who was very churlish and unpopular, put the usual question, "Are you going to go, my friend?" "Oh, yes," said the neighbor. "I am." "Well," said the simple-minded deacon, "I am glad you are, for all the neighbors are willing."

FATAL PRAYERS.—There used to be a judge upon the bench of a court, in a neighboring state, whose forte was the passing of severe sentences upon all poor wretches that came up to be dispatched by him. In the course of his official duties, he had passed sentence of death upon some dozen or two malefactors. A cut-throat genius was up one day to be sentenced, and says the judge, as is customary in such cases, winding up the sentence: "And may the Lord have mercy upon your poor soul." "Amen," says the goner. "Amen, Judge! and may the Lord eternally curse or mend your old soul, for I never knew any body to live long after you had prayed for them!"—[Boston Aurora Borealis.

"Good morning. They say Ned's got home—have you seen him?"
"Yes."
"What has he to say? he's been to Colifornia, ain't he?"
"Oh, he says he shot a hog with a pistol, and lived four days on three oranges."
"What does he say about the gold?"
"He says he 'sposes there is some, though he aint going to turn nigger, and dig. He's seen perilous times, and means to live easy."

The eccentric John Randolph once ascended a lofty point of the Blue Ridge, to see the sun rise. The scene was one of great sublimity, and it overwhelmed him with the sense of a present Deity. "Jack," said Randolph, to the servant who accompanied him, "if any body hereafter says there is no God, tell him he lies."

LADIES' FAIR—REV. BRO. T. L. HARRIS.

We understand that the Ladies of the Independent Christian Congregation of which Rev. Bro. Necrological.

SIR,—It is the desire of this Lodge that you insert the following Preamble and Resolutions in your paper at the earliest opportunity:

The Committee appointed to prepare resolutions expressive of the feelings of the members of Nundawaga Lodge No. 267, I. O. of O. F., occasioned by the death of the late N. G. WINFIELD SCOTT PATRICK, who departed this life in the village of Naples, on the morning of January 2d, 1849, acknowledge the task has been too great, and that they have but imperfectly discharged their solemn duty. Submitted in mourning.

B. F. SUMMERBELL,
A. T. NELSON,
A. R. BUTTLER.

NAPLES, Ont. Co., N. Y., Jan. 9th, 1849.

WHEREAS, It hath pleased that All-wise Being, whose ways we acknowledge, to remove from our Village one of its most respected and useful citizens, and from our Lodge one of its most beloved and devoted members, it becomes us to cherish his memory, and to testify to his virtues—to that purity and excellency of character which he exhibited among us.

Therefore, Resolved, That while with sorrow we bow to this dispensation of Him who rules on high, in taking from our fellowship the dear brother who ruled in our Lodge, and whose memory we will ever cherish, we bear our testimony to the modesty of his demeanor—to the unsullied reputation which he hath left behind. Living among us, the purest of the pure, bending to no vice, stooping to no folly, but lofty in his conceptions, and faithful to his integrity—in his life he was loved—in his death he is mourned.

Resolved, That in his death the Virtues have not only lost a faithful minister, but all interested in the promotion of education in this town, have become less strong—the duties of the office of Superintendent, upon the discharge of which he had so recently entered, having in him been wisely intrusted.

Resolved, That the members of this Lodge sympathize deeply with the sister, and also the more distant relatives, and in this bereavement we tender our sincere condolence.

Resolved, That as a tribute of respect for the deceased, our hall be clothed in mourning, and the usual badges be worn by the members for thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, under Seal of the Lodge, be presented to the sister of the deceased, who is still in our town, and that they be entered upon the minutes and published in the "Golden Rule."

Bristol, Professor of the M. E. Church, and P. G. of Osceola Lodge No. 304, at Auburn, N. Y. 4th edition, revised. CONTENTS.—PART I.—The Principles of Odd-Fellowship defined. PART II.—Objections answered. 1. It may be used for Political purposes; 2. You administer unlawful Oaths, and threaten unlawful Penalties; 3. The Poor cannot become members of it; 4. Odd-Fellowship is limited in its operations; 5. You create distinctions in society; 6. You are a Secret Institution; 7. You do not admit the Ladies; 8. The Church and Religion cover the whole ground; 9. It turns the Bible out of doors; 10. Odd-Fellowship is Free-Masonry revived; 11. Your Society compels the good to associate with the bad; 12. Your Regalia is useless and extravagant; 13. We object to your name of Odd-Fellows; 14. It makes Christians fellow-ships with the wicked and the Infidel; 15. Odd-Fellows are bound to shield each other from punishment when guilty. PART III.—The advantages arising from Odd-Fellowship. PART IV.—A word to the Public, the Ladies, and the Order.

Factie.

Ladies who are fond of knitting when at sea, need never be in want of materials for work, for any sailor will always be ready to spin them a yarn. They will find, however, much cruelty practiced on board, for seamen often attach a buoy to an anchor and throw him overboard. In a storm they generally, if possible, heave two, and if they see a buoy floating, they never fetch him up, but always avoid him.

Teacher.—Charles, spell axe.

Boy.—A-x-e, axe.

Teacher.—What is an axe?

Boy.—An instrument for cutting wood.

Teacher.—How many kinds of axes are there?

Boy.—There's broad axe, narrow axe, post axe, and—axe of the Legislature, and axe of the Apostles.

Teacher.—Go up to the head. Bill, aint you ashamed! Charley knows of three axes more than you do.

Mrs. Partington says she intended the consort of the female cemetery last evening, and some of the songs were extirpated with touching pathos. The young ladies sung like syrups, and looked like angels just out of paradox. She only regrets that during the showers of applause she remembered that she had forgotten her parasol.

"Father! father! have you got a quarter about you? The great zoological avery and circuit is coming here to-day. They've got some new things, father; a great boy constructor: and an African lion just from Asia, with forty stripes on his back, and nary one alike; all the monkeys on a keen jump; children under ten years of age, half-price. Mayn't I go, father?" "Why, sartin!"

A gentleman without much experience in the art, in attempting to carve a goose, dropped it on the floor. "There, now!" exclaimed the wife, "we have lost our dinner." "Oh, no, my dear," answered he, "it is safe, for I have my foot on it."

A lady who was suffering from slight indisposition, told her husband that it was with the utmost difficulty she could breathe, and the effort distressed her exceedingly. "I would not try, my dear," soothingly responded the husband.

GRAND MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE, NO. 127 CHAMBER-STREET NEW-YORK.

FOR the Treatment of all Diseases in Men, Women and Children; whether Acute or Chronic; whether Local or General—whether Serofulous, Syphilitic, or Epidemic—or all Maladies belonging to the line of Medicine and Surgery.

I. Cases of all kinds will be examined every day in the week from 7 o'clock A. M. till 7 P. M. Sundays excepted. II. No CHARGE made for EXAMINATIONS, or for our OPINION in any case.

III. Patients will find our examinations unlike those of any others which they have ever known or heard, and if we do not tell them more about their case, without their telling us any history of their disease, than they have ever known or learned before by their own observation, or that of any of their Doctors, we advise them not to submit to our treatment.

IV. All that Class of Diseases in which delicate and sensitive persons are exposed, by most Doctors, to Surgical and bloody operations, and to means and treatment which burn and torture, and confine the patient to the sick bed, are treated at this office without pain, exposure or confinement.

V. Patients will be convinced beyond all doubt, by our Examinations and Treatment, that their diseases in most, and the worst cases, originated in their childhood, or were inherited from their parents, or arose from a great variety of causes, which neither they nor their doctors ever imagined—and though they may seem to have a dozen different diseases, that in nearly every case they all spring from one root or cause, and will be driven out together by very simple means.

VI. Those Diseases of certain parts of the human system, which are almost universally treated in the first state with Balsam of Copaiba, Capsules, Cubes; by Injections of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead Water—Yellow or Black washes; with Blue or Mercurial and other Ointments; with Bongies, Catheters or Syringes—or in the second state, with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate for Corrosive Sublimates; with Hydriodate of Potash, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like slops—we say before heaven and earth, that by such treatment and such means, as are generally used, we know and can demonstrate, that these diseases have never been and can never be healed. They deceive the patient—they drive the disease into the system, and to other and more important parts—they produce Strictures, Callouses, Piles, Abscesses, Ulcers, Fistulas, Catarrhs, Dropsies, Rheumatic pains, Diseases of the Bones of the Liver, Kidneys, Lungs, Throat and whole system; and either render the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of these Quackish, Ruinous and Swindling remedies, we promise to every curable case we treat, a permanent and radical CURE FOR LIFE by very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell—which neither purges or vomits—nor hinders from business—nor exposes the patient in any way whatever, and which is only to be taken every other night. We can furnish patients with References to Terrible Cases which have been carried out of the Broadway Hospitals as incurable, to die, whom we have raised from the gates of the grave, after all other means have been used in vain.

VII. Knowing, as we do, that most Medicines in the hands of Apothecaries and Druggists are adulterated, and for various other reasons are not to be relied on; we have, therefore established a CHEMICAL LABORATORY, where we manufacture all our Medicines—for this reason we can warrant that our medicines shall do all that we promise in every case. VIII. In every case in which we promise a cure, if we fail to effect this, the money paid for medicine will be returned.

To all who wish we will furnish names and residence of patients in the city and country, whom we have treated for all forms of disease, who will give them all the facts in their case—the nature, extent, and duration of their sickness, and the success of our treatment.

We therefore invite all sufferers however afflicted, or however hopeless their case may appear, to give us a trial—put our knowledge to the test in an Examination of their case—it will cost them nothing—and they will find beyond doubt that ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which are called Consumption, Spinal disease, Cancer in the Womb, or elsewhere, &c., &c., are totally mistaken—there being nothing of the kind. This we have demonstrated in hundreds of cases.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies a honest trial.

THE DESERTED HALL.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.
BY ALLIE VERNON.

It stands 'mid noble, waving trees,
The ivy climbs the ruin'd wall,
And sounds of mirth are never heard
Within that lone, deserted hall.
Nought but the insect's joyous hum,
Or murmur of the falling leaves,
Or warbling of some wild song-bird,
Or whisp'rings of the wand'ring breeze.

And yet, loud laughter hath rung forth
Where all seems now so sad and lone,
And merrily upon the air
Hath risen music's gayest tone:
And in that hall, with joyous hearts,
And eyes bright as the midnight sky,
Fair girls have led the mazy dance,
Or breathed love's softest melody.

But where are they—those happy ones
With brows undim'd by wo or care?
Alas! no voice replies, save soft
Faint echoes answer—"Where, ah! where?"
Some lie in distant, sunny lands,
And some rest 'neath the flashing sea;
But hush'd are all the glad'ning sounds
Of youthful merriment and glee.

One was a beauteous girl, with curls
Of softest golden-tinted hair,
With deep blue eyes and fairy form,
And yet a noble, queenly air.
She seem'd too angel-like to dwell
Here, where so soon each tie is riv'n
Of love and hope:—her pallid cheek
Told that her native home was Heav'n.
They bore her to fair Italy,
'Mid sweetly blooming flowers to die;
And there she sleeps—far from her home,
Beneath an ever sunny sky.

The brother was a noble youth,
With lofty spirit, proud and free,
And yet he left his father's home,
To brave the perils of the sea.
And one dark night the waves swell'd high,
And on the gale rose, wild and shrill,
A few short prayers—the ship went down,
And all again was lone and still.

Once from that hall, too, came sweet tones,
Soft as a wand'ring angel's sigh,
Or murmur of the wind-harp's strings,
When summer zephyrs linger nigh.
The minstrel bore upon his brow
A seal of light—his heart was fill'd
With strange, wild thoughts, and when he sang,
All sounds of gaiety were still'd.

And they who watch'd his beaming eye
Thought that such strains were surely given
To him alone, by kindred ones
Who brought the wand'ring tones from Heav'n.

But he, too, left his childhood's home—
He went to seek the meed of Fame,
And hoped, ere yet he died, to twine
The brightest laurels with his name.

He found no love, and his proud heart
Beneath the world's proud scorn was crush'd;
His brow grew pure and spirit-like,
And soon the poet's song was hush'd,
They know not where the wand'r'er rests,—
He would that none should see his shame,—
But in a bright, though humble spot,
Is laid the last of that proud name.
And now no more the joyous tread
Of youthful feet on that floor fall;
The wind's low moan, the wild waves lay,
Are all the sounds in that lone hall.

Original Tales.

THE SNAKE-BITTEN.

AN OWER TRUE TALE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY OBEID OCHILTREE.

THERE is no one of the often quoted remarks which have become trite, and even vulgar, more frequently verified than that which says "Truth is stranger than fiction." Circumstances, having the most important bearing upon the fortunes of individuals and nations, many times take their origin from events of the most trivial nature. And not only are many occurrences in actual life as strange and outré in their character as any engendered in the wildest flights of a vivid imagination; but the most beautiful and touching evidence of the existence and practice of the heroic virtues every where arrest the attention of the observant. If any one, not a mere vegetable mill-horse, chooses but to open his eyes to events of almost daily occurrence around him, he need not search the pages of the novelist for examples of self-sacrificing love, disinterested generosity, or brave endurance of abuse and unkindness for years, rather than for one moment deviate from the path of duty. Many a flower unsurpassed in loveliness blooms by the way-side of the most desolate wanderer through the world, and many a gem of brightest sparkle glistens among the sands of the most dreary pilgrimage.

These remarks, none the less true because common-place, are suggested by the recollection of a train of circumstances illustrating the power of affection to induce self-forgetfulness, which occurred within the knowledge of the writer. If the narration could be made in the graphic language of an Irving or a Scott, the events would be remembered long after actors and chroniclers shall have passed away; and even in my poor way of telling the story, it may serve to amuse for a moment the readers of the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule.

Twenty years ago moving to the west was not as easy a task as it has since become. Facilities for travel were not so great that one could journey cheaper and more comfortably than he could stay at home. "Steamboats and railroads all in commotion" were comparatively unknown, and a removal of the household goods was accompanied by a tedious and slow land voyage. Heads of families infected with the "prairie fever," after disposing of articles most easily replaced, sending in boxes by way of the lakes, to remain in store at some western port until called for, the heaviest and most bulky ones, and packing into strong covered wagons those absolutely necessary on their way, and, adding to the load wives and children, would leave the old homestead to the care of strangers, or wholly deserted. From twenty-five to thirty-five miles compose the usual day's drive, and at night the tavern or private house, as the case may be, gave them shelter. Arrived at their journey's end, the rude log cabin and roughly fenced fields, but overflowing granaries, supplied the place of the thousand comforts and luxuries they had abandoned at the east. All honor to the bold, enterprising and industrious pioneers who have reared a mighty empire upon the plains of the west, whose prosperity rests upon the firm basis of agricultural pursuits, and which bids fair to be as lasting as the intelligence of the people is great.

Many years since, when the tide of emigration began to flow toward Michigan and Indiana, all accounts agreed in stating that the west was a land "flowing with milk and honey;" that pigs ran about the streets ready roasted; that crowbars stuck in the ground at night were found in the morning sprouted with "ten-penny nails;" that stalks of corn grew to the size of large trees, and turnips the size of hogheads; in short, that the west was everything, and all other places nothing in comparison—I enjoyed a “fitting” similar to those above spoken of. Comfortably seated in two stout wagons, protected from the sun and rain by ample linen awnings, a company of nine farmers journeyed by easy stages along the southern shore of Lake Erie, across the territory of Michigan, and around the southern extremity of the lake of the same name, to the most northern part of Illinois. The season was early autumn, and, notwithstanding the warmth of the weather, the journey, on the whole, was a very pleasant one.

It happened just previous to entering that terror of emigrants the “black swamp,” (and “thereby hangs a tale”) we found the public house at which we stopped for the night occupied by another party of emigrants, also seeking a home in the west. This party consisted of the families of two brothers named Hart, each containing four persons; the older brother having two sons, and the younger a son and daughter. An after intimacy of years made us acquainted with their previous history. The fathers having married and afterward constantly resided in the same neighborhood, the parties seemed more like one family than two distinct circles. James, the oldest son of the senior Hart, was a slight, pale youth of twenty-three years. He possessed an intellectual and winning expression of countenance, and had just graduated with the highest honors at one of the New England colleges. He was the betrothed of his cousin Sarah; the oldest child of the younger Hart, a fine specimen of the beautiful and intelligent farmer's daughters of New York; and as soon as they became settled in their new home, the lovers were to be united. Having grown up together from childhood, sharing each other's studies and pastimes, loving each other with an affection based on mutual esteem, their characters had become closely assimilated, and the instruction of their excellent parents had produced in them as near an approach to excellence as is consistent with human nature. The Harts were the most intelligent of the class of independent New York farmers.

This party and our own being the only guests, and as we occupied a common sitting room, a few moments sufficed to commence our re-acquaintance, and we separated at a late hour mutually gratified with the pleasant evening we had passed. It was agreed previous to retiring that we should proceed together as far as our roads were the same; but an unfortunate accident happening to one of our wagons the next morning, delayed us for a day or two, and much to our regret the Harts were obliged to go on alone. As this narrative has principally to do with James and Sarah Hart, we follow them on their way.

They passed on among the picturesque lakes and oak openings of the interior of Michigan, and through the morasses of northern Indiana, without the occurrence of any incident of importance. After leaving La Porte and the magnificent Door Prairie, however, circumstances took place which will not be forgotten during the lives of the parties concerned. An uninhabited and nearly unbroken prairie extended for thirty or forty miles to the westward from the stream called Deep River, if memory serves me rightly. Some ten or twelve miles from the western verge of the prairie stood, and doubtless still stands, a cluster of gnarled oaks, shading and surrounded by an undergrowth of oak, hazel, and hickory shrubs. A family named Brown had for a few months inhabited a miserable log hut at the point in the narrow strip of timber bounding the prairie on the west and northwest, intersected by the road. A week or two antecedent to the time of which I write, a Mr. Rice had also “squatted” in the grove some six miles northwest of the cluster of trees mentioned above.

The weather had been quite warm for two or three days previous to the arrival of the Harts at the banks of Deep River, though on the morning of their crossing the sky was slightly overcast with clouds. They arrived at the cluster of trees between one and two o'clock in the afternoon, when they halted to refresh their teams and themselves. Having chosen convenient locations, some twenty rods apart, the horses were soon removed from their traces and the teeth of men and beasts were applied to their legitimate use. I believe it is said that lovers never eat; at all events it is certain that James and Sarah preferred each other's society to the pleasure of mastication. The attraction common and irresistible in such cases drew them together, and knowing that an hour would elapse previous to resuming their journey, the lovers started off on a brisk walk, to relieve limbs wearied with long sitting.

In the meantime, the utmost cheerfulness prevailed among those surrounding the respective lunch boxes. Thus far their journey had been most prosperous. Health and joyous anticipations had from the first accompanied them. The scenery through which they had passed possessed all the charm of novelty, and the emotions with which they viewed the broad natural meadows, on one of which was to be their future abode, were inexpressibly pleasing. They were now not far distant from the spot toward which their steps had been directed, and a day or two more would see them building a new house for the beautiful affections that cluster so luxuriantly around the American Farmer's hearth-stone. With many a laugh and jovial rally the provisions were demolished, the horses re-harnessed, and their journey to the northward once more resumed.

I stated that James and Sarah had preferred a walk to their dinner. Their course was directed toward a little pond, which appeared to be but a few hundred yards distant, but which was in reality more than a mile from them. Absorbed in conversation respecting their prospects of future happiness when settled in their new abode, framing plans for self-improvement and usefulness to others, and indulging in those rosy dreams common to all lovers, the flight of time and their distance from the grove was unnoticed. Forgetful of all else, they had twice encircled the miniature lake, when James stooped to pick a little summer flower which attracted his attention.

“Oh, James,” said Sarah, “let us make a wild bouquet for mother.”

“Agreed,” replied James, and they were soon busily engaged in gathering leaves and an occasional late flower. Of course, the season for obtaining a variety was past, but here and there were to be found materials for an attention so grateful both to givers and the receiver. Thus pleasantly engaged, the hours slipped away, but the ramblers felt no uneasiness, supposing they would be called when the wagons were ready to move on. While stooping to gather a plant, James heard a rattling sound, and the next instant felt a slight puncture on the back of his hand. The fatal sound he knew but too well, and springing to his feet, he stamped upon and killed a large rattle-snake. He knew he was bitten, and the venomous nature of his wound, and a thrill of terror ran through his frame as he thought of the probable consequences of the accident. With much presence of mind and consideration for his companion's fears, he suppressed an exclamation, and holding up the reptile, said:

“See, Sarah! I have dispatched a deadly enemy.”

Although devoid of that childish fear with which such animals are regarded by most ladies, Sarah could not repress a shudder as she saw it, and cried:

“Oh, James! what if it had bitten you!”

The reality to him of what was but a supposition with her, rendered his voice unsteady as he replied:

“Never mind the matter now, Sarah. It is time to return. Let us throw away the bouquet, we cannot gather one worth while.”

For the first time since commencing their walk they turned their eyes towards the spot where their parents had dined. What was their amazement upon beholding the vehicles containing all that was most dear to them on earth, save each other, a mile or more from their halting-place, and rapidly moving to the westward! In utter astonishment, and with a burst of grief, Sarah exclaimed:

“Why, James! they are gone! What can it mean?”

Horror-struck at this addition to the embarrassments of a situation already sufficiently terrible, James could only ejaculate:—

“My God! Sarah! We are deserted! And after such an awful accident, too!” he added in a lower tone, and with a thrill of anguish. But the words did not escape the quick ears of Sarah.

“Accident, James? What do you mean?” cried she, catching his arm, and looking anxiously into his face. “You tremble and look pale—oh, tell me! is there anything more to fear? What is it, James?”

Unwilling to tell her the full extent of his misery, until forced to do so, he gazed upon her features as though it was to be his last look, pressed her convulsively to his breast, and mastering his emotion he answered:

“Nothing, nothing, dearest. Let us haste to the grove; perhaps we shall find help there of which we do not now think. Come quick!” and they moved rapidly towards the place where they had left their parents; torturing themselves with endeavors to surmise the reasons for being abandoned in the midst of a waste so dreary and desolate as the prairie now appeared to them. The unusual silence, paleness and agitation of James gave Sarah much surprise, as he was constitutionally brave and determined. As they approached the grove, his hand and arm rapidly swelled, and became more painful, and at length he could not suppress a cry of pain, as an acute pang shot through his arm to his shoulder. A sensation of faintness began to steal over him, his steps became unsteady, and he was obliged to lean on Sarah for support. These symptoms of illness could not escape her notice, and finding it useless longer to affect concealment, he held up his hand, now swollen to twice its usual size, and acquainted her with what had happened.

The blow was terrible. Deserted by their friends, left to wander without food in a waste, miles from a human habitation, her position was dreary enough; but all this was happiness, compared with the prospect now before her. The former had been endurable; but to be compelled to witness the agonies, perhaps the death, of one dearer to her than life itself, without the power to alleviate one pang; to leave his body to the tender mercies of the prowling wolf, or to bleach in the sun; all this was an accumulation of miseries almost too great for her to withstand. These thoughts passed through her brain in an instant, but the strong-minded girl bore up nobly under the infliction. Religiously educated; accustomed to fly to that only true source of consolation, she fell upon her knees and prayed to Him who is an ever-present help in time of need. She rose strengthened for the task she saw before her. There was neither romance nor childish affectation of fear in Sarah's disposition. Her strong soul at one grappled with all the evils of her position, in their worst aspect, and all that it was possible for woman to do under such circumstances, Sarah was capable of accomplishing. Her energies rose with the emergency, and with a brave heart she resolved upon the steps best calculated to avert the worst terrors of their situation.

Any attempt by one in his condition, to follow their friends on foot was madness, and her first care was to secure for him as good a shelter as possible. Whether the previous sultry weather had added virulence to the poison, or there was something in his state of health predisposing to its speedy operation, I know not, but it is certain that the spread of the virus was most rapid, and in less than an hour, the swelling had extended to his shoulder, accompanied by violent pains, and a sensation of dizziness and weakness. Exhorting him to lean heavily upon her, she carried, rather than led him to the grove, and placing him as comfortably as possible between the roots of an oak, she placed her shawl under his head, and requesting him to remain perfectly quiet until her return, she set off to execute the remainder of her purposes.

As if placed by Providence in the precise position where most needed, there are three plants growing in the west, that are said to be sure antidotes against the poison of the rattle-snake. One of these is a sure remedy, if taken in season, and although, under certain circumstances, it may not prevent a long and painful illness, fatal results seldom follow its timely application. When, a few days previously, one of these herbs was pointed out to Sarah, she little thought how soon the knowledge was to be of incalculable benefit. Taking James' knife, she sought for, found, and dug some of the roots of this plant, and induced the sufferer to eat of them freely. The leaves she crushed, and bound upon his hand. The roots are very pungent to the taste, and this fact, together with the fever which now began to blanch his cheeks, created unutterable thirst. He had no sooner spoken of this, than taking his hat, the only vessel she had, in which to bring it, the noble girl set out swiftly for the pond, and although it was necessary for her to walk more than three miles, in a very short time the fluid was at his lips. He was still suffering severe pain. Placing him in as easy a position as possible, Sarah sat down by his side, to consider what next was to be done. If it would have been of use she could have yielded to a fit of weeping, but she well knew that tears were, in this instance, of no avail.

Any attempt to reach assistance, accompanied by James, was out of the question, and it was equally certain that he would perish, if both remained where they were. Her heart prompted her to remain by his side, and watch over him till the last; but her reason told her that he could only be saved by procuring speedy help from some quarter. This she could only obtain by seeking it. Her resolution was soon taken. Covering him with a few boughs, giving him many injunctions to remain perfectly quiet, promising him a speedy return, and bidding him adieu with tears and a kiss, this young girl, tenderly nurtured, unaccustomed to toil, and heretofore guarded with the most careful solicitude, set forth, on foot, to cross a lonely prairie, the shades of night fast gathering around her, to seek for help. The approach of night had no terrors for Sarah. Every energy bent to the task of saving the life of her cousin, she had no time for the indulgence of childish fears. Anxiety of mind had as yet prevented her from feeling fatigue, and she went forward rapidly in the direction which she supposed her father and uncle had taken. Although aware of the necessity of economizing her strength, impatience frequently quickened her pace into a run, which she would continue, until obliged for want of breath to proceed more slowly. But she was traveling from her friends, instead of toward them.

I think I mentioned that a family named Rice had settled some six or eight miles to the northward of the grove where the Harts had dined. A road branched off to the right at this grove, and entered the Chicago road, near Rice's house, and this new path Sarah had unwittingly taken. Just at dusk, after five miles of alternate running and walking, which seemed to her like ten, Sarah saw before her a light, and she hastened towards it with rapture. But alas! her hopes of obtaining assistance, were doomed to disappointment. On arriving, at the house, she indeed found human beings but not capable of giving her aid. The day previous, Mrs. Rice had been taken very ill, and her husband had left for the little village of J—, some thirty miles distant, a few hours before Sarah's arrival, to procure medical advice for his wife. The latter was left to the care of his little son, ten years of age. The only team Mr. Rice possessed he had taken with him. To ask the son to leave his mother under such circumstances was not to be thought of, even if his presence would have been of use; so, taking a light blanket, some simple remedies and food, kindly furnished by Mrs. Rice, and such advice as her limited experience could suggest, poor Sarah set out on her weary return to the place where she had left her cousin. Inclement weather was not added to her other troubles, for the air was balmy and pleasant, and there was sufficient light to enable her to keep the path with ease; but fatigue was beginning to clog the willing steps of the brave maiden.

Nearly double the time was consumed by her in returning to the grove, and, if possible, a more bitter blow than any she had received awaited her arrival there, which was about three hours after leaving Mrs. Rice. With quickening steps she hastened to the tree, at whose roots she had left James, but no James was there! There, indeed, was the tree—the bushes she had gathered—the place where he had lain—but no James. The currents of blood flowed back to her heart, and left her pale, chilled, and motionless as a marble column; there was no longer a doubt of his absence. What had become of him? Had he grown impatient for her return and started to meet her? Or had he, driven by the pangs of thirst again to seek the pond, fallen exhausted upon the prairie, never more to rise? Might he not even now be near her? She rose to her feet, and listened intently, as this supposition occurred to her, for some breath or groan, but unbroken silence prevailed. Who shall describe the anguish she felt as these surmises thronged through her mind? But in all this, no thought of self sullied the pure character of the noble girl's devotion. She did not, for a moment, pause to consider, what might be to her the result of the lonely situation in which she was placed. All her efforts were directed to finding and saving him for whom she had already done so much. After standing a few minutes, listening for some sound which would reveal his presence, Sarah deposited the articles she had brought at the foot of the tree, and commenced a systematic search. She moved rapidly through all the bushes, in every direction, called his name, coupled with the most endearing epithet; and when fully convinced that he was not within the trees, she commenced encircling the grove. Two or three times she fell to the ground upon meeting a slight obstruction, but immediately rose and resumed the search. At last, however, her strength gave way, and she sank down, utterly worn out with anxiety of mind and long continued violent exercise. Canopied by the stars, and with the night winds whispering over her for a covering, she slept the sleep which buries alike senses and faculties in oblivion.

Return we to the parents who had left a son and daughter to the endurance of so much misery. It was usual with members of either family to ride for miles with the other. Sometimes the two matrons would ride for half a day together, and sometimes the young cousins had important business to transact, which could only be accomplished in concert. But these changes were most frequently made by James and Sarah. Hardly a day passed but one of them rode more or less with the other. Hence their absence either from lunch, or from the wagons on starting, did not excite surprise. Each family supposed the missing one was with the other, and no one had seen them leave the grove. The road being excellent, and the horses refreshed, the distance to Brown's was soon passed over; and the brief question from the foremost team: "Shall we go on or stop?" was answered still more brief from the other, with "Go on." About dusk they arrived at the timber, at the head of Hickory Creek.

Here the question was first asked, "Where are James and Sarah?" It was ascertained that no one had seen either of them, since stopping at noon. The most lively alarm was instantly felt by all, and the horses of their host being fortunately fresh, one of the wagons was soon equipped, and the elder Hart set out to find the wanderers. Not hearing of the missing ones at Brown's, they pushed on, and between one and two o'clock reached the little cluster of trees where they had lunched the day before. Here under the tree by the road-side where James had lain, they found the broken boughs, and a little bundle of food obtained by Sarah of Mrs. Rice. Upon striking a light the handkerchief containing the food was identified by Sarah's father. These signs led them to suppose correctly that one or both the truants must be still in the vicinity.

They accordingly entered upon a thorough search of the grove, which they accomplished much sooner than Sarah had done a few hours before. Finding no one, as she had also done, they proceeded to search around it, and at length their perseverance was rewarded by finding Sarah stretched upon the ground. After many futile efforts they succeeded in arousing her sufficiently to gather a knowledge of the leading incidents which had occurred; although it was not till long afterward that they knew the full extent of her sufferings. After making a fruitless and rapid search within a circuit of half a mile for James, they consulted among themselves as to what was next to be done. Sarah's account rendered it certain that he had not wandered far away alone. The thought of his having been disturbed by wild animals was instantly dismissed. The only conclusion left was that passing travelers had discovered and taken him with them. This opinion having been adopted, the next question was which way had he been carried. It could not have been toward Chicago, for the team would have been met by Sarah. Travelers going east would in all probability have stopped at Brown's in preference to crossing thirty miles of uninhabited prairie in the night. However, although they could not understand how a wagon could pass them unnoticed, they were driven to the conclusion, which was a just one, that James had been taken westward. They, therefore, again turned their horse's heads toward Brown's, and on arriving there soon after sunrise, found the object of their search.

A few words will suffice to show how he came there, and finish our story already grown too long.

I stated that the Harts left us in western Ohio. We frequently heard of them on the way, and as we traveled fastest, when they crossed Deep River we were but a few hours behind. We pushed on, willing to ride a few hours in the night rather than not overtake them, and reached the cluster of trees about nine in the evening. As we passed, hearing groans near the road, we sought and found their source, and from the condition of James' hand and arm, correctly surmised the nature of his accident. Fortunately, a physician was in one of the wagons, and such remedies as it was possible to administer were given on the spot. Placing him comfortably in one of the wagons, we carried him on with us.

In a little hollow to the left of the road and about eighty rods from Brown's, a little spring bubbles from the earth, and to this spring we turned for the purpose of watering the horses previous to driving to the house. While we were in this hollow, the few hurried inquiries were made of Brown by the Harts, and we heard their wagon as they drove away disappointed to the east. Upon arriving at the house the experience of Mr. Brown in similar cases was called into requisition, and before morning James had recovered his senses and told us the circumstances as far as he knew them of his mishap.

I need not pause to describe the joy of the Harts at finding him on their arrival in the morning, nor their sorrow at his critical situation. It is sufficient to say that at night the families were re-united, and that they proceeded by easy stages to their new home. For weeks and months James vibrated between life and death; but at last skillful treatment and kind nursing obtained the victory, though a year and a half elapsed before he recovered his wonted health. A fever of several week's duration was the consequence to Sarah of her noble self-devotion. To her presence of mind in promptly administering the antidote does James attribute the preservation of his life. They have now been married many years, and in his deportment toward her may be seen the evidence of respect for her estimable qualities of mind, love for her virtues, and daily gratitude for the many happy years she has been instrumental in adding to his life.

A FINE PASSAGE.—The celebrated Robert Hall one day attended church, where a young minister preached on some public occasion. It so happened, that the preacher met Mr. Hall afterwards, at dinner, at the house of a mutual friend. The young man was very anxious to hear Mr. Hall's opinion of his discourse, and very pertinaciously plied the great man with questions respecting it. Hall endured the annoyance for some time with great patience. He did not wish to hurt the young man's feelings; but he could not conscientiously laud his sermon. At length, worried beyond endurance, he said: "Well, sir, there was one fine passage, and I liked it much, sir, much." The young divine rubbed his hands in high glee, and pressed Mr. Hall to name it. "Why, sir," replied Hall, "the passage I allude to, was your passage from the pulpit to the vestry."

Sketches of Character.

THE MARQUISE DU CHATELET.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH FOR THE GAZETTE AND RULE.

Mme. la Marquise du Chatelet was endowed with a graceful, and well proportioned figure; her gait was majestic, yet elastic. Of her moral qualities we shall soon realize a just conception. Voltaire first became acquainted with her, when she was but twelve years of age, about the year 1718. For many years he lost sight of her, then in 1733 his friend, M. d'Aigueberre, counselor of the parliament of Toulouse, made him renew his acquaintance with her. At that period she had been married eight years, her father Baron de Breteuil, having given her in marriage to a descendant of one of the most ancient houses in Lorraine, and a lieutenant in the king's army: this was the Marquis du Chatelet, and for whom his wife always entertained the greatest indifference. Out of revenge she fell in love with the Duke de Richelieu, and still retained him in her snares, when Voltaire came in contact with her. To enthral such a great genius, could she have been wanting in charms, superior to all other women? She was beautiful and perfectly devoted—knew perfectly the dead languages and had commenced a translation of Virgil; had written lectures upon the ancient authors, and the writers of the age of Louis XIV. and was possessed of an elegant style, united to a masculine vigor. In fine, a good musician, speaking and declaiming with a dignified address, she did not fail to inspire Voltaire with a durable affection. This illustrious man was in his thirtieth year, when he commenced living with Mme. du Chatelet on terms of innocent intimacy. She and her most intimate friend the Duchesse de Saint Pierre, often visited him in his humble lodgings, opposite to Saint Gervais, and would boldly tell him that they came to sup with him. For a long time Voltaire would not avow to himself the charm that he experienced in this society.

He would converse with them in terms of enthusiasm, but defended himself from entertaining for la marquise any other sentiment but that pure friendship. At what period did this illusive sentiment cease? When was it replaced by the real? Truly towards the end of 1733. The marquise, with the strength of first impressions, loved fervently, and without any thought of the future. She even had the frankness, to avow to her ancient admirer the Duke de Richelieu, "I have never had a true passion," she wrote to him, "except that which is at present the charm, and the torment of my life, my good and my evil spirit." The influence of Voltaire upon Mme. du Chatelet was as extensive as it was rapid. She learned many of the living languages, the English among others. These varied talents recommend her but the more to the affection of her friend and strengthened the bonds of their love. He wrote to Thierot, "that Mme. du Chatelet came to the side of his bed and read to him the Tusculanes of Cicero in the original, and afterwards the first epistle of Pope upon virtue. If you know any woman in Paris," he continues "who can do the like, let me know of it." There is no doubt that if this mode of existence could have continued, without any modification, Voltaire would have enjoyed the highest amount of earthly happiness, if happiness were compatible with a liaison which morality would deprecate: but they lived in a country in which they were not free from the scope of public opinion, or the persecutions of a government. Thus for instance, he feared being instantly cast into prison by writing his letters upon the English, if he had not immediately quitted France. He then accepted of an asylum in the ancient chateau of Mme. du Chatelet at Cirey in Champagne.

This old fortress had been for a long time deserted, and was almost uninhabitable; but the situation was very beautiful, being placed on the side of a gentle rising hill, upon the top of which was a chapel, and surrounded with trees. At the foot of this hill a clear, serpentine stream glided along the skirts of a wood, and in its limpid transparency, reflected the graceful forms of the swans, that despoiled themselves upon its placid bosom.

There, in violation of all the laws of decorum, Mme. du Chatelet shortly joined Voltaire. Love overcame her better judgment, and much as she loved the world, she did not hesitate in renouncing it entirely. She decided on inhabiting Cirey, and Voltaire, (who must be blamed for participating in her indiscretion,) wishing that this residence were more worthy of his friend, got her to furnish the chateau in an exquisitely superb style. Upon the door of her cabinet, he wrote these words, "Refuge of the arts, solitude, where my heart is ever filled with a profound peace: it is you who have given me that happiness, which the world deny." And upon the door of a turret he wrote, "Behold my lot, repose, freedom from care, or ennui, a few books, and a friend, in my solitude." Such were the pleasures of Cirey; love being the principal and most agreeable occupation—Voltaire and the marquise would write to one another, many times in the day, without quitting their chambers. From this period date all the poems of Voltaire, in which he celebrates the talents, graces, and virtues, of her, whom he loved. One day he wrote to her, "you ask me to write to you, but the love which my hand, has placed all its strength in my bosom, and directs me to tell you so." On an other occasion, when they were walking in the gardens of Cirey, by the clear light, of the summer moon, he improvised these lines:

"Brilliant satellite, favorable to lovers, shed here all the gleams of thy sweet clear light; thou canst not open, in thy vast career, two hearts, more loving, tender, or constant." Voltaire, as we see, lost no opportunity of displaying his gallantry. The following is a curious instance of it.

Having employed Barrier to engrave his likeness upon some fine stones, he sent them with the following words to his friend: "Barrier has cut these lines destined for your eyes, perhaps you will recognise them; your likeness has been engraved upon my heart much better, but it was by a greater master." It would take up too much space, if we were to give all the different poetical effusions with which the marquise inspired Voltaire. We resist that pleasure, as we know that the most part of these poems are well known. Our readers will pardon us, in our preferring to give a description of the customs, and manners, at the chateau de Cirey. At ten, or eleven, in the morning, the friends met in the gallery of the chateau, and took coffee together; and then took another repast at about nine in the evening. There was a mid-day meal for M. du Chatelet, when he arrived at the chateau, with friends or visitors, which was but rarely. When there were visitors, the supper was generally prolonged until after midnight; the marquis however would retire after the dessert—so we see that he was a very accommodating husband. When he was gone, the conversation took a more animated tone, and the marquise as well as Voltaire indemnified themselves with long hours of interesting conversation, in the silence of their study, and often interrupting the most serious discourse, with some piquante pleasantry; sometimes it was poetry, and at others prose; in general Voltaire read in the evening, what he had composed in the day. Voltaire delighted in giving theatrical representations—he formed a corps of actors among the visitors, &c. &c. and even the servants had parts allotted to them. He also got a small theatre constructed, and for the most part it was his own pieces which were played; thus the public of Cirey had the good fortune to witness his most beautiful dramatic productions. While residing at the chateau, Voltaire composed among others his fine tragedy, the Death of Cesar. He also occupied himself with history and had commenced to write the Age of Louis XIV. and an essay on Customs. On her part, Mme. du Chatelet made frequent excursions into the domains of history and even of philosophy; it was for her that Voltaire composed this latter work, and she published "Doubts upon Religion," which insisted upon the assistance of logic, in the spirit of examination.

But the sciences captivated her most. For a long time she was engaged in writing a commentary on Newton,—and composed, for the particular instruction of her son, her Physical Institutions—in fact she attracted around her all those who were skilled in science, mathematics or physics, such as Maupertius, with whom she entered into a correspondence—Bernouille, the brothers Kœnig, his disciples, who passed two years at Cirey, and Clairaut, who contributed in turning Voltaire from his scientific career, in which the marquise wished him to continue. From her love for physical science, this woman, (whose disposition was a little despotic,) combated with Voltaire, without ceasing, on account of his penchant for history, poetry, and philosophy. One day when conversing with M^{me} de Graffigny, about the "Age of Louis XIV." and M^{me} du Chatelet endeavored to prevent his continuing it he replied, "I most assuredly will finish it, but certainly not while at Cirey." From that time forward he was, entirely engaged in physics and got up a laboratory under the superintendence of a chemist. The celebrated Nollet undertook the purchase of his instruments. He repeated all the experiments of Homberg, and Lemeris, and even wrote a work on caloric, for competition of the prize of the Academy of science. He wrote this work during the night, without the knowledge of M^{me} du Chatelet, who was herself writing a treatise on the same subject, most mysteriously during the night, and which she sent in also to compete for the prize. Neither of them obtained the crown, but an honorable mention was made of them.

Maupertius being consulted by the two competitors, preferred Mme. du Chatelet's treatise to that of Voltaire. The life of Voltaire during the six years that he resided at Cirey was not always tranquil—subjects of annoyance came turn by turn. His calumniators enraged by the pursuit of their prey, harassed him to a degree, and Mme. de Graffigny, who admired all his good qualities, his talents, his docility to critics, &c., &c., could not help saying, "one word from his enemies puts him in despair. I cannot give you an idea of this folly, except that it is as miserable as his genius is expanded."

But then on the other hand, the furious clamors made against him by men who only wore the mask of religion, afforded him a good opportunity to grieve. When he published a new work, these hypocritical devotees uttered howls of despair. He was twice obliged to fly from France; once in 1734, a little after the publication of his letters on the English, and again in 1736, when his work "Du Mondain" appeared. During both those absences, Mme. du Chatelet entertained a perfect love for him, and showed herself worthy of the affection which the poet had for her. In December 1734, she writes to the Comte d'Argental, "it is now fifteen days since I have heard from, and I know not where he is. I even have not the sad consolation of sharing his misfortunes."

The reason of Voltaire's not writing was through the fear of putting the government agents upon his track, which would be certain as they had control of the post offices. During his absence in 1736, the same silence—the same regrets. At last Voltaire returned.

But still Mme. du Chatelet was the cause of tribulation to him. Either of their characters was very irascible, and she constantly had quarrels, such as close up the ears to all reason and self-respect. These quarrels alone were not the cause of his mental depression, a stronger motive for uneasiness constantly tormented him—that was jealousy. Under the pretense of solving scientific problems, Mme. du Chatelet would shut herself up for hours in her library with C. Clairaut. This mode of study did not please her friends; on one evening having informed the marquise and the savant of supper being awaiting them, at last, boiling with impatience, he kicked in the door of her study, and then returned in a rage.

Mme. du Chatelet has accused him of having ceased to love her. We do not believe that accusation just. Voltaire was in bad health, and broken down in a manner by age, and excessive traveling, and could not be expected to return the warm loving tenderness of youth. To certain reproaches he replied thus sadly: "If you wish me to love still, give me back my age of love, &c., &c." But he was not the less attached to his friend; one of his nieces, Mme. Denis, saw him at Cirey, and struck by the manner in which he loved Emilie, she wrote to Thierot, "I really believe that he has lost himself for his friends."

In fact, Voltaire had resisted all the offers of princes, rejected a magnificent position in Russia, and had sacrificed all the advantages which awaited him at the court of Frederick, prince royal of Prussia. In order to get him into his toils, he commenced to flatter his tastes, and the retreat which he had chosen at Cirey. He thus writes to Voltaire relative to his liaison: "Do not fear that I shall attempt to interrupt or mar the pleasures of your philosophical repose; on the contrary, with my hands I would cement more strongly the bonds of your divine union, I would willingly offer their assistance." To these compliments Mme. du Chatelet replied with charming letters. The prince made presents of amber pens, and the gifts of the friends in return were equal to those of Frederick. He even went so far as to send an ambassador, his favorite, M. de Kaiserling, whom Voltaire had sur-named Cesarion. They received him with royal honors, and brilliantly illuminated the chateau—lamps inscribed with the cipher of Frederick were so placed as to form around his name the following device: "The delight of the human race." In the evening there were spectacles in the theater. M. de Kaiserling was delighted and surprised with all, but was more enchanted with the marquise than all the rest. He wrote to Frederick, "When I speak to Mme. du Chatelet, I am in love with her genius, but when she does not speak I am entranced with her appearance." Toward the commencement of 1739, Mme. du Chatelet, wishing to reside for some months of the year in Paris, purchased the Hotel Lambert, built by one of the greatest architects in France, and painted by Le Brun and Lesueur; it was also arranged that Voltaire should have apartments in it.

But owing to all her fortune being sunk in a lawsuit in Holland, she was obliged to postpone the execution of her project. They then resided at the chateau de Bérighen, (a property which was willed to the marquise,) and afterwards they went to Brussels, where Voltaire entertained his friend with a magnificent fete, at which the Prince de Chimay and the Duc d'Arenberg assisted. Frederick finding him near, even ventured to hint what happiness it would confer upon him, if he were to see Voltaire at Berlin. But Voltaire did not desire to leave his friend. Frederick then reproached him for sacrificing friendship to love, to which Voltaire replied, in allusion to his feeble health, "You do too much honor to my perseverance, but learn the nature of the real bonds by which my heart is tied; but alas! I am now of that age when a man's mind is balanced between love and friendship." But Frederick did not comprehend his feelings, he supposed that Voltaire no longer loved Madame du Chatelet, and increased his importunities to induce him to visit Berlin. Voltaire, at last, promised to make a short visit, but stipulated that he should be accompanied by his friend. In answer to this proposition, Frederick, putting all gallantry aside, replied, "It is you, my friend, whom I desire to see, the divine Emilie is but a Newtonian Venus." Then in another letter, rallying Voltaire on his inseparability, he says, "I should prefer to see you alone, I would be too much dazzled, and would require the veil of Moses to temper the brilliant rays, emanating from two such divinities." Voltaire set out for Berlin alone. Again, in 1743, he undertook another journey to Prussia. From letters to Madame du Chatelet, we can perceive that this separation grieved him, he writes to his friend Madame de Chambonin, "I am at a distance, but my heart is always near her whom I love." Some time after his return, he accompanied his friend to Fontainebleau; it was on the occasion of the marriage of the Dauphin.

Here Mme. du Chatelet wanted for nothing, as regards balls, amusements, &c. &c. In this extraordinary woman, study did not absorb her love of the world. When her mind was even most seriously engaged, she still had a place in it for all inanities of a woman of the world. One of the amusements which she loved most was gambling, and one night at play, lost more than eighty thousand francs to the queen. Voltaire, indignant at her folly, said to her softly in English "your love of gambling prevents you from seeing that you are playing with cheats." These imprudent words were overheard, and the queen having been informed of them, apprised Voltaire herself, that he should retire from court. The philosopher went, and passed some time at the little court of Secan, with the Princess du Maine. While there, Mme. du Chatelet arrived, and informed him that the affair had been arranged and that she had paid the debt. They then returned once more to their retreat, to enjoy the repose of study and the sweet calmness of the soul,—and thus passed the winter in a solitude "frightful to humanity," says Mme. Denis.

In the spring they made an agreeable excursion. Stanislaus, king of Poland, not being able to retain his crown, had gone to reside at Luneville, in Lorraine, where he held an agreeable court. He had much bonhomie politeness, simplicity, &c. &c. but his court was not free from intrigues. One is not astonished at that, but then he had a jesuit!—this reverend father, confessor of the king, was jealous of the influence of the Marquise de Boufflours, the mistress of this prince. Not being able to induce his royal penitent to renounce his habit of making love to her, he resolved to replace her. For this purpose he cast his eyes on the friend of Voltaire. He told them that the king desired to see them at his court, and to the king he said, that Voltaire and his friend wished beyond measure to visit Luneville, so upon a most agreeable invitation they set out. They arrived, and far from these two women endeavoring to injure one another, they formed a friendship, Voltaire, and the marquise conceived for Mme. de Boufflours a real attachment. She was a woman of easy manners, but charming, and more spirituelle than beautiful. She also had a confessor, but he did not prevent her from accepting attentions from Saint Lambert, a captain in the Lorraine guards. This confessor Parquet, was a man of talent and had composed many songs in honor of his "fair penitent." With people of this kind, Voltaire and the marquise did not lack the enjoyment of intellectual society. As the season advanced they repaired to Paris, where Mme. du Chatelet was for some time ill, and most unfortunately during her convalescence, she had the imprudence to drink some iced orgeat, which was attended with fatal consequences—in some time after she died. This was a severe blow to the affections of Voltaire; his grief was poignant. When leaving the chamber where the remains of his friend lay, he fell, overcome with emotion. In writing to D'Argental, he says, "it is not a mistress whom I have lost, it is a part of myself." We do not mean to praise the customs of a corrupt age. A just historian will eulogise the virtues of those who have been conspicuous by their genius, but he will also stigmatise their vices; happy however, for the friends of Voltaire's memory, that his virtues, and good qualities, far outweigh his faults.

THE existence of the mind, or the soul, is as certain as any other known thing. That the body and the soul are not one, or the same, is as demonstrable a truth, as that fire and water are not identical; or that the sun and the earth are not the same thing. The body moves from place to place, grows by eating matter, is subject to certain forms, color heat and pain. The mind, or soul thinks of the future; remembers the past; collects facts, forms theories, has neither, color, heat, nor form. In a word, mind and body, of all known things, have fewest properties in common. If, then, there be in all nature two distinct entities, they are soul and matter. But gross, untinging matter, is composed of elements which are imperishable—in other words, matter is everlasting. How much more, then, is the ethereal thinking soul immortal!—[Simms.]

GOODNESS OF HEART is man's best treasure, his brightest honor, and noblest acquisition. It is that ray of the Divinity which dignifies humanity.

Legends of the Holy Land.

STORY OF DAVID EL-ROY.

Ten years ago there arose a man of the name of David El-Roy, of the city of Amaria, who had studied under the prince of the captivity, Chisdai, and under Eli, the president of the college of Geon Jacob in the city of Bagdad, and who became an excellent scholar, being well versed in the Mosaic law in the decisions of the rabbins, and in the Talmud; understanding also the profane sciences, the language and the writings of the Mohammedans, and the scriptures of the magicians and enchanters. He made up his mind to rise in rebellion against the king of Persia, to unite and collect the Jews who live in the mountains of Chaphton, and with them to engage in war with all Gentiles, making the conquest of Jerusalem his final object. He gave signs to the Jews by false miracles, and assured them, "the Lord has sent me to conquer Jerusalem, and to deliver you from the yoke of the Gentiles." Some of the Jews did believe in him, and called him Messiah.

When the king of Persia became acquainted with these circumstances, he sent and summoned David into his presence. The latter went without fear, and when brought before the court he was asked, "Art thou the king of the Jews?" to which he made answer and said, "I am." Upon this the king immediately commanded that he should be secured and put into the prison where the captives are kept who are imprisoned for life, situated in the city of Dabaristan, on the banks of the Kizil Ozein, which is a broad river.

After a lapse of three days, when the king sat in council to take the advice of his nobles and officers respecting the Jews who had rebelled against his authority, David appeared among them, having liberated himself from prison without human aid. When the king beheld him he inquired, "Who has brought thee hither, or who has set thee at liberty?" To which David made answer, "My own wisdom and subtlety; for verily I fear neither thee nor thy servants." The king immediately commanded that he should be seized, but his servants answered and said: "We see him not, and are aware of his presence only by hearing the sound of his voice."

The king was very much astonished at David's exceeding subtlety, who thus addressed him; "I now go my own way;" and he went out, followed by the king and all his nobles and servants to the banks of the river, where he took his shawl, spread it upon the water, and crossed it thereupon. At that moment he became visible, and all the servants of the king saw him cross the river on his shawl. He was pursued by them in boats, but without success, and they all confessed that no magician upon earth could equal him. He that very day traveled to Amaria, a distance of ten days' journey, by the help of the Shem Hamphorash, and related to the astonished Jews all that had happened to him. The king of Persia afterwards sent to the Emir-el-Mumenin, the khalif of Bagdad, principal of the Mohammedans, to solicit the influence of the prince of the captivity, and of the presidents of the colleges, in order to check the proceedings of David El-Roy, and threatening to put to death all Jews who inhabited his empire. The congregations of Persia were very severely dealt with about that time, and sent letters to the prince of the captivity and the presidents of the colleges at Bagdad to the following purpose: "Why will you allow us to die, and all the congregations of this empire? Restrain the deeds of this man, and prevent thereby the shedding of innocent blood."

The prince of the captivity and the presidents of the colleges hereupon addressed David in letters which run thus: "Be it known unto thee that the time of our redemption has not yet arrived, and that we have not yet seen the signs by which it is to manifest itself, and that by strength no man shall prevail. We therefore command thee to discontinue the course thou hast adopted, on pain of being excommunicated from all Israel." Copies of these letters were sent to Sakhai, the prince of the Jews in Mosul, and to R. Joseph the astronomer, who is called Borhan-al-Fulkh, and also resides there, with the request to forward them to David El-Roy. The last mentioned prince and the astronomer added letters of their own, in which they advised and exhorted him; but he nevertheless continued in his criminal career. This he carried on until a certain prince of the name of Sin-el-Din, a vassal of the king of Persia, and a Turk by birth, cut it short by sending for the father-in-law of David El-Roy, to whom he offered ten thousand florins if he would secretly kill David El-Roy. This agreement being concluded, he went to David's house while he slept, and killed him on his bed, thus destroying his plans and evil designs. Notwithstanding this, the wrath of the king of Persia still continued against the Jews who lived in the mountains and in his country, who in their turn craved the influence of the prince of the captivity with the king of Persia. Their petitions and humble prayers were supported by a present of one hundred talents of gold, in consideration of which the anger of the king of Persia was subdued, and the land was tranquillized.

THE DEVIL'S HEAD IN THE PERILOUS VALLEY.

Near that isle of Mistorak, upon the left side, nigh to the river of Pison, is a marvelous thing. There is a vale between the mountains which extends nearly four miles; and some call it the Enchanted Vale, some call it the Vale of Devils, and some the Perilous Vale. In that vale men hear oftentimes great tempests and thunders, and great murmurs and noises, day and night; and great noise, as it were, of labors, and nakers, and trumpets, as though it were of a great feast. This vale is all full of devils, and has been always; and men say there that it is one of the entrances of hell. In that vale is great plenty of gold and silver; wherefore many misbelieving men, and many Christians also, oftentimes go in, to have of the treasure; but few return, especially of the misbelieving men, for they are anon strangled by the devils. And in the center of that vale, under a rock, is a head and the visage of a devil bodily, full horrible and dreadful to see, and it shows but the head to the shoulders. But there is no man in the world so bold, Christian or other, but he would be in dread to behold it, and he would feel almost dead with fear, so hideous is it to behold. For he looks at every man so sharply with dreadful eyes, that are ever moving and sparkling like fire, and changes and stirs so often in divers manners, with so horrible a countenance, that no man dare approach towards him. And from him issues smoke, and stink, and fire, and so much abomination that scarce any man may endure there. But the good Christians, that are stable in their faith, enter without peril; for they will first shrive them, and mark them with the sign of the holy cross, so that the fiends have no power over them. But although they are without peril, yet they are not without dread when they see the devils visibly and bodily all about them, that make full many divers assaults and menaces, in air and on earth, and terrify them with strokes of thunder blasts and of tempests. And the greatest fear is that God will take vengeance then of that which men have misdone against his will.

And you shall understand that when my fellows and I were in this vale, we were in great thought whether we durst put our bodies in adventure, to go in or not, in the protection of God; and some of our fellows agreed to enter, and some not. So there were with us two worthy men, friars minors of Lombardy, who said that if any man would enter they would go in with us; and when they had said so, upon the gracious trust of God and of them, we heard mass and every man was shriven and housled: and then we entered, fourteen persons, but at our going out we were but nine. And so we never knew whether our fellows were lost, or had turned back for fear; but we never saw them after. They were two men of Greece and three of Spain. And our other fellows, that would not go in with us, went by another road to be before us; and so they were. And thus we passed that Perilous Vale, and found therein gold and silver, and precious stones, and rich jewels, in great plenty, both here and there, as it seemed; but whether it was as it seemed I knew not, for I touched none; because the devils are so subtle to make a thing to seem otherwise than it is, to deceive mankind; and therefore I touched none; and also because that I would not be put out of my devotion, for I was more devout then than ever I was before or after, and all for the dread of fiends that I saw in divers figures; and also for the great multitude of dead bodies that I saw there lying by the way, in all the vale, as though there had been a battle between two kings, and the mightiest of the country, and that the greater party had been discomfited and slain. And I believe that hardly should any country have so many people in it as lay slain in that vale, as it seemed to us, which was a hideous sight to see. And I marvelled much that there were so many, and the bodies all whole, without rotting; but I believe that fiends made them seem to be so fresh, without rotting. And many of them were in habits of Christian men; but I believe they were such as went in for covetousness of the treasure that was there, and had overmuch feebleness in faith; so that their hearts might not endure in the belief for dread. And therefore we were the more devout a great deal; and yet we were cast down and beaten down many times to the hard earth by winds, and thunders, and tempests; but evermore God of his grace helped us. And so we passed that perilous vale without peril and without encumbrance, thanked be almighty God!

The Altar.

ALL IS VANITY.

What are riches? But a bubble.
What is fame? But toil, trouble.
What is genius? 'Tis a spark
That soon grows dark.

What is beauty? But a flower.
What is love? An April shower.
What is friendship? 'Tis the fly
Just born to die.

What are honors? Empty spoil.
What is learning? Labor, toil,
What is youth? An unspun thread;
And how soon shred!

What is language? Empty breath.
What is age? Herald of death.
What is time? One moment see Forerunner of Eternity.

COMPENSATIONS.—Do you not perceive, then, that evil is necessary for the development of good: can you say that misery is not essential for happiness? Illness is the exception to health, yet what should we know of health unless illness existed to indicate it? If at this moment you were on a sick-bed, your condition would induce pity from your friends—virtue again emanating from evil. They would do all in their power to ease your sufferings—kindness, another virtue, is thus manifested. You would feel grateful for their attention—gratitude, you see, springs up! If you bear your affliction with fortitude—again good arises! If, on the contrary, you are impatient, those around you re-irritate you—goodness again emanates from the same soil! At length you become stronger, and then, being slightly ailing, you feel comparatively happy—thus happiness has absolutely arisen from that which, in its positive nature, is an evil; and the very affliction which made you grieve, is, by a slight modification, not altering its original nature, a subject for congratulation and pleasure! Thus, Alfred, depend upon it, however we may doubt the perfection of the laws of the Creator, all is completely in accordance with benevolent design; and when you complain of the existence of evil in the world, you complain of the very element which develops goodness. —[Affection.]

BEAUTIFUL THOUGHT.—The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun. The brightness of our life is gone. Shadows of evening fall around us, and the world seems but a dull reflection—itself a broader shade. We look forward into the coming lonely night. The soul withdraws into itself. The stars arise, and the night is holy.

Ladies' Department.

A PACKET OF SWEETS.

How sweet is life! its varied joys, to all the human race,
And sweet to man is woman's form, adorn'd with beauty's grace;
'Tis sweet to press her ruby lip, and gaze upon her eye;
'Tis sweet to clasp her in his arms, and on her bosom lie.
'Tis sweet unto the lover's ear, to hear her vow of love;
'Tis sweet to know her constancy, which naught on earth can move;
'Tis sweet to see her innocence, when at the altar's side;
'Tis sweet to hear her tremulous voice proclaim that she's his bride.
'Tis sweet to see a mother smile while gazing on her son;
'Tis sweet to feel her joy of heart when first he tries to run;
'Tis sweet to listen to her voice pour blessings on her child;
'Tis sweet to watch her train his mind to love in accents mild;
'Tis sweet to look upon her face when he from school returns;
'Tis sweet to know her pride of soul while he for knowledge burns;
'Tis sweet to give her every praise when he becomes the man;
'Tis sweet to think a mother's love rear'd him in virtue's plan;
'Tis sweet to prove her tender care in sickness or in health;
'Tis sweet to have her blessing, too, in poverty or wealth.
'Tis sweet to die upon her breast, to man in mercy sent.
These sweets to know, to feel, to taste; who would not die content?

LOVE IN THE YELLOW LEAF.

THE following extract from Frederika Bremer's "Sun at Midnight—a Pilgrimage," gives a view of love at a period much neglected by novel writers. We are indebted for it to a Review in Douglas Jerrold's News, where it is well headed "better late than never." One might almost say, after reading it, better late than ever:

The colonel, who for the last few minutes had been going about seeking Miss —, found her at length resting from her labors, upon a mole hill by the river's side, and alone without the Dean's widow. The colonel seated himself upon another mole-hill near her, and said:

"You have showed kindness toward man and beast. I shall now see whether you will also show kindness to me."

Miss — looked at the speaker rather surprised, because there was a something solemn in his tone, and agitated in his appearance, which was not common. He continued:

"I have always thought that you were a witty and amusing person, but never until to-day understood how good you are. Yes," continued the colonel, with the paleness of gentle emotion on his handsome and honest countenance, "yes—there is not, indeed, much to offer—an old man, and sometimes ailing; but nevertheless, if an honest heart, and honest desire to make you happy, are of any value to you, and if you will make a man—precisely the one whom you see here before you, immeasurably happy, then—take me! Take together with my hand, my heart, everything that I possess and love."

And he extended his hand to Miss — with an expression of heartfelt kindness.

Miss — sat and heard, and gazed at the colonel with increasing amazement, and could not believe her eyes and ears. At length she burst into a hearty fit of laughter.

"But tell me, my dear colonel," exclaimed she, "are you quite sure of your senses? You have assuredly had a coup de soleil?"

"Now only see," said the colonel, "you are laughing at me. That is just what I might have expected. But never mind. You may laugh at me if you will, only believe me, and—have me."

Out of my senses! Never in all my days was I more rational than I am at this very moment."

"Do you regard me, then, as being insane?"
"Yes, but only because you think me so—think that I had a coup de soleil. Shall I take my oath that I know what I say, and what I wish?"

"But have you then no eyes?" exclaimed Miss —; "do you not see that I am old, an old person above fifty?"

"How old am I, then?" said the colonel; "not far from sixty. And yet I can venture to woo, and make a laughing-stock of myself before the laughter-loving people, and perhaps get refused into the bargain. But all that I have done with a full knowledge, and entirely on purpose because I now know how really good you are, and because I feel that though I am old and infirm, yet that my heart is nevertheless young, and that I can love both fervently and faithfully. And though you are old, too, yet that is all the better because we shall grow old together at the same time that we preserve our hearts young. And after all, there is a pretty little bit of life still before us at our age; perhaps ten years, perhaps twenty, perhaps more. My father's mother had completed her hundredth year before she died, and she was active to the last. And it makes a great difference whether a man goes on his way by himself, and sees how the shadows gather around him, and he becomes more and more lonely; or whethertwo go together, partaking of each other's pleasure, or pain; being together early or late, at breakfast in the morning, by the fireside in the evening, shortening for each other the long winter evenings, the long time of shadows; reading with and to one another, laughing with and at one another; that's very good when people like each other, and above everything go on liking one another."

"Look! now it is evening and the sun is going down; but it is still warm and bright, and, though it descends, it does not set. Can it not be the same with the love of the old, with the friendship between a faithful married couple in the evening of life? And the deuce take me, if I do not love you so much that I once more make myself a laughing-stock to you. Yes, laugh at me as much as you like, but take my hand as you have taken my heart. Look there."

"You know very well, colonel," said Miss — as a couple of bright tears fell from her beautiful brown eyes, "you know very well that you are the most persuasive person that I know."

"Am I?" exclaimed the colonel, "nay, only look! I did not know that. Then I must be over-persuasive, also, and you must give me your hand. Else I shall fancy that you are afraid of my plexus, or that you look upon me as having had altogether a coup de soleil."

"It is a great piece of folly!" said Miss —. "But you have actually over-persuaded me, and inspired me with the belief that we may become a happy couple. And in that case the world may laugh at me as it pleases. Let it be!"

"You are divine," exclaimed the colonel delighted. "Oh, yes, let them laugh who will and let us be happy and laugh at them again. Let us live at Sveanevik, and there we will plant that herb which is called old love, and which blossoms late in the autumn, and keeps green even amid the snow. Then you shall help me to live well, and to make both animals and human beings happy. And, when you wind your tangled skeins during the long winter evenings, I will read to you, and the skein of life shall run for us like a play; and if at any time there comes a knot in the thread, why then—we will take snuff together."

Miss — laughed, half affected to tears, and half amused and quite edified by the colonel's talent for talking, but nevertheless with an uneasy glance for herself.

I saw her, with the light of womanhood
Spread o'er the childish charms I loved so well—
I heard her voice, sweet with the trustful tones
She spoke with long ago, yet richer grown
With the full burden of her ripened thoughts.

LADIES AT CHURCH. — Somebody says that females go to meeting to look at each other's bonnets. That's downright scandal! They go to show their own.

ON THE QUEEN OF BOHEMIA.

BY SIR HENRY WOTTON.

You meaner beauties of the night,
That poorly satisfy our eyes
More by your number than your light—
You common people of the skies,
What are you when the moon shall rise?

Ye violets, which first appear,
By your pure purple mantels known,
Like the proud virgins of the year,
As if the spring were all your own,
What are you when the rose is blown?

Ye curious chaunters of the wood,
That warbles forth Dame Nature's lays,
Thinking your passions understood
By your weak accents, what's your praise
When Philomel her voice shall raise?

So when my mistress shall be seen
In sweetness of her looks and mind—
By virtue first, by choice a queen—
Tell me if she was not design'd
The eclipse and glory of her kind?

Percy's Reliques of Ancient Poetry.

MADAME DE MAINTENON.

THIS remarkable woman united in her person all sorts of destinies and contradictions, virtues and vices. She was a wife without marriage, a protestant and a catholic, a king's mistress without love, a queen without title, born in a prison, she descended from a throne to die in a convent.

Frances d'Aubigne was her maiden name. She was born in the prison of Nionet, where she was early carried to Martinique, where her parents died, and she was left a Huguenot orphan in the hands of Catholic aunts.

On the very steps of the jail where she was born, her pride and ambition were aroused. "You are not rich enough to have a service of plate like me," said the jailer's daughter. "True," replied the little d'Aubigne, "but I am a lady, and you are not."

After her return to France from Martinique, she grew up in solitude. Her reign, she used to say, commenced in the farm-yard, where, with her straw hat on her head, a rod in her hand, and basket on her arm, she was sent to watch turkeys, with a prohibition against touching her basket until she had got by heart four verses of Pibrac.

Ere long, the little turkey-herd was brought to Paris and introduced to Scarron. In making her debut among the wits of whom Scarron was the center, she shed tears. Her dress was too short! She felt humbled in the dignity of her toilet. Scarron wiped away the tears of the pretty West Indian, as he called the little d'Aubigne, and married her. The comic poet was then quite a recluse. He lived on his sofa, never sleeping, always laughing. With him physical suffering was turned into a joke. When Mad'le d'Aubigne, then but seventeen, was asked why she married this living corpse, this laughing machine, she replied, "I preferred marriage to a convent."

It was in fact merely the appearance of marriage that the lady had in view, as a cloak for greater liberty in society.

The fortune which Scarron settled upon his wife, was described by the marriage contract to be "four louis in the funds, two large roguish eyes, a fine chest, a beautiful pair of hands and considerable wit." The husband lived on his poetry, an intermittent pension and a small living in some abbey or other. Nevertheless, Madame Scarron gave dinners to the highest nobility of the realm. The dishes often failed, but the wit made up the deficiency. On such occasions the domestic would whisper to the mistress, "Another story, madame, there is not much roast meat to-day." That witty age could dine on three courses with anecdotes.

It was thus by the side of the perpetual death bed of the most sinister wit, that Madame de Maintenon developed those powers of understanding and conversation, and that useful knowledge which led to her high destiny. In this short period she formed all sorts of acquaintances from that of the Marshal d'Albert to Ninon d' l'Enclos. From the celebrated courtesan she learned the art of pleasing, which she refused to practice. Ninon thought this a weakness. But Madame de Maintenon was not only virtuous by temperament, but by system and ambition.

Lovely, beloved, witty, always serious, even in her pleasantries, yielding the perfume but never the flower, she only studied to seduce the affections. The smile always floated on the surface, the depth remained frozen. It was this severity, this interior melancholy, covered with all the graces of conversation, which gave its character to the face of Madame de Maintenon, and distinguished her from all the women of her age, made her the strong woman of the court.

Scarron died, or as he himself said in his epitaph, took his first night's sleep. His widow remained poor, proud and independent amid his friends. She administered with such ability upon the moderate resources of his estate, that she disclosed to no one the slightest vestige of poverty. She always found the means of being genteelly clad, of burning nothing but wax candles, and making the ends of the year meet. She plunged into devotion, but did not enter a convent. She chose the most austere confessor in Paris. But in kneeling she let her robes fall in such graceful and harmonious folds that her confessor thought it his duty to reprove her.

A less keen-sighted and ambitious woman might have been discouraged while waiting for fortune or pursuing the blind goddess in this way. Madame de Maintenon was on the eve of faltering and going in the train of the Duchess de Nemours to Portugal, when the beautiful Marchioness de Montespan, the high and capricious favorite who divided her leisure between two amours, and coursing in her apartments with a filagree chariot harnessed to four mice, confided to her the education of her children. This education brought the widow of Scarron into the presence of Louis XIV. Chance achieved the connection.

One day the king made a present to the governess of the farm of Maintenon, and by inadvertency another day in the midst of his courtesans, he called her Madame de Maintenon. The courtesans took up the slip of the tongue and called her in their turn Madame de Maintenant, that is, the present Madame. The English reader loses the pun, Maintenon and Maintenant being pronounced exactly alike in French, and the latter meaning now—the time which is held in the hand.

The King soon after getting tired of his sensuality, perhaps, was secretly married to Madame de Maintenon by the Bishop of Chartres who charged the mysterious queen to be a Sarah to her Abraham?—[Chronotype.

A LUCKY EPIGRAM.

MR JAMES SMITH, one of the authors of the "Rejected Addresses," having met at a dinner party the late Mr. Strahan, the king's printer, then suffering from gout and old age, though his faculties remained unimpaired, he sent him next morning the following:

Your lower limbs seemed far from stout
When last I saw you walk;
The cause I presently found out
When you began to talk.

The power which props the body's length,
In due proportion spread,
In you mounts upwards, and the strength
All settles in the head.

Mr. Strahan was so much gratified by the compliment, that he made an immediate codicil to his will, by which he bequeathed to the writer the sum of £3,000!

James made a happier, though, in a pecuniary sense, less lucky epigram on Miss Edgeworth:

We every-day bards may "anonymous" sign—
That refuge, Miss Edgeworth, can never be thine.
Thy writings, where satire and moral unite,
Must bring forth the name of their author to light.
Good and bad join in telling the source of their birth;

The bad own their Edge, and the good own their worth.

TAKE IT EASY.

TAKE it easy! life at longest
But a lengthen'd shadow is;
And the brave as well as strongest
Dare not call to-morrow his!

THE MISER'S DEATH.

An old man sat by a fireless hearth,
Though the night was dark and chill,
And mournfully over the frozen earth,
The wind sobb'd lone and shrill.
His locks were gray, and his eyes were gray,
And dim—but not with tears—
And his skeleton form was wasted away
With penury more than years.

A rushlight was casting its fitful glare,
O'er the damp and dreary walls,
Where the lizard had made his slimy lair,
And the venomous spider crawls.
But the meanest thing in this lonesome room,
Was that miser, all worn and bare;
Where he sat like a ghost in an empty tomb,
On his broken and only chair.

He had bolted the window and barr'd the door,
And every nook he had scann'd,
And felt their fastenings o'er and o'er,
With his cold and skinny hand;
And yet he sat gazing intently around,
And trembled with silent fear,
And started and shudder'd at every sound,
That fell on his coward ear.

"Ha! ha!" laugh'd the miser, "I'm safe at last,
From this night so cold and drear;
From the drenching rain and the driving blast,
With my gold and treasure here.
I am cold and wet with the icy rain,
And my health is bad, 'tis true,
Yet if I should light that fire again,
It would cost me a farthing or two.

"But I'll take a sip of this precious wine,
It will banish my cold and fears;
It was given long since by a friend of mine,
I have kept it for many years."
So he drew a flask from a moldy nook,
And drank of its ruby tide,
And his eye grew bright with each draught he took,
And his bosom swell'd with pride.

"Let me see—let me see," said the miser then,
"Tis some sixty years or more,
Since the happy hour when I began
To heap up my glittering store;
And well have I sped in my anxious toil,
As my crowded chests will show.
I have more than would ransom a kingdom's spoil,
Or an emperor could bestow.

"From the orient realms I have rubies,
And gold from the famed Peru;
I've diamonds would shame the stars of night,
And pearls like the morning dew,
And more I'll have, ere the morrow's sun
His rays from the west shall fling;
That widow, to free her prison'd son,
Shall bring me her bridal ring."

He turn'd to an old worm-eaten chest,
And cautiously raised the lid,
And then it shone like the clouds of the west,
With the sun in their splendor hid;
And gem after gem of its precious store,
He raised with exulting smile,
And counted, and counted them o'er and o'er,
In many a glittering pile.

Why comes that flush to his pallid brow,
While his eyes like his diamonds shine?
Why writhes he thus in such torture now?
What was there in the wine?
His lonely seat he strove to regain—
To crawl to his bed he tried;
But finding those efforts were all in vain,
He clasp'd his gold, and died.

ORIGIN OF THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET.—We came in possession, last week of an anecdote respecting the origin of Samuel Woodworth's famous ballad of that name, which appears to us to possess so much interest, that we cannot withhold it from our readers—especially as it has not before been in print. Some years ago, when Woodworth, the printer, and several other "Old New-Yorkers," were brother typos in a printing office, which was situated at the corner of Chatham-street and Chambers, there were very few places in this city where one could enjoy the luxury of a really "good drink." Among the few places most worthy of patronage, was an establishment kept by Mallory, in Frankfort-street, on or about the same spot where Saint John's Hall recently stood. Woodworth, in company with several particular friends, had "dropped in" at this place one afternoon, for the purpose of taking some "brandy and water," which Mallory was famous for keeping. The liquor was superexcellent, and Woodworth seemed inspired by it; for, after taking a draught, he laid his glass upon the table, (remember, reader, if you please, that, in those "rare old times," a man rarely met a friend without inviting him to imbibe;) and, smacking his lips, declared that Mallory's cum de vie was superior to anything he had ever tasted! "No," said Mallory, "you are mistaken: there was one thing which, in both our estimations, far surpassed this, in the way of drinking." "What was that?" asked Woodworth, dubiously. "The draught of pure, fresh spring-water that we used to drink from the old oaken bucket that hung in the well, after our return from the labors of the field on a sultry day in summer." The tear-drop glistened, for a moment, in Woodworth's eye. "True!" he replied, and soon after quitted the place. He immediately returned to the office, threw down his stick, grasped a pen, and, in half an hour, "The Old Oaken Bucket," one of the most delightful compositions in our language, was ready, in manuscript, to be embalmed in the memories of succeeding generations. There, reader! do you say there is nothing new under the sun?

THE BUTCHER'S HORSE.—George Cross was engaged to play a violin in the orchestra at the Richmond Theater; and repeatedly passing his leisure evenings among the respectable tradesmen of that town, one of them, a butcher, was so much pleased with his oddities, that he made him an offer of his horse for his Sunday's excursions which was accepted. Next morning Cross made his first equestrian jaunt, he had not ridden more than five minutes when the animal, suddenly leaving the road, ran up to the iron gate of a large mansion, where he stood so firmly fixed, that neither whip nor spur could remove him, till a countryman passing by led him away. Cross, a little vexed, proceeded on his way, but the quadruped shortly afterwards played him a similar trick. Perplexed now in the extreme, Cross made every extortion, in vain, to detach him from the gate; when, at length, a thought quickly flashed o'er his "mind's eye," he leaned forward, and applying his mouth to the ear of the beast, called out in a shrill and cook-like falsetto, "We don't want anything to day." On which the horse turned into the road, and, at the rate of ten miles an hour, trotted back to his owner's door.—[Parke's Musical Memoirs.

IDLENESS.—Nine-tenths of the miseries and vices of manhood proceed from idleness; with men of quick minds, to whom it is especially pernicious, this habit is commonly the fruit of many disappointments and schemes oft baffled; and men fail in their schemes not so much for the want of strength, as from the ill direction of it. The weakest living creature, by concentrating his powers on a single object, can accomplish something; the strongest, by dispersing his over many, may fail to accomplish any thing. The drop by continued falling bores its passage through the hardest rock—the hasty torrent rushes over it with hideous uproar, and leaves no trace behind.—[Thomas Carlyle.

THE INCONSISTENCY OF MAN.—We are all prone, in adversity, and disappointments of our too sanguine expectations, to burst out in complaints against fate and her whims, against fortune and her caprices; while in cases of success and prosperity in our understandings, however unexpected and unforeseen may be such a result, we boast of our discretion, our skill and our wisdom, forgetting that in most cases the failures arise from our own indiscreet and precipitate actions and words, and that success emanates from Him who reigns above fate, and who in his inscrutable wisdom turns the wheel of fortune, and guides it often for our welfare, when we imagine it to be for our misfortune.

SPEECH.—Articular speech is peculiar to man, and is universal. No race hath hitherto been discovered in which colloquial intercourse is not thus maintained.—[Curtis.

PEOPLE TO BE SATIRIZED.—One who even while relating at his request, a brief anecdote, listens to you with undisguised impatience, till just as you have reached the point, when he directs his attention to some object out of the window, so that your story is lost. If any thing can enhance such rudeness, it is begging your pardon for his inattention and entreating you to repeat what you have just related.

Those who trust their mouths directly into your face whenever they speak to you.

People who address you in company upon your or their private affairs.

People who clip their words so that you can make out the meaning of only half they say.

People who eat onions.

People who regard local rules of etiquette as of more importance than general character, mind, talents, and intentions; i. e. who suffer their esteem for a stranger to be more diminished at perceiving him eat with a knife instead of a fork than their respect could be excited on learning that he had performed noble moral actions.

JOHN RANDOLPH AND THE MERCHANTS BANK.—In New York, many years ago, during a suspension of specie payments, John Randolph, of Roanoke, went there on business. Having a check on the Merchants' Bank for a large sum, he called for the cash, and would take nothing but specie, which the tellers obstinately refused to pay. Randolph disdained to bandy words with their clerks or principals; believing himself swindled, he withdrew and had a handbill printed, and circulated all over the city, which set forth that "John Randolph being on a visit to New York, would address his fellow-citizens on that evening on the Banking System, from the steps of the Merchants' Bank." Long before the hour, a crowd began to gather, which increased to a fearful number, when the officers of the bank, taking the alarm, sent Mr. Randolph his money in gold, who received it with sardonic smile and apt quotation: Chastatium invention durcam keliquit. He left New York next morning, in a stage, before day; and his being unknown in the city, the handbill passed off for a hoax on the public.—[Mass. State Register.

In olden times it was customary for the young Englishmen to get into scrapes in order to make themselves popular. In 1720, while Mrs. Oldfield was playing, Beau Fielding pushed against a barrister named Fallwood; Fallwood expostulated, and Beau drew his sword. The pugnacious lawyer pinked him in the breast. Beau, then fifty years of age, came forward and showed his wound to the pit, who hissed and laughed at him, to his great mortification. The barrister emboldened by his success, repaired to Lincoln's Theater, where he picked a quarrel with Capt. Cussack, and demanded satisfaction. They met, and the lawyer was professionally dispatched by the soldier.

Intolerance should never hold in fettered durance the divine privilege of thought; faith, the primeval cord that binds man in holy unison with his Creator, should soar to its fountain of light, untrammelled by the dismal influence of an unlettered bigotry. The spell of an earthen image ceases to manacle the will, or render it subservient to the dictum of an emperor or the fiat of a pope. Civilization, in her theme of lettered intelligence, contemns the frequent and basing appeals once made aloud to passion, but reposes for security upon the more gentle dictates of a wise humanity.—[Jewish Chronicle.

ROBBING AN AUTHOR.—A thief who had succeeded in penetrating in the middle of the night, into the apartment of the well known author Balzac, was suddenly started by a loud burst of laughter, and turning round, he saw by the dim light of the moon penetrating the room, the portly figure of the author sitting upon the bed and holding his sides. Seeing himself detected, he coolly asked Mr. Balzac for what reason he laughed so immoderately. "I laugh," replied the latter, "at the idea that you should fancy yourself able to find money and valuables in the dark, and without a lamp, when I can't discover any even in broad daylight."

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

Travel on the Chesapeake. Disciples of Hyer and Sullivan. Gladiatorial excitement in Baltimore. Character of the Baltimoreans. Amusements. Odd-Fellowship. The Ladies. Increase of Poverty.

BALTIMORE, Md. Feb. 7, 1849.

Accompanied by our intelligent and gentlemanly traveling companion A. E. Hovey, Esq., we arrived at this place, last evening, after a most uncomfortable passage which occupied the entire day. Since the suspension of the Ferry at Havre de Grace by the ice, the railroad has been abandoned for the steamboat rout, via New Castle and the Chesapeake Bay. What rendered the passage more unpleasant than it would otherwise have been, were the excessive number of passengers, and more especially, the peculiar character of a large proportion of them. It seemed as if all the filthy and vicious clans in New York and Philadelphia had vomited forth their scurvy denizens, who, fierce and riotous, were hastening to Baltimore, to witness the shameful fight between the two gladiators, Hyer and Sullivan, which it is supposed will take place to-day, somewhere in the neighborhood of this city. Such a profane, noisy, and cut-throat looking men our eyes never beheld before, and it is not surprising that in such a company many gentlemen were relieved of their pocket-books, and other valuables. However, we got here alive, and are duly thankful.

It is humiliating to see the immense excitement that prevails here on account of this proposed combat between these chiefs of rowdydom, Sullivan and Hyer. All classes, high and low, rich and poor, wise and ignorant, white and black, are excited to the last degree. Even women and children are infected, and the streets are filled with noise and profanity. Measures have been adopted to prevent the meeting, but it would be better to allow the combatants to come together, and force them to fight; until, like the famous Irish cats, they devour each other to the very — toe nails.

On the whole, this city of Baltimore is an agreeable and pleasant place, which all travelers generally like. The Baltimoreans are an intelligent people, and full of enterprise, and care more for business than amusement. There is no city in the Union where, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, there are so few places of amusements as here. We know not how to account for this. It cannot be that pursuits and pleasures purely intellectual have banished the love of amusements, or that a more earnest piety has condemned them; for we find, in Boston,—the most intellectual and pious city in the world,—more theaters and places of amusement, than in any other American city. But in Baltimore, the theaters are all closed; there are few concerts, and little taste for anything pertaining to literature or art. The Museum, however, a very respectable place, appears to be well patronised.

Baltimore, our readers all know, is the seat of government of our Order. It is indeed its cradle, where it was first nursed into a vigorous life, so far as this country is concerned. There are visiting here now, brothers, who assisted at the institution of the first Lodge planted in the United States; and among them is P. G. Sire Wilkey. The Grand Sec. of the G. L. U. S., J. L. Ridgely, Esq., resides here also. He is a most faithful and valuable officer.

The weather, it seems to us, is colder here than at the North, and in the streets there is a greater quantity of snow than in New York.

The exceeding fairness of the ladies of Baltimore has often been the subject of remark. Brilliant complexions, intelligent countenances, modest deportment, and elegant simplicity of dress, give them a distinguished rank in the scale of beauty. But, on the other hand, the gentlemen are by no means distinguished in this way. We observe this every where, in all these towns and cities where the ladies are celebrated for beauty, of form and complexion, the gentlemen are very ordinary, and vice versa. Can any of our Philosophers or Physiological friends explain this fact? Will our distinguished and learned friends, the Messrs. Fowlers, tell us?

We find here, and also in Philadelphia, as well as in New York, a fearful increase of poverty, and consequently of crime; for poverty produces crime. It is impossible for any form of words to describe, or measure the extent of the suffering that now exists in these three cities; suffering without mitigation, and without solace. And this is even increasing!

What will be the end of this? Our social system, at the bottom, is the same as that of England. Our laws are nearly the same, our habits of life are the same, our moral tendencies are the same, and have we not reason, therefore, to fear that time only is wanted to produce the same results, the same distress between rich and poor, the same insolence and pride on one hand and burning jealousy and hate on the other,—and the same terrible wretchedness and degradation as are witnessed to-day in England? Wiser legislation for the future alone can avert this catastrophe.

The hotels here are now crammed from top to basement, with travelers, on their way to the capitol, eager to be present at the inauguration, and to pay their respects to the new President of the Republic. Many of these are no doubt seekers for office, and who will consequently return with the bitterness of disappointment in their hearts. For our self, we shall defer our visit to Washington until after this event; for in such a political maelstrom we should be lost.

EDUCATION vs. DESPOTISM.

TRULY said a profound philosopher and an acute observer, "knowledge is power." Yes, it is positive power, because of its tendency to the establishment of right. The ignorance of the masses is the security of tyrants, while the development of mind lays traps for the their destruction, and ultimately annihilates their sway. The perpetuity of despotism depends, in a great measure, upon the dearth of information among the community, and of that knowledge which affords man a just estimate of his own inherent rights, and prompts him to their attainment.

When, through the instrumentality of knowledge, man becomes practically educated, the scope of his thought is extended, a new light breaks in upon his previously benighted intellect and effects the completion of his Freedom. The mind governs all those great popular movements in which we behold the masses struggling to gain a supremacy over despotism, and in proportion to the expansion of intellect among a nation, the nearer do they arrive at the accomplishment of their destiny. Then, as the political education of men is being perfected, contemporaneous benefits are created; the appliances for the production of wealth and happiness are increased, the intellectual tone of the nation is elevated, and the theory of government is either materially liberalized, or a new political structure is raised upon the broad basis of Freedom and Equality.

The political requirements of men increase with their growth of knowledge, and the mode of government which served to bind and control an ignorant community, is no longer consonant with the ideas of the educated man. It is therefore the vital interest of despots to dam up all the fountains of knowledge, and to preclude the acquisition of information, lest a nation when having arrived at a clear idea of their privileges, would seek in the vindication of their rights to impair their authority. To educate himself and to cooperate in the extension of education, is one of the first duties of man, as forming a member of a civilized community, because the perpetuity of ignorance is as diametrically opposed to the establishment of Freedom, as is the dissemination of Knowledge, Truth and Unity, auxiliary to the realization of a people's rights.

History satisfactorily proves to us that the exercise of absolute power over men, has been almost invariably coeval with their intellectual degradation. Despotic government perhaps, were the best adapted to the exigencies of nations sunk in barbarism; a controlling mind was necessary to bind together the crude and dissonant elements of society, when so constituted. Among the barbarous nations of antiquity, the despotic form of government generally prevailed, but among the cultured children of Italy and Greece, we find a perfect realization of the democratic theory, existing on the one hand, until luxury had tainted the genius and enervated the energies of the people, and on the other until Greece was absorbed by the rapacity of its rival, finally becoming the prey of the outlaws.

The history of the last century demonstrates a wonderful increase in the power of public opinion, as resulting from an augmentation in the facilities for the acquisition of knowledge. In our opinion, the events which have taken place in Europe during the last year, indicate a vast extent of growing mind, and most assuredly the tendency of this immense diffusion of democratic thought will ultimately be the establishment of that form of government the most congenial to an educated people, pure and unalloyed republicanism. The struggles among the European family for their emancipation from tyranny, have in many instances been unsuccessful; but let not kings "lay the flattering unction to their souls," that the battle of Freedom is lost, the endeavors of the people have been impeded only for a time, for with more determined perseverance and redoubled energies will they assail the strongholds of despotism, and hurl their oppressors to annihilation.

America led the glorious example by which Europe is now directing the current of its thought. We grappled with and conquered oppression, and now enjoy the fruits which the unparalleled patriotism of our forefathers insured to us. Progress is written upon every thing we regard; it is characteristic of political, scientific and commercial institutions throughout the civilized world. Man's destiny is now progressive, moving onwards in a strong current, and will overcome all the obstacles which prejudice or tyranny may cast in its way. The realization of the democratic theory is close at hand, for man's capabilities and requirements loudly demand it; his energies are increasing, new wants are being created by reason of the expansion of his mind by culture, and he is now best adapted to that most reasonable form of government—self-government.

It were indeed a superfluous task for us to enforce the importance of education to man, independent of its being auxiliary to political movements—every reasoning being knows its value, as perhaps they also know that the statistics of all countries demonstrate that ignorance is fearfully productive of crime; on the other hand, we behold education assisting materially in man's struggles for liberty, generating a union of thought and action, strengthening the force of public opinion, until it becomes truly formidable to tyrants. But this, however, must not be left from out of our consideration, that knowledge, unless it be tinctured with the spirit of Christianity, is very liable to assist in the furtherance of the most vicious projects. A man with knowledge and whose character is without principle, can do much more evil than an ignorant man without education, and constantly do we see knowledge prostituted from its high destination to purposes the most criminal.

"Knowledge is power," but unless it be guided by the spirit of good, it will, as it often does, become the slave of vice. It is not from any vain-glorious feeling that we will merely add, that in no other country in the entire world, is the educational system so thoroughly carried out as in our noble Union. The means for the acquisition of knowledge are within the grasp of all our citizens. Such being the case, it is positively criminal for any man to be ignorant.

We have many voluntary communications from individuals, from almost every State in the Union, all showing that the principles of Friendship, Love and Truth, as exemplified and practised by Odd-Fellows, are steadily advancing. Their influence cannot but produce beneficial results in every community where the sick receive their attentions, the dying are watched over with the kindest fraternal feeling, their happiness greatly augmented and their sorrows alleviated by the systematic, practical sympathy enjoined upon every member of the Order. Those who once opposed, are now convinced of former errors, and many such are engaged in advancing our cause. From these communications we select the following as an index of the whole.

"Ellicott Lodge, No. 296, at Jamestown, in Chautauque Co., notwithstanding the strong opposition and the withdrawal of many members for the purpose of forming new Lodges at Randolph, Warren and Sugar Grove, still numbers more than one hundred contributing members, and has a large surplus in the treasury. This Lodge has recently sustained a great loss by the death of Bro. Charles C. Brown. The bereaved widow and children have sustained a greater, and we know our brethren of Lodge No. 296 will do what can be done to alleviate the sorrows of the afflicted family.

DATES from California to Dec. 25, represent the gold region to be in a disturbed condition—murder and robbery being of daily occurrence. Three men had been hung by Lynch law.

EDUCATION AND THE I. O. O. F.

WE publish to-day an interesting letter on this subject, for which we are indebted to R. W. G. Sec. Ridgely. This is a continuation of a series of educational letters, which about two years ago we had the pleasure of giving to the public through our columns. We have ever been in favor of a great national school for the Order, and will second any feasible project of this description, with all our power. Although we thought at the time, we discovered two grand defects in the plan of our distinguished Brother Wiley Williams, Esq., we are right glad he has again entered the field, and commend his able and interesting letter to the attention of the Order.

If we are to do any thing in this matter, we would recommend the adoption of some school already established, as a basis. The "Norwich University," in Vermont, for example, which is under the able administration of Capt. Alden Partridge, formerly President of West Point Military Academy.

THE FIRST ODD-FELLOW—A DRAMA.

WE give below an interesting extract from this superb Drama, which we believe is to be brought out at one of our city theaters about the middle of June next. We would suggest the week during which the Odd-Fellow's Hall will be dedicated, as a proper time for its representation, for then there will be thousands of Odd-Fellows in the city, who will naturally seek some amusement.

The play is founded on the tradition that the Order of O. F. was instituted among the early Christians, under the reigns of the Emperors Vespasian and Titus. Whatever we may think of the tradition, we must admit the talented author of this drama has made an admirable use of it.

SCENE IV.—The Hall of the Comites—Piso—Curtius, the Scribe—Comites discovered—Enter Maro leading Sylvius.

PISO.— Maro, our brother?
MARO.—Brothers! I bring to this our secret meeting.

The young centurion, Sylvius. He would learn Our Order's faith and practice.

PISO.— Thou dost know,
With thee and thine each Come's heart is joined!
Young Sylvius, stand forth. Wouldst thou in truth
Casting away the senseless faith of Rome,
Learn that which weaves around its votaries' brow
A crown of thorns which points the way to Heaven
Through the portals of a fearful death?

SYLVIVS.— I would!
I would learn truth, though peril and the pangs
Of a thousand deaths should threaten me!

PISO.— 'Tis well!
Yet pause! The cross is hard to bear, young Sylvius.

The followers of our God are outlawed men—
Rome seeks their life as bloodhounds track their prey.

SYLVIVS.— I have learned much of Maro of his faith,
I would learn all—and die, if it be well,
For truth!

PISO.— Thou shalt learn all. This very morn
The edict of the Emperor hath gone forth;
We are mark'd out for sacrifice. Yet He
In whom we trust, will be our bulwark still.

(To Curtius.)

How died young Tullius, last of the Roman martyrs?

CURTIVS.— As a Roman and a Christian—on his brow

No terror—on his lips no curse.

PISO.— 'Tis well!
Thus may we all die, when the dread command
Shall call us to a glorious martyrdom!
The blood of Tullius shall bedew the soil
Of our new vineyard, and raise up a host
Of martyrs like himself!

CURTIVS.— It shall—it shall!
Already have his dying words awaked
In Roman hearts a wish to fall like him!
Even as the bright steel glittered o'er his head,
Sprang faith from the shouting crowd to Roman soldiers.

They tore the eagles from their helmeted heads—
They plucked the idolatrous medals from their breasts,
And kneeling by the martyred youth, held up
Their hands to Heaven, and owned the Christian's God!

SYLVIVS.— O, glorious faith that prompts to deeds like this!

O, noble martyrs, who can dare such deeds!

PISO.— O, glorious faith! Jehovah's mighty spirit
Worketh among the heathen. Died they, too?

CURTIVS.— They have been dragged to prison to await

The award of Titus for their bold avowal!

PISO.— Titus is just—O, would that his great heart
Might turn to mercy, too! Young Sylvius!

SYLVIVS.— Let me be one of ye! I would go forth
With my voice raised, like him whose tones were heard

Upon Mars' Hill, while Athens knelt in awe.

MARO.— Thou shalt! Yet once again I bid thee pause.

Wilt thou endure unto the end, young Sylvius?

SYLVIVS.— In the name of Heaven, I will!

MARO.— Dost thou resolve
Henceforth to dedicate thy mortal life
To Friendship, Truth and Love?

SYLVIVS.— I swear!

MARO.— Enough!
Thou art a Comes of the Comites! (music.)
Thou art a Brother of the Brotherhood!

Go forth into the world, even as a lamb
Among the wolves! Take thou no purse nor script
For thine own pleasure—but the good of all!
To every house bear peace. Thou shalt have power
In the high trust of God, to do all things;—
Thou shalt have power in this to safely tread
On the serpent, and the scorpion, and o'ercome
The might of the enemy. Go thou forth in peace—
A Comes of the Brotherhood! And first Thy mission shall be Charity. Take thou
The Order's alms unto the new bereaved—
Take thou the Order's words of sympathy
To the mother of the martyred Tullius.
Go forth, young Comes! Be thou firm and true!

HARTWICK LODGE, N. Y.—On Tuesday evening, Jan. 9, D. D. G. M. J. L. Fox, installed the following brothers as officers for the ensuing term: Whitney G. West, N. G.; C. L. Harrington, V. G.; J. N. Chappell, S; J. F. Perkins, T.; William Perkins, P. S. Our Lodge at present is in a flourishing condition, and our prospects are fair for ranking among the first Lodges of the Order. Four or five of your valuable papers are taken by members of this Lodge, and an effort is being made to enlarge the list of subscription. Our Lodge meets on Tuesday evening. That harmony may be restored again to our beloved Order, is our most earnest wish. Yours, in F., L. & T. W.

FINE ARTS IN THE LODGES.—The other day we visited the new Odd-Fellows' Hall in Grand street, and were struck with the beautiful and expressive style of its embellishments. Allegri and Molini are the artists of the three principal rooms, which are most worthy of examination. We hope to give a full account of this fine artistical display in another number. Meanwhile, we advise all our brethren who are building new Lodge Rooms, either in the city or the country, to employ the beautiful pencil of these two eminent artists, Molini and Allegri, to adorn their Lodges.

ODD-FELLOWS UNIVERSITY.

LETTER FROM WILEY WILLIAMS, D. D. G. S.

COLUMBUS, Ga., Jan. 15, 1849.

J. L. RIDGELY, GR. COR. SEC.—Dear Sir and Bro:—The efforts which you have made to advance the cause of education, through the instrumentality of the benevolent Order to which we are attached, have arrested the attention of its members throughout the confederacy; and although the Grand Lodge of the United States has not deemed itself justified in predicating any effectual action upon your views, yet I believe an impression has been made altogether favorable to the object contemplated by you.

I flatter myself that the time has now arrived when much good may be done by again agitating the subject, and if a plan can be suggested which promises success and usefulness, without imposing too heavy a burthen upon the members of the Order, that they will give it that reflection and investigation which the great importance of the subject demands.

I have given the matter some consideration, with an anxious desire to see your wishes realized, and that our Order may have the high honor, as it certainly has the power, of establishing an institution of learning, second to none in the United States, and that we may constitute another Odd-Fellows' lever to elevate the human character and bless mankind.

I am aware that there are objections by some of our brethren, to the establishment, by our Order, of a national institution of learning under the care of Odd-Fellowship. It is said by some, that if we confine ourselves strictly to the discharge of the obligations positively enjoined upon us by our laws, we may find enough to do; while others exclaim, cui bono? who is to be benefited—and can the children of those who contribute the funds necessary to its endowment, have its advantages with any less expense? It is certain that those who are disposed to object, will not be at a loss on many other grounds, either real or imaginary. Now, with those of our brethren whose composition is so mixed up with negative matter, I am not inclined to argue the question; but it may not be improper to say that all human efforts for the amelioration of the condition of our race, yea, even the administration of the common charities of life, may find objectors, either to the manner or the purpose; yet that should be no reason why we should not do the one or the other, if in our power.

It is true that the laws of Odd-Fellowship impose many duties upon us, especially in reference to the obligations which we owe one to another; but the discharge of all these faithfully and promptly, only the better prepares us, by uniting us more strongly together, to benefit the world; and that brotherhood which adheres closely to its principles, will find plenty of time and much pleasure, not only in performing every thing positively required, but for every other desirable purpose.

It may be true, also, that our children, especially those of us who reside at a great distance from the location of this institution of learning, might not derive a great benefit from it; but may not this objection be urged against every College and University? Every man cannot have one in his neighborhood, or county, and must he therefore refuse to encourage them? All of us who have sons must send them to a school of high character, if we wish them well taught and thoroughly educated; and it would cost but little more to send them to Baltimore, than it would to our State Colleges, many of which are but little above a high school in the grade and extent of instruction.

One great advantage which I propose to derive from the establishment of this institution, is to the country at large, in a political point of view. The association of Odd-Fellows, extending from Maine to the Rio Grande, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean—bound together by the three-fold cord of Friendship, Love and Truth—carefully taught, nay, positively enjoined, as Odd-Fellows, to know no creed or party, to recognise the true God as our Creator and Benefactor, to give to our beloved country, our whole country, our services and our lives, if necessary for her defense, and to our brothers all proper assistance in time of need, presents, in my opinion, one of the sure supports of our Constitutional Union as a confederacy of States, and while the principles of our Order command us to permit our brother to express and enjoy his opinion, yet they are equally as imperative that the principles of love and truth shall distinguish and characterize all our communications with each other. Where these exist, there can be no disunion. A decent and proper respect for the rights and opinions of our brother, will always teach us to bear and forbear.

The establishment of a national institution of learning under our care, will add another link to the chain that binds us together as an Order and as a people; and when the jarring and conflicting elements of party and faction, or fanaticism, shall place the existence of this happy Union in jeopardy, it may yet be the high and glorious destiny of our beloved Order to stay the destructive torrent that would overwhelm it, and perpetuate to posterity the blessings and privileges we now enjoy. But I shall not now undertake to array the objections and advantages of this institution, but will proceed to give you my views of a plan which I think may succeed. I give you the outlines only.

I propose that the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows in the United States, agree to establish and endow an institution of learning, to be called the Odd-Fellows' University; that each Grand Lodge in the several States and Territories shall, every two years, appoint one Trustee, and the Grand Lodge of the United States shall, every two years, appoint seven members of the Board of Trustees, all, or a majority of whom, shall be a Board of Trustees for said institution.

The power, duties and authority of the Board of Trustees shall be prescribed and regulated by the Grand Lodge of the United States; that the Odd-Fellows' University shall be located at or near the city of Baltimore, and shall be under the general control of the Grand Lodge of the United States.

For the purpose of endowing this institution, I propose that each Odd-Fellow in the United States pay annually, for the term of five years, the sum of one dollar, to be collected with his dues, semi-annually, and transmitted by each Subordinate Lodge to the Grand Secretary of each State Grand Lodge, who shall forward the same to such person or persons as may be designated by the Grand Lodge of the United States to receive it; which sum shall, as soon as convenient, be permanently invested in safe stocks or securities, bearing an interest not less than six per cent.

There being now one hundred and twenty-five thousand Odd-Fellows in the United States, paying a revenue to their Lodges of near nine hundred thousand dollars, without scarcely knowing or feeling it. I think it may be safely calculated that by the contribution of one dollar per annum, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars per year can be raised; and, at all events, at the end of five years the sum of five hundred thousand dollars may be received; that this shall be a permanent investment, the interest only of which shall be appropriated for any purpose, which, at six per cent., will make annually thirty thousand dollars; that the Trustees, with the sum arising and accruing from interest, shall construct the necessary buildings, employ professors, procure apparatus, library, &c.

After the buildings, apparatus, library, &c., are paid for, it is estimated that twenty thousand dollars per annum will be sufficient for many years to pay salaries, and increase gradually the various facilities of learning, leaving ten thousand dollars and the tuition money, say five thousand dollars, making fifteen thousand dollars annually a surplus fund; that this sum of fifteen thousand dollars shall be annually divided among the several State Grand Lodges, in proportion to the amount contributed within their several jurisdictions, and shall be, by the Trustees, held as a fund for the maintenance and education of such beneficiary as may be selected by the said Grand Lodge. It is estimated that two hundred and fifty dollars will board and clothe a pupil at this institution. If this be so, this sum will keep sixty beneficiaries at school.

Now, what do you think of these general propositions? Is the project, under this view of it, a feasible one? Will it result in the benefit of mankind, and the good of the Order?

It was a beautiful idea that if the physical and mental power of the world combined could create a beautiful object, animate it with a breathing soul, prepare it for usefulness here, and happiness hereafter, that it would be an effort worthy the object, and an object worthy of the effort.

Now we have infinitely more than half of the work done to our hands. The man has form and shape; a breathing, living soul, with all the honors and facilities for good and for evil, and capable of happiness or mercy here and hereafter. His education depends upon us. It is a duty, which as men we ought not to neglect, but which as Odd-Fellows we must not.

Here, then, is a plan easy to be perfected and carried out, and not onerous upon us, by which we can turn out annually sixty beneficiaries from this Institution—monuments of our Order, and so instructed in morals and science that their existence shall prove a blessing, and not a curse to themselves and society.

It is a good work. What Odd-Fellow will refuse to give his dollar, annually, for five years? I apprehend none, for we are a growing Brotherhood, and when we come to make up our final accounts, as we must do when passing through the solemn scenes of the "last degree" on earth, we shall not feel the worse because we have a little stock to our credit for the benefit of mankind.

Very truly yours, in F. L. & T.

WILEY WILLIAMS.

THE ORDER IN WILMINGTON, DELAWARE.

We spent two or three days, recently in this pleasant little city, and had the pleasure of meeting quite a number of the brethren. There are three Lodges located here and an Encampment, containing about seven hundred contributing members. With the brethren we were much pleased, and had the honor of addressing them twice. A new and splendid hall is now in course of erection for the better accommodation of the brotherhood. It will contain several large rooms on the ground floor for stores, a public Hall and Saloon, two splendid Lodge rooms and an Encampment room.

We saw in the Lodge room on the evening of our visit, a curious relic of the olden time, which brought to mind the early days of our Order. It was a PITCHER of English manufacture, ornamented with gold bands. On each side of it are the various emblems of Odd-Fellowship, surmounted by a scroll in which appear the heart in hand symbol, the emblem of sincerity, and the token of the Manchester Unity, "Upon my Honor." At the base of these inscriptions and emblems is another scroll, containing the well-known motto of our Fraternity, "Amicitia, Amor et Veritas." On the front of the pitcher is the following inscription with appropriate embellishments:

JAMES AND MARY PLATT, 1822.

We are Odd-Fellows when we act and do the things which are right.

How grand in age, how fair in youth,
Are holy Friendship, Love and Truth.

This pitcher was presented to Mechanic's Lodge by Mrs. Platt after the death of her husband who was a member of this Lodge. Mrs. Platt died about two years ago.

A GLANCE AT EUROPE.

THE Ocean mail steamship Niagara has arrived at Boston with two weeks later intelligence from Europe and Asia. The most important accounts for our commercial men, are the great improvement in the English money market, and the extraordinary advance in American securities. The large sales of Cotton in England will be of advantage to the United States; equal to five million dollars by this single arrival. Enough for the speculators.

As to the politicians, they will find in Europe but disorganization, anarchy and monstrous despotism, all combined to keep that beautiful part of the world in the most deplorable condition. There is no prospect of re-establishing peace in Europe; a general war seems unavoidable, not only between people and kings, but also among the different powers. France has dissolved the National Assembly, so much desired by the nation, and Louis Napoleon has for Vice President M. Boulay, elected by the Assembly, against the politics and imperial chimeras of His Highness, the President. The red republicans are preparing to renew the bloody scenes of June; they have become active, they ask for bread and work, and the Government, deaf to their demands, is contemplating some severe measures for their complete suppression! The financial state of this country is as deficient as might be expected. The deficit at the end of 1849 will not be less than 718,000,000 francs!

The intervention in Italy against Austria has been abandoned by the same clamorous men who, two or three months ago, advised the Government to march for the independence of Italy. It is said that a large fleet was preparing to sail from Toulon with 10,000 soldiers, for the Papal question; but we see by the latest news that the expedition had been altogether abandoned. It would be very interesting to see French Republicans march against Italian Republicans, and to impose upon them a Popish puppet, and a traitor, for king of Rome. Nous verrons.

Pius IX has openly thrown off the mask of liberalism. Not satisfied with his appeals of Austrian intervention, he has hurled a bull of excommunication against the Roman people; but the spiritual anathemas which he hurled against them, have been treated with contempt. The Pope has forgotten that we live in the nineteenth century, and the year of our Lord 1849; that these resources of Papacy, so good in times of imposture and superstition, no longer prove efficacious. The Romans of our day fear not the lamentations and clamors of the dying Papacy; nor do they care for the Popish theological arms and feeble power of the preaching of fanatical ultra-Catholics. Pius IX is no more respected, either as a Prince or Pope. He has proved, by his treacherous policy, that he was the Vicar of Austria, and not that of Christ on earth. He has asked also the protection of Naples, Spain and Portugal, in order to enable him to resume his position as temporal ruler of the Papal States. The Roman Government has put forth a decree, denouncing as enemies to their country, all persons who shall suffer themselves to be deterred from voting for the Constituent Assembly, by the protest of the Pope. Several learned men are going among the people to enlighten them, and to expose the ridiculous anathemas of the Pope.

The Germans will have a new Emperor, whose election will cause some disturbance and jealousy among the many princes of Germany. The Frankfurt Assembly has fairly cast the apple of discord among them, and Austria has no longer a representative in this national body.

Austria, while recovering her Hungarian provinces, has a new field of controversy opened to her, in the threatened rivalry of Prussia for the German throne.

The Hungarians have lost their independence for the present, and Kossuth, the rebellious chief, has retired before the conquering Imperialists. Martial law has been proclaimed in Hungary and Gallacia; but all these cruelties, committed for the cause of despotism, will turn at last against the authors of these human slaughters.

The question of the Danish Duchies, with Germany, is unsettled as ever. They are waiting the approaching spring to renew their fiery war, and Denmark has announced her intention to borrow $7,000,000.

The Emperor of Constantinople has emancipated all the Christians residing in the Ottoman Empire. He has issued a decree, according to Christians the privilege of attaining the highest dignities, even that of Pacha and Vizer.

In India there has been a bloody battle between the English and the Sikhs, who defended their position with an obstinacy and valor which render them very formidable foes.

England has wisely resolved to reduce the army and navy, and to meet the wishes of the people, as demonstrated through the financial reform, and other associations.

In Ireland, the Queen's Bench has overruled the errors assigned in the cases of Wm. Smith O'Brien and his fellow prisoners.

From Spain we have nothing of interest. The war continues in Catalonia, and we believe that the Queen has troubles enough in her starved kingdom, without undertaking to declare war against the Romans, in favor of the Pope. S. DE CASALI.

LETTER FROM PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 10, 1849.

DEAR BRO.: The echo of the merry sleigh bells still ring in our ears, though the pavements have peeped so far through their snowy covering as to make a sleigh ride any thing but agreeable, yet it has been jingle, jingle, splash, splash, enough to know that the snow had fallen, without caring whether it had melted or not, as a ride through the mud is preferred by many to no sleighing at all.

The Ojibway Chief, John Copway, (Kah-ge-gah-bowk,) delivered the first of his course of Lectures on Thursday night, to a highly intelligent audience. His subject, (the Origin and Traditions of the North American Indians,) was handled in a masterly manner, though delivered in a language comparatively strange to him, and many of his views were entirely original and of peculiar interest.

Rev. Drs. Dill and Simpson, (known as the Irish delegation,) held a farewell meeting at the Musical Fund Hall, on Tuesday evening, to an overflowing house, and several very eloquent addresses were delivered. Many were disappointed in obtaining admission, and to accommodate these the farewell was repeated on Thursday evening. We learn that quite a large sum was collected at these meetings, in aid of the Protestants in Ireland.

Among the celebrated individuals who have visited our city lately, has been the pugilist Tom Hyer, who, as all heroes should be, was enthusiastically received. Judge Parsons sent him, (through Capt. Bennett of the Police,) his card, with an invitation to call on him, he was also introduced to his honor, Mayor Swift, and is now lodging at the expense of the city, expecting from his excellency, the Governor of Maryland, a request to visit that State. His defeated antagonist, Sullivan, to avoid the pressing courtesy of our city authorities, rumor says, passed through in haste.

Fairmount Lodge, No. 149, buried late Bro. Geo. Adams, on Wednesday afternoon. Fidelity Lodge, No. 138, buried late Bro. David S. Wagner this afternoon, and to-morrow Oriental Lodge, No. 113, will bury late Bro. William Fenerick. The funeral of Lieut. Goodman, on Saturday last, was quite respectable, in point of members, Wayne Lodge being represented quite creditably.

The newspaper critics here, generally are in raptures, with the performance on the Sax Horns of the Distin Family, and should the "flow of melody" from those instruments in their hands, equal the flow of words respecting their performance, it must be far superior to any ordinary entertainment of the kind. Mad. Bishop, and M. Bocsha, gave a concert this week, and were received with the favor usually accorded them.

We have nothing relating to the Order of any importance to send you. Knowing your present zeal, we hope to continue its fearless advocate you will ever

WAYNESBORO', Pa., Jan. 4, 1849.

SIR AND BRO.: This Lodge is rapidly increasing in members, and such, too, as confidence in their intelligence and respectability of character, justifies asserting, will give firmness and stability to the institution of Friendship, Love and Truth. We number upwards of eighty, and have existed but two years.

At the commencement of the present term, the election for officers, and installation occurred. H. J. Storer, N. G., presided, and declared the result of the election to be, that Bro's J. Brotherton was elected N. G.; R. F. Gibson, V. G.; M. M. Storer, S.; S. P. Storer, A. S.; W. S. Hollenberger, T. After this declaration, the Grand Officers were announced, and received according to the usage of the Order. The officers were then presented to D. D. G. M. M'Gahan for installation; and this imposing and solemn honor was appropriately conferred on them. Yours, in fellowship, M. M. STORER.

PITTSBURGH, PA.—The officers of Gahonto Lodge No. 314, for the ensuing term, are, Thomas E. Curtiss, N. G.; Eph. Johnson, V. G.; Joseph Knapp, Sec.; Chas. R. Gorman, Per. Sec.; R. J. Wisner, Treasurer.

ORDER OF ODD-FELLOWS.—We find the following eloquent passage in a sermon preached on Thanksgiving day, at New Orleans, by Rev. Charles W. Whitehall, Chaplain to the Protestant Episcopal Mission to Seamen in that city:

"What shall I say of those associations of benevolence, which we find spread abroad through our happy land, for the relief of suffering humanity, and the distress of our fellows? These are, emphatically, God's blessings. Brethren, when the legitimate tendencies of that charitable institution, to which some of you, I believe, belong, shall be properly felt; when the banner folds of its charities shall fall, like the drapery of heaven, around society—it will need no seer to tell its future glory. In the strength of numbers, as well as in the consciousness of doing right, there will be a steady acquisition of power and stability. Her foundation is upon a rock; and upon its surging-repelling base, prejudice will beat but vainly. Our rock will stand, while, on its brow, the dew of centuries shall fall; and around it, the storms of centuries may howl; and, cold and cheerless, around its foot, the gloom of dependency may settle: yet, it will shine bright and pure, and holy, amid the war of pride, bigotry and prejudice; and, like some fair column of marble, that laughs at the 'petting of the pitiless storm,' while it stands, unmoved by the shock, proudly erect; with the fair and holy inscription at the head, 'In God we trust;' at the foot, the Heaven-descended principles, 'Friendship, Love and Truth.'"

HORN'S LEAST.—A wag calls taking the route across the Isthmus, "going through the little end of the horn."

BEWARE OF HIM.

A MAN calling his name Robert B. Morse, of Adrian, Mich., visited this place last week, representing himself as an agent for the "Pledge of Honor," a temperance paper, and the "Golden Rule," a publication of the Odd-Fellows. He also claimed to be a Son of Temperance and an Odd-Fellow. From his conduct, while here, and information we have received in regard to his previous character, we feel it our duty to warn the public against him, as a man unworthy the confidence or fellowship of any respectable society. He left this place in the eastern stage on Saturday morning last; and our object in giving this notice, is to guard community against him.

Further particulars can be had by application to us.

We take the above from the Tribune published at Milan, Ohio, under date of Jan. 31, 1849, and have no doubt the caution is just and true with reference to R. B. Morse and due to the public. We again repeat it, he is not the Agent of the Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule, never having made any returns to the present proprietors, and we caution all our subscribers, and enjoin it as a duty upon every Odd-Fellow, to guard the Order from all such impositions.

It should be remembered that within the moral atmosphere of Odd-Fellowship the practice of deception and dishonesty is exceedingly dangerous, and our thanks are due all the brethren who have sent us information with reference to this subject. Will not the brethren every where exert themselves to shield us from like imposition, and use their influence to counteract the injury and loss we sustain from those unworthy our confidence? No receipts signed by R. B. Morse, will be acknowledged at this office, after this date, due notice having been given that his agency long since ceased.

CONDITIONAL FORGIVENESS.—Much has been said about the good qualities, constancy, forbearance, kindness and unchanging love of woman, and we heartily subscribe to all this; but the following true sketch may serve to exemplify their perseverance in an opposite course.

Two sisters, Mary and Jane, became highly offended at each other, about the time both were married. Year after year they stood it more than manfully, each determined not to be the first to speak to the other, although living in the same neighborhood. Twelve years had passed since the commencement of hostilities, when Mary, who had for months evidently been within the influence of that disease whose victims are sure, was brought very near the close of life. Death would not have been unexpected at any hour. She now began to review her past conduct, with reference to her sister, and soon requested that she might be sent for. Jane came at once, and was shown into the sick room, when Mary, taking her by the hand, addressed her as follows:

"Dear sister Jane: you know how wickedly we have been living ever since we were married, and I could not think of dying without making up with you. Only think of it, Jane, we have not spoken a word with one another for more than twelve years! Now, will you forgive me? I have but a few hours more to live."

It was an affecting scene. The two sisters embraced each other affectionately, promising mutual forgiveness; and Jane was about leaving, when Mary (although quite exhausted on account of the interview,) again resumed, "Sister Jane, it's all made up now, and I don't think I've long to stay; but remember, if I should live, the old grudge is good as ever."

WRIGHT'S INDIAN VEGETABLE PILLS.—This medicine, manufactured by our estimable Bro. Wright of Philadelphia, is really a useful and valuable article, and well deserving the attention of all who are suffering from the ailments peculiar to the season. See advertisement.

THE NEW YORK CITY PRESS.—There are periods in the ebbs and flows of public taste, when the wave of one exciting topic rises so high and swells so heavily that the small streams and rivulets of popular thought and feeling, are engulfed by the ocean of excitement into which they flow. This is the fact with regard to the gold mania. California has held both ends of the net which has fished up all lovers of the wonderful for full three months, and if perchance, a stray waif of eventfulness drifted into the public reservoir, it was swept away again without any previous notice. Good Mr. Gotham—and we say it in all reverence to yourself and your epidemic—we have had a PRINTERS' FESTIVAL, and to many minds, the occasion passed away without a moment's reflection. How much ought it to suggest? Glance your eye, courteous reader, over the following table of statistics, and contemplate how much thought and life-wearing labor is required to produce this amount of "matter." Think of the anarchy of competition and enterprise it has engendered—think how much force of mind, and necessity of imagining, was indispensable to satiate the public craving for mental aliment. In olden times, the cities which adorned the shores of the Tiber and the Adriatic were Republics in themselves; the same as "Paris is all France" now. Who shall deny when we see the great cities of America putting forth such extraordinary strength, and illustrating by her great stars of knowledge, the entire land, the same inevitable destiny? Cherish a love for the newspapers, then, we pray you; they are the only mirrors of the habits, manners and character of our times, and they will be a marvel for future generations. A STRANGE STORY.—The Cincinnati Commercial tells a horrible story, if true. It says that a gang of horse-thieves, in Indiana, went to the house of an old German, who had five hundred dollars in his possession, tied him and his wife and three children hand and foot, to the floor, by raising one of the planks and fastening the rope to the sleeper—then robbed the house, and, taking a feather and a straw bed, threw it over the confined group, set them on fire, fastened the door and decamped. In a few moments the robbers were out of sight, and the fire of the lighted beds was growing hotter and hotter. What was to be done? All tried the strength of the cords that bound them, time and time again! The fire grew hotter and the exertions greater. At length the wife and mother broke loose from the sleeper; she was yet tied hand and foot. A thought struck her!—she rolled—for she could not walk—to the fire-place, thrust her hands into the burning embers, and held them there till the fire burned off the cords that bound her hands—unloosed her feet, and saved her husband and children. The fire had not injured the latter badly, and the husband flew for assistance; but, as this unfortunate family lived some distance from neighbors, it was a long time before help arrived. One of the fiends participating in the attempted destruction of this innocent family was, by all accounts, let loose here by means of the abuse of the habeas corpus act. Humanity shudders at the thought of such villainy as is depicted above. To the unheard-of heroism of that wife and mother, the whole family owe their escape from a terrific, slow death. Never in our life have we heard of such a thrilling escape, or seen in a more hideous aspect the wickedness of the abandoned.

Two boys were going through a church-yard, one of them having a gun. Hearing something in one of the cherry trees, the young sportsman fired, and down came a whacking big owl.

"Oh, Billy," said the other, "what have you did? you've gone and shot a cherubim!"

TAX ON BACHELORS.—Among the multitudinous projects engendered by the heat of the revolution, which have arisen in the French Assembly, one is a tax upon celibacy. It is said that this measure originated with the women of Paris, who allege that celibacy is a luxury, and therefore should be taxed. It appeared to be a serious proposition, if anything or anybody can be serious in France. We find the provisions thus described:

"It is proposed that bachelors shall be taxed upon arriving at the age of twenty-five years, and that the tax shall be equal in amount to all the other taxes paid by the impracticable repudiator of matrimony on account of real or personal estate, or for licenses, or for anything else. At the age of 35 there is again an augmentation of the tax, which goes on augmenting periodically, until the celibataire arrives at fifty; then, if he is a bachelor still, it remains stationary till the end of his days. But there is no remission or reduction, should he live to the age of the antediluvian patriarchs, if he persists in his anti-hymenial sentiments—so that an octogenarian would be paying pretty dear for his 'single blessedness.'

"Widowers are to be allowed five years during which to re-marry; and if they do not, they are regarded as having relapsed into celibacy, and are then taxed, and the tax proceeds crescendo, from time to time, as in the case of the bachelors, until they arrive at fifty years; they are then entitled to a discharge, and are to be forever exempt from any further taxation on this behalf."

The letter-writer thinks this very hard on widowers. "It will be often cruel," he says, "to compel a widower to marry again. A bachelor has illusions—the prestige of novelty may influence him; but he whom a vexatious experience may have discouraged, will be afraid again to expose himself to danger—to encounter again the uncertain chances of the estate."

MARRIAGES IN ENGLAND.—The eighth Report of the Registrar-General shows, that in the year 1845, of 143,743 marriages, 129,515 were performed according to the rites of the Established Church, and 14,228 not according to those rites; showing that a great number of Dissenters still marry at church. Of the latter number there were 9,997 marriages in registered places of worship, 8,997 in superintendent-registrar's offices, 180 marriages of Jews, and 74 of Quakers.

THE MAN WHO MARRIED NINE WIVES.—Henry Bramall was lately convicted before the Lord Mayor of London of having married nine wives, all of whom are living. The heaviest punishment which the law awards for this crime is seven years transportation. This penalty the court thought much too light. His Lordship regretted that he could not sentence him to live seven years with the whole nine wives, as that would be something like punishment.

THE NEW EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA, Francis Joseph I., is a young man of fine natural abilities, which have been improved by all the accomplishments of the age. He has been trained under the direction of his mother, the Arch-duchess Sophia, a woman of great spirit and intelligence. He was popular with his countrymen, particularly with the Bohemians—whose language he spoke at a very early age. The young successor to the throne of the Caesars avows his intention of basing his government upon the principles of true liberty—equal justice to all races and individuals, and free participation of the people in the legislative power.

EXPENDITURE OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.—The annual expenditure of the Government in the time of peace, exclusive of the interest on the national debt, was, during the reign of George the First, about £2,588,000. In the reign of George the Second, it amounted to about £2,776,000; in that of George the Third (1790,) to £7,670,109; in George the Fourth's (1828,) to £21,407,670; in William the Fourth's (1835,) to £15,874,649; and in Victoria's (1843,) to £24,280,804.

COMPLIMENTARY.—G. F. Secchi de Casali has quite a complimentary notice of J. Bayard Taylor in that interesting paper, the "Gazette of the Union." He also says "he is not surprised to find the Saturday Evening Post in almost every family he has visited in different States in the Union," and prophesies that we will have "the largest circulation in America." That prophecy is, we think, in rapid progress of realization.—[Philadelphia Saturday Post.

FEMALE PHYSICIANS.—A writer in the American Courier is out against female M. Ds. He says he shouldn't like to have his wife called out in the night to visit another man. As for us, we should fear that our beloved would catch a cold.

WEBSTER vs. WALKER.

We publish with pleasure the following card of the Messrs. Harper & Brothers, defending themselves against the charge of having mutilated the orthography of MACAULEY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. It appears that those eminent and intelligent publishers are in the habit of following Webster in the composition of their works, and in this they are right. Webster is the only authority worthy of regard, and we believe he is recognized every where in this country, excepting Harvard University.

A CARD.

An impression having got abroad that we have made various important alterations from the English copy in our reprint of MACAULEY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, we deem it proper to state, in justice to the numerous purchasers of the work, that the edition printed by us is in every word a faithful and perfect copy of the original, the text of which has been followed without omission or alteration. In the composition of the work, indeed, in our printing office, we have followed the spelling of an acknowledged standard authority of the language—that of Webster, whose dictionary has received the critical recommendations of many learned men and learned institutions, both in this country and in Europe, as well as the sanction of widely spread usage, and whose system, moreover, is partly followed by Macaulay himself. These considerations we reasonably thought quite sufficient to justify us in its adoption.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

CAMDEN AND AMBOY RAILROAD COMPANY.

ALTHOUGH we have already spoken of the serious annoyances under which this Company labored, to regain the entire confidence of the public, yet we see that the famous "Citizen of Burlington" has secured some scribble to throw new impediments, and cause more trouble to the Directors of this road, in spite of the creditable assertions of the persons employed in the investigation of these affairs. As to the attacks of the N. Y. Herald, we shall say nothing; they are unworthy of any attention, and every one acquainted with its editor's transactions, knows that Bennet goes in favor or against people, according to his private interests.

We are personally acquainted with one of the Investigators, whose name is very popular among us. We believe that the assertions of Mr. J. G. King, and of his worthy companions, with the resolutions of the Stockholders, are a sufficient denial of the unjust and malignant accusations of the "Citizen of Burlington." But, truly, when a man comes out with the mask of an anonymous name, slandering the Directors, who are gentlemen of every honesty, and who enjoy all the confidence of the people, his attacks are valueless, and unworthy of any consideration. One of the great evils which embarrasses this Company, is the tax imposed upon each passenger by the Jersey Government. If this should be abolished, the Company could afford to carry people and goods at a less price. We do not know of any other line where there are so many useful improvements, or where the Directors spend so large an amount of money, as on the Camden and Amboy railroad. All the malignity of the anonymous "Citizen of Burlington," and his obscure associates, is originated from the desire of establishing an opposition line, thus injuring the interests of two companies, who have made immense pecuniary sacrifices. We give below the resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, at a meeting of the Stockholders at Bordentown, N. J., Jan. 3.

Resolved, That the report of the Commissioners appointed by the Board of Directors be accepted, and that three thousand copies of the same be printed.

Resolved, That the Stockholders of the Delaware and Raritan Canal and Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Companies, having heard the report of the Commissioners appointed to investigate certain charges of frauds, falsifications, and impostures made in certain publications under the signature of "a Citizen of Burlington," against the officers of said Companies, are satisfied that the charges are entirely destitute of any foundation in truth, and that the administration of the affairs of the joint Companies has been marked as much by the scrupulous fidelity with which their accounts have been kept, as by the ability with which their great and diversified interests have been managed.

Resolved, That the Stockholders have undiminished confidence in the integrity of the Companies, and in the ability with which they have managed their concerns.

CALIFORNIA GOLD.

AN IRREGULAR ODE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE.

MACHINE POETRY.

OUR old poetical machine has grown rusty from disuse, and after a great deal of coaxing and persuasion, it has been enabled to grind out the following sublime epic:

THE morn is fair, the sunshine gilds
Our ship's breeze-haunted sail,
And golden hope each bosom fills—
Like voices chaunts the gale.
Where Sacramento's waters flow
God's needy pilgrims gladly go,
And "in for a dig," by digging show
They can relieve their want and woe.
To feed the flame, they come! they come!
An army without sword or drum.
The spoils are sure—away! away!
The land is filled with gold they say.

The Yankee, with hat turned up at the side;
The Quaker, with skirt cut broad and wide;
The Jew, to his origin true, stands fast,
And rests in this Abraham's bosom at last.
They dig with both knife and fork, we're told,
For the spade is too dear to be bought with gold—
The fattest among the tribe grow lean,
Until they use Leavenworth's machine.

This last line is rather long,
But the name must go into my rambling song;
The machine turns it out a ten to the hour,
With a not-to-be-reckon'd man or horse-power.
I must change my tune, and change my rhyme,
The gold of wit,
The gold of fun,

Like dogs, must have their day,
And California gold will have a run,
Like Lester's new and famous play,
And I could pray that Secchi de Casali may Regenerate the land of Italy,
Which he laments he left, so bitterly—
Bayard Taylor, with his "views-a-foot,"
And California songs without a foot,
Must stand on their own bottom;
If he says a word about "free soil,"
And thus breeds a turmoil,
To the rich land of which he's sung so sweetly,
We'll have him banished, and then Lynch'd so neatly.

So gold Crusaders go, with sieve and pan,
Take passage in a tub, or whatever they can—
Leave all the girls without a man!
Preachers, like Popes, leave their pulpits and fly
Away from their people—they scarce know why.
Blow high, blow low, away they go!
They take to the ships which lie in the slips,
Like men who are stricken with plague eclipse.

Go! wanderers, go! and may you never know
The curse of riches—Learn to pile,
In the great desert of the human heart,
The hoarded treasure of thy brightest years;
And may it bring no tears.

The hopes of gain oft fade away,
Like golden clouds at close of day,
Now fly with gilded wings,
Like many other things;

And like this Poe-try for sartin,
Be all within my eye—Miss Elizabeth Martin!

Stop! stop! The machine is broke—the train of ideas has run off the track, and the engine is crashed, smashed, mashed.

H. H. C.

"CAN you tell me, sir, when the railroad leaves
New-Haven?"
"No, sir, I cannot; but presume as soon as the depot arrives."
"Thank you."

THE MAN THAT "WORKED HIS PASSAGE."—It was a "bitter hot day" that; everything was up to boiling heat, people made fires to keep themselves cool by! The contents of the ice-houses boiled over—fat men were languid—thin men, red hot—everybody spread umbrellas, and the tall man of the ferry house evidently didn't care to exert himself to collect his dues. I was using uncommon trouble to place myself at Nahant in a place of comparative safety. There was no railway there to land me at Lynn, and I had secured the services of a "chaise and one" to assist my escape. On board the Ferry I sat in 'chay' with the back open to admit any stray air that might, by any possibility, be in circulation, when a vast black specimen of humanity came down the "drop" in the full blaze of the sun, and apparently rather invigorated by its rays than otherwise.

"Where's Misser Capun?" was his ejaculation to the admiring observers. The engineer was pointed out to him. Ducky pulled off his wool cap, and tugged at his wool head before the "Capun."

"You de boss of de ship?"

"Yes."

"Misser red face up in de caboose dare," pointing to the toll house, "tell me he spec you'll take dis nderwideral to work his passage ober."

"What can you do?"

"Mos anyfin—cook de hand's dinner, reef sail, work de pumps"

"Well, I'll give you a job."

Everybody has seen in the engine room of a steam-boat two poker-ish looking pieces of iron, which during the moving of the engine, are continually in motion forward and back, not unlike the arms of a fancy when "squared off," and by which the movement of the boat is in some way controlled.

When all was ready for a start, Ducky was told to take hold of the handles with both hands, and to move them alternately forward and back, in a certain measured time.

With the first pull, off goes the boat with "squashing" sound; another, and she moves out into the stream, and with every pull or push, moves further and faster. Snowball soon became highly excited, working forward and back, first with one hand, then the other; he tugged lustily at the work until the heat and exertion started the perspiration from every pore, and he looked the perfection of a devouring man—he puffed, blowed, and fairly sizzled.

At this stage of the performance, the engineer, who was almost as much exhausted from laughter as the negro from labor, interfered, saying that after so much assistance he thought the 'pokers' might move themselves, and the dusky man letting go, stood fairly stupefied with astonishment to see the pokers working, and the boat dashing on without any ostensible means of propulsion. His eyes rolled up from the sea, which burst out from him, and there, in the hot sunshine, with his head bare in reverential awe, and his body trembling from undefined terror, while the silence was only broken by an occasional "bres de Lord for dat," I left, with tears (of laughter) in my eyes, the man that worked his passage to Chelsea.

A LITTLE LESSON FOR STAMMERERS.—We would recommend persons who have a slight impediment in their speech to practice reading the following sentence. After they have read it a dozen of times every day, they will be quite cured, or else they may depend upon it their case is perfectly hopeless. "Now Windischgratz, being joined at Schwechat by Palszky, who was, according to the 'Schlesische Zeitung,' the agent of the Ban Jallachich, prepared to meet Messenhauser, who relied on Kossuth relieving him; but Friebe advised him to retire to Burghor, where Limonick with his Magyars was waiting for supplies from Goding. At this crisis, what should Schleswig Holstein do but send t the trusty Unruh to Olmutz to demand terms of Krauss, or else it would be the worse for Wussenburg, who was already in the hands of Dyonsiz Pazmandy, the brave chieftain, who had so valiantly overthrown Czanyi and Luzensky and Croats, near Bugeritaraan, on the right side of Hetzendorf, just between Venoja and Chiarjovenna, the capital of Colico. But Felix Schwartzberg, arriving at this moment, and Windischgratz having received some information in the 'Preussische Staats Anzeiger,' which showed too plainly that Be was a traitor, they coalesced and the result was, they quite cowed Benko, who was in full force at Temesigt. The same day Jallachich entered the Karnthern Strasse."

RATHER IMPUDENT.—After having loaned a man money—dunning him for it, and he borrowing your gold pencil to make a memorandum of the fact, and forgetting to return it.

THE AUTHOR OF LONDON ASSURANCE.—Mr. Bourcicault, the author of "London Assurance," gave the following account of himself recently at an examination before a bankruptcy court:

On being asked what countryman he was, he said he was an Irishman, but his father was a Frenchman. His name was Bourcicault, and when in France he had passed as Viscount de Bourcicault, to which title he had a right. He had pleaded to an action for some theatrical dresses, a plea of infancy, by the name of Lee Morton, was his theatrical name when a minor. In 1843, when he was of age, he made about £240 as a dramatic writer. He was married in 1845, and had received upwards of £1000 from his wife, now dead, out of her settled property.

He was interested in a new opera, entitled "Esmeralda," for which M. Julien had offered him £200, and Mr. Addison, the music seller, had offered £220; he had written the words, and Mr. Benedict composed the music. Mr. Nichols put the manuscript of the opera into the hands of the register of the court, saying that it was given up for the benefit of the creditors. In answer to further questions, the insolvent said he was author of "Used Up," performed at the Haymarket theatre, for which he received £30; and on account of its success, Mr. Webster had made him a present of £40 more. He had received from Mr. Webster about £1000 since 1843, for dramatic pieces, and he did not now owe him anything. In the same period he had received money from Mr. Beale, and a small sum from Mr. Balfe for a song.

The comedy of "London Assurance" was written for Madame Vestris, when she had Covent Garden theatre, and he had sold it to Mr. Webster for £40 or £50. His engagement with Mr. Webster was, in effect, that when he required money, whether on pieces written or to be written, Mr. Webster made him advances. His last transaction with Mr. Webster was in October, when he undertook to write a five act comedy, and he obtained an advance. Mr. Hughes: Has not Mr. Webster a comedy of yours, for which you are to be paid £500, and have received £150? Insolvent: Mr. Webster has a comedy, for which he will owe me £350; that is, I have a contingent to that amount, as stated in my schedule. The agreement was, that I should write a five act comedy for £400. It was finished about September last, and delivered; he has paid me about £40 or £50 on account of it. The insolvent further stated that the opera he gave up would produce £220, and, with the £350 to be received from Mr. Webster, there would be £570 available for his creditors. It appeared that he had a £100 bill discounted by Mr. Lawrence Levy, the father of Edward Lawrence Levy, and he deposited two pieces with him as security. He declined to state the names of the pieces, as it would be unfair towards Mr. Webster.

He got £75 on the £100 bill. Mr. Nichols: That is at the rate of 109 per cent. The learned counsel said he had a document signed by nine creditors, whose debts were £200, consenting to the final order. The insolvent said he valued one of the pieces in Levy's possession at £200, and the other at £50. They were not pieces fit for the Haymarket, and he had recourse to a money-lender. Mr. Levy was at the time connected with the management of the Lyceum theatre.

Says Nan to Tom, with lengthened face, "Now answer me, how is it, sir,
That till its long past six o'clock, you never pay your visits, sir?"
"Well now," says Tom, "don't be cross; you won't I'm certain when I prove to you its not my fault, but of the letter N;
For don't you see, 'twould please me much, to catch an opportunity,
But U and I can never meet before T, love, in UNITY." J. W. W.

A young wife remonstrated with her husband, a dissipated spendthrift, on his conduct. "My love," said he, "I'm only like the prodigal son; I shall reform by-and-by." "And I will be like the prodigal son, too," she replied, "for I will arise and go to my father," and accordingly off she went.

A RAGGED MAN OF GENIUS.—"Oh, I pant for glory, I pant for renown," said a ragged man of genius, to his friend. "Well, if you've a pair of pants, you'd better put them on," was the cool and relentless reply.

We are born with faculties and powers capable almost of anything, such at least as would carry us farther than can be easily imagined; but it is only the exercise of those powers which gives us ability and skill in anything, and leads us towards perfection.

ANECDOTE OF MARRAST.—We heard a story the other evening, says a French journalist, which we will briefly relate, concerning the Marquis Armand Marrast. It was in 1832 or 34. The eastern pavilion of the Palais de Justice, was then honored by the presence of the future president of the National Assembly. Already little papa Marrast, enjoyed among his fellow-prisoners, the reputation of an Aristo, of a marquis, of a Sybarite! Things most incredible, prodigalities hitherto undreamt of by the old democrats were related of the editor of the National. They had even gone so far towards tendering his reputation as to insinuate that he washed his hands daily; and it was decided that vengeance must be taken upon the spiritual Aristo. One day that he was waiting for his dinner, a dinner always exquisite and recherche, furnished by a famous restaurateur at the gates of the Prison, the prisoners discovered a cook, carrying to citizen Marrast the most tempting chicken that could be imagined by a prisoner, half famished and fond of chicken.

It was a real capon, nearly done brown, cooked just right, and surrounded by a crown of the freshest and greenest oreganos! The cook is at once surrounded, and all exclaim: "Oh! the beautiful animal! what is this! A chicken, I believe. Oh! the beautiful bird for Mr. Armand Marrast?" One of the gentlemen, bolder than the rest, delicately seizes a leg, and pulls it towards him. The body follows the leg, owing probably to its former habits and associations, and the chicken, from the plate passes into the hands of the prisoners, and soon into their mouths. The bones, previously preserved, and carefully replaced, presented a very beautiful and faithful skeleton of a chicken, which was respectfully sent back to the Marquis with these words, accompanied by a gesture, of which Mirabeau would have admired the energy. "Slave, go and tell thy master that a democrat is not made to be fed upon chicken. 'Go!'"

GRAND MEDICAL AND SURGICAL OFFICE,

NO. 127 CHAMBER-STREET NEW-YORK.

FOR the Treatment of all Diseases in Men, Women and Children; whether Acute or Chronic; whether Local or General—whether Scrofulous, Syphilitic, or Epidemic—or all Maladies belonging to the line of Medicine and Surgery.

I. Cases of all kinds will be examined every day in the week from 7 o'clock A. M. till 7 P. M. Sundays excepted. II. No CHARGE made for EXAMINATIONS, or for our OPINION in any case.

III. Patients will find our examinations unlike those of any others which they have ever known or heard, and if we do not tell them more about their case, without their telling us any history of their disease, than they have ever known or learned before by their own observation, or that of any of their Doctors, we advise them not to submit to our treatment.

IV. All that Class of Diseases in which delicate and sensitive persons are exposed, by most Doctors, to Surgical and bloody operations, and to means and treatment which burn and torture, and confine the patient to the sick bed, are treated at this office without pain, exposure or confinement.

V. Patients will be convinced beyond all doubt, by our Examinations and Treatment, that their diseases in most, and the worst cases, originated in their childhood, or were inherited from their parents, or arose from a great variety of causes, which neither they nor their doctors ever imagined—and though they may seem to have a dozen different diseases, that in nearly every case they all spring from one root or cause, and will be driven out together by very simple means.

VI. Those Diseases of certain parts of the human system, which are almost universally treated in the first state with Balsam of Copaiba, Capsules, Cubes; by Injections of Nitrate of Silver, Borax, Alum, Sugar of Lead Water—Yellow or Black washes; with Blue or Mercurial and other Ointments; with Bougies, Catheters or Syringes—or in the second state, with Calomel, Blue Pill, Red Precipitate for Corroive Sublimate; with Hydriodate of Potash, Sarsaparilla Syrup, and other like slops—we say before heaven and earth, that by such treatment and such means, as are generally used, we know and can demonstrate, that these diseases have never been and can never be healed. They deceive the patient—they drive the disease into the system, and to other and more important parts—they produce Strictures, Calculi, Piles, Abscesses, Ulcers, Fistulas, Catarrhs, Dropsies, Rheumatic pains, Diseases of the Bones of the Liver, Kidneys, Lungs, Throat and whole system; and either render the whole life of the patient miserable, or hurry him to a premature grave.

Without using any of these Quackish, Ruinous and Swindling remedies, we promise to every curable case we treat, a permanent and radical CURE FOR LIFE by very simple medicine, which is without taste or smell—which neither purges or vomits—nor hinders from business—nor exposes the patient in any way whatever, and which is only to be taken every other night. We can furnish patients with References to Terrible Cases which have been carried out of the Broadway Hospitals as incurable, to die, whom we have raised from the gates of the grave, after all other means have been used in vain.

VII. Knowing, as we do, that most Medicines in the hands of Apothecaries and Druggists are adulterated, and for various other reasons are not to be relied on; we have, therefore established a CHEMICAL LABORATORY, where we manufacture all our Medicines—for this reason we can warrant that our medicines shall do all that we promise in every case. VIII. In every case in which we promise a cure, if we fail to effect this, the money paid for medicine will be returned.

To all who wish we will furnish names and residence of patients in the city and country, whom we have treated for all forms of disease, who will give them all the facts in their case—the nature, extent, and duration of their sickness, and the success of our treatment.

We therefore invite all sufferers however afflicted, or however hopeless their case may appear, to give us a trial—put our knowledge to the test in an Examination of their case—it will cost them nothing—and they will find beyond doubt that ninety-nine cases out of a hundred which are called Consumption, Spinal disease, Cancer in the Womb, or elsewhere, &c., &c., are totally mistaken—there being nothing of the kind. This we have demonstrated in hundreds of cases.

NEVER DESPAIR till you have given our Remedies and Treatment an honest trial.

THE BRAVO'S DAUGHTER, OR, THE TORY OF CAROLINA.

A Romance of the American Revolution.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE, AUGUSTINE J. H. DUGANNE.

PREFACE.

THE leading incidents of the following romance are founded upon real events which occurred in the years intervening between the first and second attempts of the British on Charleston. The adventures of Ernest Rivers are still traditional in the many branches of his distinguished descendants, who now occupy some of the highest stations in our country; and the character and fate of the plotting tory have for their basis many, traditional reminiscences of the South. Wherever the story has touched upon historical events, the most truthful accuracy has been preserved, as the reader will at once perceive; and throughout the story an effort has been made to depict powerful but natural traits of character, leading to the legitimate results of good or evil.

CHAPTER I.

THE DEFENDERS OF CHARLESTON.

Our country! 'tis a glorious land,
With broad arms stretched from shore to shore;
The proud Pacific chafes her strand,
She hears the dark Atlantic roar.—J. W. PRABODY.

On a June evening in 1776, a knot of men stood together upon an eminence commanding a view of Charleston, South Carolina, its roads and the ship-channel down the harbor-bar. Behind and above lay the city, reposing calmly beneath a summer moon, that clothed her scattered white mansions, her waving orchards, and blooming gardens, with a mantle of silver light. Far back in the distance, half enclosing the city in a semicircle of green, stretched the thick palmetto plantations, like a somber wall; and so brightly shone the moon's rays upon every object that the whole horizon presented the appearance of a vast panorama unrolled before the gazers. Below could be seen, at the harbor's mouth, a large fleet of vessels, steering directly for the land, while midway towered the rough log ramparts of the American fortifications on Sullivan's Island. That fleet was a British squadron under the command of Sir Peter Parker, and consisted of nine frigates and forty transports, the latter containing forty thousand soldiers, destined for the attack, and, as Sir Harry Clinton fondly anticipated, the destruction of that small American force which had dared to contest the key-channel of the South.

A year and upwards had passed since the shedding of the first American blood at Lexington and Bunker Hill. During that period, the disastrous expedition to Canada, in which the brave Montgomery fell, had thrown a gloom over the prospects of the patriots, and inspired the British and their tory partisans with renewed confidence in the invincibility of the royal arms. The siege of Boston, it is true, resulting in the evacuation of that city by Lord Howe, had contributed to raise the drooping spirits of the continentals at the north, where liberty was cradled amid mountains and nourished by bracing winds; but in the south, at this epoch, it was far different. There was not that unanimity of counsels which had marked the measures of New England, and consequently, a lack of the prompt efficiency which is so necessary to the success of co-operative efforts. The flame of freedom burned brightly, it is true, in scattered portions of the valleys and savannas which glowed beneath the influence of a southern sun; but the loyalists were in the majority, or, at least, were sufficient to keep down the general manifestation of patriotism.

The Carolinas and the glorious State of Virginia were exceptions, however, to the prevailing spirit of self-interest or not less unworthy timidity. A Henry, a Moultrie, a Marion, and a Sumpter, names bright as suns in the heaven of liberty, were and had been watchwords since the commencement of the struggle, and at the opening of the ever remarkable campaign of '76, the two Carolinas were especially noticed as objects of British vengeance.

South Carolina had replied to the trumpet-call of Bunker Hill with a defying blast against tyranny. She had raised regiments of horse and foot, she had issued commissions, levied contributions and nobly avowed her determination to conquer or perish in the conflict of freedom with despotism. Consequently, she had provoked, like Massachusetts, the inveterate hostility of the British government, and one of the first measures resolved upon by Lord North, at the beginning of 1776, was the sending of an expedition to the southern coast of America expressly for the subjugation of his majesty's rebellious provinces, the Carolinas. Forty thousand Hessians had been purchased, at four pounds eight shillings and seven pence per head, to assist the regular royalist army in reducing the American colonies to obedience, and it was of about three thousand of these united forces that the expedition now consisted, which, under the command of Sir Peter Parker and Sir Henry Clinton, was now preparing to attack the patriotic city of Charleston.

The group assembled on that calm summer's evening, upon the banks of the Ashley, consisted of about a dozen men, of different ages and appearances; and, as many will hereafter figure in our recital, we will sketch the persons of the more prominent for the reader's benefit, precisely as, at that eventful hour they appeared, watching anxiously the movements of the British squadron.

The foremost figure of the company, who stood upon the very edge of the bank, observing through a small telescope the maneuvers of the enemy, as well as the passage up and down the river of a line of boats engaged in the transport of ammunition and men from the city to Sullivan's Island, was a man of about forty-four years of age, though his countenance did not denote him to be more than thirty-three. This was owing to the bluff, good-humored expression which his features wore, and the air of soldierly promptness which his whole demeanor evinced. The hair, thick and long, rolled back from an expansive forehead, and fell in a mass upon his shoulders, and about his firm lip and fixed eye was a determined, self-relying expression that at once asserted him to be no ordinary man. In fact, the individual was no other than Colonel WILLIAM MOULTRIE, afterward a major-general in the continental army, and immortal in history as the heroic defender of the fort which bears his name.

A little in the rear of Moultrie stood a man of about the same age, though in appearance the very opposite of the bluff colonel. He was of low stature, sallow in complexion, and with nothing about him to mark a more than common person; if we except a certain quickness of eye and thoughtfulness of brow, which at the present moment were intensely evident. This man was FRANCIS MARION, a major in the regiment of foot commanded by Colonel Moultrie.

Leaning upon his rifle, a little apart from the two officers, was a man of fine proportions, and evidently of great muscular strength. He wore the dress of a continental soldier, and his fine frank face was shaded by a heavy foraging cap. He stood watching, like the others, the movements on the water, and at the same time closely attentive to the conversation about him.

A square-built intelligent looking negro was on the right of the soldier, and every now and then, as some new vessel hove in sight, addressed some quick remark to his neighbor.

"Yes, yes, massa Jasper," he exclaimed, as the long line of transports entered one by one, and stood directly for the small piece of land called Long Hole, where Clinton intended disembarking his troops; "yes, yes," he continued, exultingly, as the white sails of the ships, flashing in the moonlight, were relieved against the dark background by the water beyond, "they look very pretty, very fine, massa Jasper; but Col. Moultrie, he poke fire into 'em!"

"Hush your noise, Caesar," said the soldier, in whom the reader will doubtless recognize the celebrated SERGEANT JASPER. "They have a tremendous force in those ships, and we shall have to fight like devils to keep them from landing."

"O, massa Marion take care o' dat. Nebber let 'em land while the fort stand, dats for sartin," said the negro.

"Pooh! the enemy's first broadside will knock that miserable log-wall to pieces," said a dark complexioned man, who stood near the negro, with a contemptuous smile upon his lip.

Both the negro and Sergeant Jasper were about to reply to the remark, but a sudden movement of their commander himself, who had caught the last words, anticipated them. Col. Moultrie turned quickly around, removing the telescope from his eye.

"Then, sir," said he, fixing a searching glance upon the speaker, who shrank back as he met it, "then, sir, we shall be behind the ruins, and prevent them from landing by our bodies."

Marion's eyes glittered like coals, as this heroic speech fell from his commander's lips, and his sallow cheeks flushed crimson. Jasper raised his rifle and brought it again to the ground with a ringing sound, and the negro gave vent at once to a half-yell of delight. "Ha-yah," he cried, "dats de way—dats de way we will do it."

At that moment the signal gun from the admiral's ship boomed over the waters, echoed and prolonged by the reverberations of the land, and in the next instant the answering flash and report from the American fort. Marion and Moultrie exchanged quick glances and turned toward the town. Their ears caught the sudden clatter of horses' hoofs, and presently a troop of horse hove in sight, advancing swiftly toward the beach.

"It is Lee!" cried the continental colonel, as with a glance he recognized the foremost rider.

"Ay, it is Lee!" said Marion, smiling, "he has heard the lion's roar, and, no doubt, it startled him."

As he spoke the horsemen rode up, and a gallant looking cavalier vaulted from the saddle, and grasped Moultrie's hand. It was Major-General Charles Lee, commander of the southern army of defense, second in rank to George Washington alone.

CHAPTER II.

THE PATRIOT'S BRIDAL.

There was a sound of revelry by night—
And eyes looked love to eyes that spoke again.
And there was rushing in hot haste.—BYRON.

ABOUT nine of the clock, on the summer's evening at which our story opens, a bridal party was assembled in the mansion of one of the oldest families in the city of Charleston, to witness the marriage of as fair a maiden as ever a sire was proud of, or a lover called his own. Louise Arnout was, at this time, just turned of her seventeenth year, and united in her features and person the charming simplicity of the child, with the half-developed graces of early womanhood—that season of sunshine, music and love, at which the female heart uncloses, as it were, to drink in beauty from all outward things. In stature she was of the medium height, her form slight but perfectly modeled, its proportions rounded, not voluptuously, but with that beautiful waving symmetry, which we admire so much in the angelic creations of a Guido's or a Raffael's genius. She had gentle and calmly-expressive features which, to a careless observer, might seem indicative of too quiet a temperament; but no one who should study the deep, earnest language of her large black eyes, or the thoughtful breadth of her whole forehead, would doubt for a moment that this sweet young maiden, if aroused, might do and suffer things at which strong souls would falter.

There was in truth, much hidden in the nature of Louise—much of that exalted heroism of character that marked especially the women of the revolution, and which was largely shared in by the maids and matrons of the warm South. This young girl too inherited, it might be said, a spirit of lofty independence; since her ancestors on both sides were Huguenots, expatriated from their native soil for conscience sake, who sought in the savannas of our southern country, a home and repose, where they might worship heaven unpersecuted. Her father was an opulent merchant, and at the breaking out of our revolution, was engaged in extensive commerce with the ports of the mother country. Nevertheless, he had not hesitated in the choice of parties. At the first clang of the tocsin, the Huguenot merchant's pulses thrilled with the fire of patriotism. He counted not the cost of opposition to the power of England, but at once boldly promulgated his sentiments and placed his means at the disposal of his native State, to aid in the impending struggle.

From infancy Louise had been betrothed to Ernest Rivers, the only child of one of her father's early friends, who had died many years before the period of which we speak, leaving his young son to the protection of the merchant. The two children had grown up together, shared in each other's sports and studies, and it was no wonder that a strong mutual affection had been the result; an affection tenderly encouraged by Mr. Arnout, who rejoiced that the early friendship of the elder Rivers with himself would be perpetuated, as it were, by the union of their children. The youth himself was every way worthy of his guardian's esteem, and the love of the gentle Louise. At this time he was just of age; in fact the evening on which we introduce him, was his twenty-first birth-night, and the happy hour in which he was to call his lovely betrothed with the holy name of wife.

In these details, tedious as they may appear, are comprised much of the ground-work of succeeding events; so the reader must particularly peruse them, satisfied that we shall have incident enough when we leave the threshold of our story, and mingle with the actors upon the stirring field of real life. At the present moment of time, it will be recollected, the British squadron is just heaving in sight of the mouth of the channel, attentively watched by a group upon the beach. At the same time, the work of fortifying Sullivan's Island is progressing rapidly, and a dozen boats are continually plying between the city and the fort, bearing men and ammunition for the defense of the harbor. And within the city of Charleston itself, at the mansion of the merchant Arnout, the bridal-party with which we have now to do, is assembled, and the ceremony about to commence.

Very beautiful, indeed, looked the young Louise, as with her aunt upon one side (for she was motherless,) and her proud father upon the other, she stood amid the group of richly-clad guests, stretching out her white hand to him who already claimed her heart. Very beautiful was she among all the brilliant array of gay ladies and gallant gentlemen, who filled the apartment, their gorgeous attire glittering in the lustre of a hundred waxen tapers.

Old men were there, shining in the ancient but splendid bravery of the courts of the first and second Georges, with big wigs, and richly-embroidered crimson coats, (albeit that color was no favorite among the patriots;) and old ladies in stiff brocade towering head-dresses, and high heeled shoes, gleaming with diamond buckles. There were young gallants, with powdered hair, ruffles of the most delicate fabric, spotless small clothes and coats bedizened with gold and silver embroidery, and every color of the rainbow.

The officiating clergyman, clad in the full costume of the altar, the wide flowing sleeves of his surplice depending half-way to the floor, while he raises his hands to heaven, invoking the blessing of God upon these nuptials, occupies a station in the center of the room, surrounded by the brilliant company. The bridegroom stands upon his left, his compact yet graceful figure attired in a suit of light blue, delicately worked with silver, and lined with fawn-colored satin, his square shoes and white small-clothes glittering with dazzling buckles, in strong contrast with the plain black scabbard of his sword, the only ornament of which is a single diamond blazing on the pommel. Behind him is the father of the bride, Mr. Arnout, and a group of guests, while at the outer edge of the circle, near the door, are assembled the family servants, their shining ebony faces and white teeth, eloquent with humble joy.

But Louise is still the loveliest feature of the gay assemblage,—clad in a rich dress of white satin, with ruffles of pointed lace, through which her arms and neck gleam like alabaster. In her dark hair are netted clusters of purest pearls, which depend also among the cloud of ringlets that shadows her neck. A necklace of the same, and a single diamond buckle clasping her gown, complete her ornaments, save the brilliants in her white satin shoes, which when she stepped, made a track of light along the carpet.

The windows of the brilliantly illuminated apartment are opened and the soft summer air, laden with the fragrance of a thousand flowers, flows gently through the lattice. The night without is bright and clear, and the skies are thick with stars that almost rival the advancing moon, as she climbs to her meridian. It is indeed such an evening as makes one love all nature and almost wish that no morrow may come, with the hum and bustle of its daylight.

And at this sweet moment, with light and beauty all around, Louise Arnout and Ernest Rivers clasp each other's hands, while the venerable clergyman presents the wedding ring, and pronounces the blessing of heaven upon the pair.

And at this moment, suddenly breaking the stillness, and startling every member of that brilliant company with its terrible import,—booms and crashes on the air, a sullen sound. It is the first gun from the enemy. It is the haughty summons of tyranny rolling from the cannon's mouth.

And now another—a nearer crash—follows, and reverberates through the silent town. 'Tis the first gun of Sullivan's Island,—the defying answer of liberty to the voice of her insulting foe.

And now, pealing from the towers of the city, is heard the solemn sound of bells. And then quick beats of drums, and the note of a solitary trumpet. And then the tread of men—of marching men; thrills through the hushed streets of Charleston.

One kiss upon the bride's forehead, as he places the ring upon her finger—one clinging embrace, as the trumpet-note falls on his ear—and then Ernest Rivers resigns the wife of his bosom to her father's arms. The next moment he is gone from the apartment and the house, and at the head of a gallant troop of patriots, hastens to the river's banks.

Such were the men of the Revolution.

CHAPTER III.

SULLIVAN'S ISLAND.

When our fathers fought for liberty,
Though weak in numbers then,
What mattered it to them so long
The few they had were men!

E. DUNN, ENGLISH.

"COLONEL MOULTRIE, that fort can never be defended!" were the first words of General Lee, as his rapid glance scanned the hasty works on Sullivan's Island. "We shall be attacked at day-break; and yet, look sir, there is nothing to oppose the enemy but a pile of palmetto logs!"

Moultrie's eye flashed: "You forget, General, my men will be behind those logs!"

"Still, I advise the immediate abandonment of the Island!" cried Lee, abruptly. "Remember sir, whom we attack—the veteran troops of Britain. I will withstand them here while a man remains at my side; but it is madness to attempt defending yonder fort!"

"I act under the orders of Governor Rutledge," answered Moultrie, "and must prevent the enemy's passing the Island!"

"And I will strive to cover your retreat!" said Lee, impatiently turning away.

As he said this a quick tramp was heard, and Ernest Rivers, at the head of thirty gallant youths of Charleston, appeared upon the beach. The young bridegroom had merely divested himself of the jewels which he had lately worn, and exchanged his wedding coat for a blue frock—the uniform of the little band. He still wore the white small-clothes, and embroidered vest, which were the fashionable costumes of the day. But instead of the black dress-sword, with its jeweled hilt, that he had before worn, a heavy iron-handled saber was buckled around his waist, and a pair of horseman's pistols hung from a sash that crossed his breast. That sash had been embroidered by the fair hands of his bride, and bore a simple legend, "Love and my country."

Col. Moultrie warmly grasped the young volunteer's hand, while he glanced at his half-festive apparel.

"You are married, my brave youth?" said he.

"Scarce thirty minutes since, dear Colonel!" answered Rivers, his fine face gleaming with enthusiasm. "I have yet to win my bride, however."

"That you will have opportunity enough for, Captain Rivers," said Moultrie, and a shadow for a moment crossed his brow. "We will embark immediately for Sullivan's Island!"

"Here are the Governor's dispatches," cried Rivers, as a horseman was seen galloping towards them. "I ordered one of my men to wait for them, at his excellency's request!"

"That is well, Captain!" remarked General Lee, who had been attentively observing the enemy's squadron, and who had now fixed his sparkling gaze upon young Rivers.

As he spoke he hastily caught the letter which the horseman held, and rapidly perused its contents. Then turning to Col. Moultrie:

"You are directed to occupy and defend that fort," said he, "and to keep your post till ordered to retreat!"

Moultrie's countenance lit up with the generous devotion of his soul, and turning to Marion,—"Let us embark this instant," he cried. "What think you, Major—is the Governor right in trusting us? Will we abandon our post?"

"Never," come from the lips of Marion, his teeth firmly closed.

"Never, while I have life to obey orders," echoed the gallant Jasper.

"Me, too," cried the negro Caesar, drawing up his stout form in a soldierly attitude. "Stick by Massa Marion to de last. Ha-ah!"

Gen. Lee sprang into his saddle. "When you retreat, Colonel, I will protect you, and dispute the enemy's landing," said he.

"Thank you, General—if we need it," was the rejoinder of Moultrie, as he returned the military salute of his commander-in-chief, and watched his retiring form till it disappeared on the road leading to the American camp upon the mainland near the city.

Major General Charles Lee was then in the prime of life, and with a reputation for courage as yet undisputed. His life had partaken, up to the present period, more of the character of the old epochs of chivalry, than of the more modern military times. From his earliest youth, in fact his childhood, he had been a soldier, having entered the British army, as an officer, at the age of eleven years, served through the French wars of the colonies, and then, emigrating to Portugal, fought in defense of that country against her Spanish invaders. Afterwards, in the crisis of Polish affairs, brought about by the election of King Stanislaus, he journeyed to Warsaw, and offered his sword to that monarch. Thence he accompanied the Polish ambassador to Turkey, traveled through Bulgaria, and after involving himself in a perfect labyrinth of adventure, returned to Poland, and was made a Major General in the king's army. He soon, however, tired of an inactive life, and anticipating the troubles which soon after ensued between England and her colonies, set out for America, and on his arrival, took sides immediately with the patriots. Congress joyfully accepted his services, and he was made second in command of the continental army, of which Washington was chief. It was at this period of his life that he was introduced to the reader in connection with our story, as commanding the southern wing of the American army of operation.

Moultrie followed the general with his eyes, as he rode away, and then, turning once more to the other officers who were with him: "He is brave enough," said the partisan chief, "but he has a holy reverence for British valor which we must shake, my friends, by our deeds to-morrow. Now, Major Marion, and you, my gallant young bridegroom, let us embark for the Island."

"To return victorious, sir," cried Rivers in an animated voice.

"Or return no more," said Marion, in his low and peculiarly impressive tones.

"Gentlemen, let us embark," pursued Moultrie. "To-night we sleep not, perchance; but let us recollect that many eyes in yonder city will be as wakeful as our own."

A sudden pang shot through the heart of the young volunteer, as these words fell from Moultrie's lips. The thought of his devoted bride, whom with one kiss he had left, perhaps for ever. But he checked the weakness that for a moment unmanned him, and dashing his hand across his moistening eyes, drew himself proudly up beside his colonel, while the rest of the soldiers embarked in the boat, were rowed silently toward their destination. Then, following in the last batteau, with Moultrie and Marion, the youthful captain soon stood upon that island shore, which, to-morrow, was to be the theater of achievements rivaling, if not surpassing, the deeds of all the Iliad's heroes.

All was silent at the fort when the commanding officer arrived; but it was the silence of determined toil. The patriot soldiers were laboring with the most unwearied exertions to render more secure their frail entrenchments—at least to make them worthy of the name of fortifications. Stripped to their naked waists beneath the beautiful moonlight, the weather warm and sultry, those brave fellows worked like giants; throwing up new rows of the rough palmetto logs, filling it in with sand, which they brought from the beach in huge baskets upon their shoulders, and arranging in easy and elevated positions the small armament which they possessed. This consisted of twenty-six, eighteen, twelve, and nine pounders, amounting in the whole to forty guns; while the total of the fort's defenders was a little over four hundred men, rank and file. And it was with these feeble powers that Colonel William Moultrie had resolved to defend his city against three thousand picked troops of England, led by two of the best officers of those times, on land and sea.

It was a scene of anxious preparation, that small area which the fortifications embraced, and the most generous emulation seemed to inspire both officers and men in their arduous toils. It was such a scene as a little over a year before had been witnessed, when the proud bulwark of liberty was reared upon Bunker's heights—when the first astounding shock was hurled against the invincibility of British arms.

And, as Moultrie had well spoken, many were the sleepless eyes in Charleston itself. Many a wife, bending over the cradle of her first born, watched the solemn fingers of the clock, and longed for, yet dreaded the coming morrow. Many a mother clasped her hands in anguish as the thought of a gallant son at Sullivan's Island would force itself upon her fancy, picturing that loved one lost for ever from her arms. This, this it is that makes war terrible.

We will leave the brave men of Moultrie and Marion pursuing the livelong night their silent labors, and return to Charleston, to pursue the thread of our story, as it winds around new and darker characters. [To be continued.]

EARLY DAYS OF NEW ENGLAND.—We set out Day before Yesterday on a Journey to Newbury—* * * Our Route the first Day lay through the Woods and along the Borders of great Marshes, and Meadows on the Sea Shore. We came to Linne at Night, and stopped at the House of a Kinsman of Robert Pike's—a Man of Substance and Note in that Settlement. We were tired and hungry, and the Supper of warm Indian Bread and sweet Milk relished quite as well as any I ever ate in the Old Country. The next Day we went on, over a rough Road, to Wenham, through Salem, which is quite a pleasant Town. Here we stopped until this Morning, when we again mounted our Horses, and reached this place after a smart Ride of three Hours. The Weather in the Morning was warm and soft as are our Summer Days at Home; and as we rode through the Woods, where the young Leaves were fluttering, and the white Blossoms of the Wind flowers, and the blue Violets, and the yellow blooming of the Cowslips in the low Grounds, were seen on either hand, and the birds all the time making a great and pleasing melody in the Branches. I was glad of heart as a Child, and thought if my beloved Friends and Cousin Oliver were only with us, I could never wish to leave so fair a Country. Margaret Smith's Journal.—1678.

FRIENDSHIP.

BY THOMAS POWER, ESQ.

COME, bring to our altar the thoughts that renew
The best gift of kindness where dearest it grew;

The firm, trusting Brother,
The kind-hearted Brother,
The Brother so true!

O, give me the kind one, whose friendship is found
Unmoved and unshaken, though dangers surround;
The firm, trusting Brother, &c.

When fancy has fled, and when passion is o'er,
I'll ask of kind Heaven one boon to restore;
The firm, trusting Brother, &c.

Though sorrow's sad form at my door may be found,
His voice shall be heard, like sweet music around;
The firm, trusting Brother, &c.

And ever, as time holds its silent career,
I'll mark, with affection, in each coming year.
The firm, trusting Brother, &c.

Then bring to our altar, as time we review,
The tie that shall bind in affection anew;
The firm, trusting Brother, &c.

OH! MARY, COME WITH ME.

FROM THE ITALIAN.

To the much loved shore, fair Mary,
When the evening shadow falls,
Lonely wanders, and on Juan
In the tend' rest accent calls.

Breathlessly amid the thicket
Doth she list some fond reply,
But from leafy covert only
Echo doth return her sigh.

Soon a light bark she desireth,
Which is swiftly gliding near,
And her Juan gaily singeth,
"My belov'd, behold me here."

Let us cross these dancing waters,
Oh! my Mary, come with me!
I will show thee mine own country
From its mountains to the sea.

From the Trebbia to the Enza
Fair Italia thou shalt know;
We will roam to Piacenza,
As my guardian angel go!

To the lake my home encircling
Where the wild swan builds her nest,
In that wave-worn isle together,
My own loved one, we will rest.

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

BEHOLD this wretched victim of despair,
Look on her haggard face and eyes that glare,
Upwardly fixed upon the vacant air,

As if the direst woe
That human soul can know,
Momentously expected hovered there,
And quenched all hope of mercy, while the prayer
Of wavering faith flows feebly from her lips
In agonizing accents, that declare
How dark and dreadful is the soul's eclipse.

And no one bringeth comfort—
Priests of God! why come ye not, why close
Your ears unto the death-cries of this soul?
Have ye no strength to calm its awful throes,
No balm to make the wounded spirits whole?
Oh, kindly look upon her piteous face,
And scan each feature well, ye cannot trace
The print of hoary sin or shameless crime—
'Tis a young mother in her vernal prime
Of life's most lovely season, whom the breath
Of scorching Fever smiteth unto death?

And meaning by her side,
Rest the glad objects of her pride,
Her infants lingering lie, and all alone,
And on her anguished ear rings groan on groan,
And no one bringeth comfort—
Heed ye not, Pastors, the divine command,
Whose echoes still pervade the weary land,
And bid ye still regard the lowly band
Of Poverty's sad children, ere it sweep
In vengeance o'er your houses—"Feed my sheep!"

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY PEREGRINE PENDEGRASS.

IN the summer of 1837, a man named Rawson had been arrested and committed to jail for the alleged murder of Peter Garnut, in one of the towns of the county in which I resided. It was haying time. Garnut and his son, a lad of fourteen years, had been engaged during the day in hauling hay from a meadow some half mile distant from the bouse. As evening approached they completed their work, and the last load was upon the wagon. Garnut mounted upon the top to drive home, and directed his son to go round by the pasture, which lay in a different direction, for the cows. The boy proceeded in one direction and the father drove on across the fields in another. In the course of half an hour the lad reached home, and about the same time the team and load of hay arrived, but without a driver, and the lines dragging on the ground. Alarmed and fearful of accident, the boy and a hired man who was working about the house, hurried off in the direction of the meadow. On reaching the edge of the field they beheld Garnut lying on his back, and Rawson running rapidly across the lot, away from where the former lay. To reach Garnut was the work of a moment. He was dead, and weltering in gore! The hired man immediately pursued Rawson, shouting murder! at the top of his voice. Rawson heard him.

He turned his head; hesitated and slackened his pace. "Stop, murderer! stop!" cried the man, "You have killed him!" Rawson suddenly halted and wheeled round. His clothes were covered with blood and his countenance betrayed great agitation. He seemed stunned for a moment. Then suddenly starting he changed his course, and ran like a deer for the woods, which he soon entered far in advanced of his pursuer and disappeared amid the dense foliage. The man followed to the border, but finding pursuit hopeless, returned. In the meantime the boy had given the alarm, and several neighbors had arrived on the field. On examination, a deep wound was found on the left side of the deceased, tending upward under the ribs in the region of the heart. The hat was off, and there was a severe concussion on the back of the head, apparently the effect of a heavy blow. About four rods from the place where the dead man lay was a pitchfork that the deceased had used during the day, one prong of which and a part of the handle were covered with blood, near this instrument a dark pool of blood clotted the grass; while between the pool and the place where the corpse lay, a tract of crimson indicated that the body had been removed.

Garnut and Rawson were the owners of adjoining farms, and there had long been a bone of contention between them. There was a dispute about the division line. Garnut claimed that a mistake had been made in the original survey and that Rawson was in the possession of land rightfully belonging to the former; while the latter insisted that the first survey, accompanied by actual location and long possession, could not be questioned. The dispute ripened into an open quarrel, and finally Garnut commenced an action of ejectment to recover possession of the locus in quo. This suit was pending at the time of the alleged murder.

Rawson was working in a cornfield adjoining the meadow on the day in question, and angry words had then passed between them. The conduct and agitation of the accused, taken in connection with the long standing enmity between him and the deceased, appeared to satisfy every one of his guilt. Parties were formed for his pursuit. The woods were scoured, and the following day he was discovered concealed among the branches of a tree and captured. An examination was had and he was fully committed. The whole community had judged him, and in their minds he stood condemned. I was not present at the examination. His only counsel on that occasion, was one of the windy and ignorant pettifoggers with which the country abounds, and no attempt had been made at a substantial defense.

The day after Rawson's committal to jail, I was seated in my office reading from the morning paper a detailed account of the "shocking murder," committed by him when a gentle knock aroused my attention. On opening the door a woman, some thirty years of age and of prepossessing appearance, entered. She was pale—very pale. Her eyes bore evidence of recent weeping, and her whole countenance betokened deep melancholy. Indeed I have seldom seen any person exhibit a more touching picture of sadness. She took the seat proffered her, and I waited with more than usual interest to hear the object of her visit.

"This is Mr. Pendegrass I presume," she began.

I nodded assent.

"I am the wife of Rawson."

I understood at once the cause of her sorrow and the object of her call upon me. A moment before, I regarded her husband with horror. I had taken the newspaper account as the true one, and acquiesced in the appellation of "murderer," which had been applied to him. I was now inclined to look upon the transaction differently. My indignation altered, and I really hoped, for the sake of the interesting woman before me that there might be some defense for her husband.

"This is a sad case," I replied, "I fear your husband will find it difficult to establish his innocence."

"O, sir, I fear so too; every one believes him guilty, and yet I know he cannot be; he is incapable of committing such a crime."

"I hope so, my dear madam, I hope so; but are you acquainted with the facts in the case?"

"I am not, I only know that he assured me of his innocence; and I believe him. I came for you to go and visit him in prison; he will tell you all and be able to convince you, I am sure, that he never, never committed that dreadful crime."

"I trust he may, madam. It would afford me the greatest satisfaction; I will go and see him immediately."

Taking my hat and cane, I departed on my errand. On reaching the jail, I was conducted to the prisoner. He was confined alone in a strongly grated cell. The door was opened, I entered, and we were locked in together. The only article of furniture in the cell was a small cot bed, on the foot of which Rawson was seated. I stood a moment, regarding him without speaking. I generally form an opinion of some kind from a person's appearance. The accused was a man of strong frame and rather above medium size. The expression of his countenance was frank and open, and his calm blue eye met mine without quailing, like a man conscious of innocence. The impression he made upon me was favorable, and taking his hand, I said, almost involuntarily:

"My friend, you are the last man I would take to be a murderer."

"Nor am I, thank God," said he with emotion; "though people call me so, I am as innocent of that crime as the child unborn."

His tone and manner increased my confidence, and I hoped that a full exposition of the facts would convince all of his innocence.

I continued: "Mr. Rawson, I am here as your counsel; whatever you tell me will be held as secret as the grave. But I must know all. I must have a full and true account of the whole matter from beginning to end. I must know the worst, and without such a statement, I cannot consent to act as your adviser."

"Mr. Pendegrass, I will tell you all. I have nothing that I wish to conceal. I blame myself for nought, except my weak and foolish, but innocent conduct, in running away."

I sat down by his side on the bed and motioned him to proceed.

"For several years past, Garnut and I have been on bad terms. He claimed a part of my orchard which I bought and paid for, and which I believe to be justly mine. He was not satisfied with the old lines, but wished to establish new ones, and get a strip of land at my expense. I resisted, and at last he brought an ejectment suit against me, which is not yet tried. We seldom met without sharp words passing between us. On the day of his death, I was hoeing corn in an adjacent field. He taunted me with living upon other people's property; I retorted, and a good deal was said by both of us.

"About the time of quitting work, I saw that Garnut and his boy had got the last haycock on the wagon and the old man started off with the team, while the boy went the other way. I was ready to quit work, but thought I would wait a little while and let him pass on first, as I had no desire to go near him. When he had got about half way out of the meadow, and was driving along, not far from my fence, one wheel of the wagon appeared to sink into a hole, giving the load a sudden jerk and pitching Garnut to the ground. The horses went on without stopping, and I expected to see him jump up. He did not, however, and as the load passed on, I saw him extended on the ground. I immediately ran to his assistance, and to my horror, found that the pitchfork, which was on the road, had entered his side, and he was lying senseless. I pulled it out. The blood flowed copiously. I felt his pulse, it beat faintly. I thought I would be able to carry him to the nearest house. I raised him up, and carried him a few rods in my arms. He was too heavy, and I was obliged to lay him down. I pulled open his vest; the blood was still streaming out, and I knew not how to stop it. I then thought I would run for Dr. Morton, who lived nearly three fourths of a mile off, and leave Garnut where he was, as I could reach the doctor's nearly as soon as any other house. I started to do so. I had proceeded some distance, when I heard a voice behind me shouting murderer. I turned my head and saw the hired man running after me. At first I supposed he was on the same errand as myself, but when I heard him cry "stop, murderer! you have killed him!" I was thunderstruck. The position I was in flashed like lightning across my brain. Garnut and I were known to be enemies. We had a dispute that very afternoon. He was found killed; the pitchfork near him, and I running off, covered with blood. All this would be damning evidence against me, and there was no living witness but myself of the real transaction. I hesitated. Fear predominated. I took the very worst course and fled for the woods. You know the rest. I fled like a criminal, but without guilt, and no one will now believe me innocent."

"Do not say that, Mr. Rawson," I replied; "I do not doubt your innocence or the fidelity of your statement. I will examine the matter fully. Have courage; all may yet be well."

Soon afterward I took my leave of him and returned to my office, where I sat a long time considering the course to be adopted. The first thing I did was to go to one of the surgeons who held the post mortem examination and procure an accurate description of the wound. I learned that the instrument had entered beneath the fifth rib, and thence passing upward, grazed two other ribs and curved inwards, passing near the heart and producing the hemorrhage and death. From this description it was evident that the fork, to produce such a wound must have been nearly or quite perpendicular with the body, and turned in an awkward manner to be used with the hands. I next proceeded to examine the fork. The handle of this was at least eight feet long. I discovered that it would be impossible to inflict the wound with that instrument if the accused was standing on the ground at the time. The length of the handle would preclude the possibility of the prong being brought to the proper angle. This examination fully satisfied me that Garnut must have been as high above the ground as the length of the fork, and confirmed Rawson's statement. The next thing was to account for the confusion on the head. I determined to make a personal examination of the meadow. Taking an officer with me I started for that purpose. We called at Garnut's late residence, and taking along the boy that was with him in the field, proceeded to the meadow. The marks of blood were still visible. I looked for the hole into which the wheel had sunk; it was there plainly visible. A drain had once ran through the field, but had become filled up with earth, except here and there a spot. Through one of these the wheel had passed. I now looked closely around the first pool of blood and soon discovered the object of my search. About three or four feet from the pool, half concealed in grass lay a cobble stone as large as a man's head. The top of it was stained with blood, and a few gray hairs (the color of Garnut's) were sticking to the stone. This explained the wound in the head of the deceased, he having doubtless struck upon it when he fell from the wagon. All present carefully examined the stone as it lay, and it was then raised to preserve as evidence on the trial. I now questioned the boy in relation to the pitchfork. He recollected distinctly that it was upon the load when his father started. There was still one other point which I desired to examine. I was satisfied that the fork must have been stuck in the deceased when he was in the act of falling from the wagon, and it struck me as very probable that some marks of blood would be found in the hay. We accordingly proceeded to the barn and commenced a careful examination. It was easy to identify the particular load, as it was the last drawn in, and lay upon the top of the mow. After pitching over a considerable quantity we at last found a small lock clotted with blood. I had now completed my search. Everything had turned out satisfactorily, and I returned home fully satisfied that Rawson's story was true in all its parts.

The session of the court of Oyer and Terminer, at which the prisoner was to be tried, drew near. It was known that I was his counsel, and several of my considerate friends inquired why I consented to injure my reputation by defending a known murderer, whom the whole community denounced?

My reply that I believed the accused innocent, was received with that half sarcastic and wholly incredulous smile, which seems to intimate that a man does not himself believe what he is saying.

The day of trial came at last. The court room was crowded to excess, and a deep interest was manifested by all. The district attorney opened the case in an eloquent speech. He dwelt upon the enormity of the crime that had been committed in the very face of day. He spoke of the long standing enmity, between the prisoner, and the deceased; the fact that they were alone together in the meadow, and no other person near; the evidence of conscious guilt, exhibited by Rawson, in running away and hiding in the forest, and the stains of blood found on his person. All going to establish conclusively the fact of his guilt.

Witnesses were then introduced, who found the facts to be as he had stated, and the prosecution rested. A strong prima facie case had been made out against the prisoner.

In the selection of the jury, I had freely used my challenges, and secured a panel of intelligent and unprejudiced men. I now proceeded to open the defense. In the first place, I related fully what had taken place at my first interview with Rawson. I then stated the examination which had been made in the field, and the array of facts that would be proved, corroborating Rawson's statement and establishing his innocence beyond a reasonable doubt. When the prosecution closed, deep anxiety marked the countenances of the jury. As I advanced in my statement of the defense, this wore away, and before I concluded, a heavy burden appeared to be removed from their minds.

The first witness introduced, was the surgeon, who proved the real nature of the wound, and that it was physically impossible to produce it with the fork, if the deceased was standing upon the ground. I next proved a description of the meadow, and the hole through which the wheel of the wagon had passed; then introduced the stone that had been taken from the field with the stains and hair upon it; and showed its position in relation to the pools of blood when taken up. I next produced the lock of clotted hay, which was found in the barn; then showed by the boy that the pitchfork was on the load when his father started, and finally proved that the course Rawson was running, when first seen, was directly towards the house of Dr. Morton. The previous good character of the accused was admitted, and the testimony closed. A marked change was observable in all present. The prosecuting officer himself appeared satisfied, and offered to submit the cause under the direction of the court, without argument. I consented. The presiding judge delivered a very able and elaborate charge. He carefully reviewed all the testimony given, and finally submitted the case to the jury in a manner which, though strictly impartial, and fully warranted by the evidence, was eminently favorable to the prisoner. The jury consulted a moment, and without leaving their box, delivered a verdict of NOT GUILTY. A murmur of applause announced the satisfaction of the audience.

Yet this was the same man, that public opinion had prejudged and unfeelingly condemned. Rochester, September 1848.

THE REAPER'S SONG.

THE sheaves are all gathered, the reaping is done,
O! who are so joyous, so happy as we?

The last stook away to the haggard is gone,
And the pipe calls us off for a dance on the lea.
Then come, dearest Kate, be my partner to-night;
Tho' the sun's golden glory be quenched in the sea,

The amber moon shines with a mellow light,
A ray that is dearer to thee, love, and me.

Lo! the flow'ret* that folded its petals all day,
Now opes, that the night lamp is hung in the sky,
Like it, put thy coyness and blushes away,
And rival night's queen by the light of thine eye;
For dim is the gloom of moon and of star,
And sad is the music of labor and song,
And weary the time while from thee, love, afar,
To whom every pulse of this heart doth belong.

The Arcadians† of old deem'd deemed their goddess spell-bound

By some wizard of earth, when eclipsed from their sight,
And with cymbal and drum bade their valleys resound,
To dissolve the dark spell with their torches' red light.

Reversed is the magic, my goddess, with thee;
No shadow has e'er on thy fair brow been planted—

No veil o'er those orbs, so bewitching to me,
For thou art the sorceress—I the enchanted.

But come—if you will—weave new charms round
this heart,

For me, I now feel that retreat is in vain.
Enchantress! exert all the power of thine art,
But break not the spell—'twere anguish and pain.
Then come, dearest Kate, be my partner to-night,
Tho' the sun's golden glory be quenched in the sea,

The amber moon shines with a mellow light,
A ray that is dearer to thee, love, and me.

ELEONORE DE LAUTREX.

A TALE OF THE HUGUENOTS.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH,
BY CLARENCE PARKER.

IN one of those extensive rooms which characterized the style of the sixteenth century, a family, were assembled round an old man who seemed to strive in vain to restrain the tears which rolled slowly down his pale and withered cheeks. Seated in a large oak chair, with one leg resting on a velvet cushion, he seemed completely helpless from age and the numerous wounds which he had received in battle.

"O my son!" said he, in a voice hoarse with rage and grief, "your unhappy father will perish, or revenge your death!"

His lady, the Countess de Lautrex, and a descendant from the illustrious Counts of Thoulouse, was silent, but pressed her husband to her heart; while near them a young lady was kneeling, and kissed the old man's hands, which she bathed with her tears: she was Eleonore, the count's daughter. At the other end of the room a young man was seated. The convulsive working of his fine features, the fire which shone fiercely from his dark eyes, and the broken sentences that escaped from his clenched teeth, betrayed the stormy passions which raged within him. Suddenly he rose, and stood erect and menacingly before his father:

"My brother," said he, in a slow and measured voice, "did not meet with the glorious death to which he was entitled by his birth and his high deeds: he was basely murdered by the Duke de Blossac, that sworn enemy of the Huguenots. I, his brother, I swear by the name of our blessed Redeemer, and by the white hairs of my noble but unhappy father, that the revenge shall equal the crime, and that this sword, which has already done execution among the duke's party, shall sooner or later find its way to his heart. And if I do not accomplish this vow, may God punish me, and may I die dishonored."

"Well spoken, my son," said the old man; "your just indignation pleases me. Oh! would I had the strength of former days! then I myself would avenge your brother's death. But, alas! I am now but an infirm and weak old man." And he glanced mournfully at his armor which hung as a trophy upon the oaken panel of the wall. "Go, my son," he added, "Go, and may God protect you."

The young man knelt to receive his parent's blessing, and having embraced his mother and sister, quitted the castle.

These events took place in the year 1560. At this period, France was agitated by the wars of religion between the Catholics and the Protestants. The old Count de Lautrex's father had embraced Calvinism, and had thus found himself compelled to wage war against the King of France, whose cause was headed by Francis of Guise. This nobleman had ravaged the whole of Languedoc, and unmercifully butchered all those who still adhered to their sect. The present count had carried arms in these wars at a very early age, and in time he had been succeeded by his sons, who also entertained the same hereditary hatred towards the Catholics which had been handed down by their progenitors.

In those stormy times, when it was always necessary to guard against surprise, every castle was strongly fortified. The Chateau du Gange, surrounded by a large moat, and flanked by several turrets with loop-holes, had at different times sustained more than one attack, when the enemy had always been repulsed.

Having attained that age when the impetuosity of youth generally gives way to graver and more sober thoughts, Lautrex usually entertained his family with the recital of his campaigns, and above all, would often speak of the code of honor, and of the unerring loyalty which every man owed to its shrine. Uniting all the bluntness of a soldier to the tenderness of a father and a husband, he had accustomed those about him to obey his wishes without the slightest murmur. One hundred men-at-arms formed the garrison of the castle, and he had trained them to the passive submission which was peculiar to the serfs of that period.

Lautrex loved the castle where he was born as ardently as the eagle loves its nest. His daughter Eleonore sang to him every evening some of those charming romances of Provence which were in such high repute among the troubadours of those days; and then by nine all was silent in the fortress, save the tread of the sentry as he slowly paced the narrow limits of the watch-tower. The next day the same routine was observed, except when they were visited by some of the count's friends, when the monotony gave way to gaiety. On these rare occasions Eleonore had always been conspicuous for her beauty and her good sense. Under the reserved and austere habits which the high-born damsels of that period were wont to affect, Eleonore concealed a tender and ardent soul; and being gifted with a beautiful and melodious voice, she was soon sought after by all the young men who by their birth could aspire to a daughter of the house of Lautrex.

In the mean time the name of the Duke de Blossac had become an object of terror in Languedoc. Young and impetuous, he became a formidable enemy to the Protestants; and in a battle which had been fought under the walls of Arriane, he encountered the eldest son of the count, and in the heat of the fray, he had struck him when unhorsed with his lance. The unfortunate youth had immediately expired, and the report was soon current among the Huguenots that the young Lautrex had been foully murdered.

But the duke de Blossac was a brave and loyal knight; loved and respected among his partisans, he would have been equally esteemed by the Protestants, but for the hatred which animated at that time even the most sensible men. Allied to the Cardinal de Bourbon on his mother's side, and attached to the royal cause, he had thrown himself by taste as much as by a sense of duty into those civil wars where no other glory was to be earned but that which consists in shedding the blood of our fellow men. Brave and generous as De Blossac was, there is no doubt that the young De Lautrex met his death by one of those random blows which it is very difficult to withhold in the heat of battle even towards a fallen foe. But his reputation alone was known in the house of Lautrex; for even Raymond, the same who had sworn the duke's death, even he had never seen him; never had they met in the field. But it was sufficient for him to desire the encounter to be certain of obtaining his end, and having heard that the duke was under the walls of Nismes, he set out for that place on the occasion already detailed.

CHAPTER II.

NEARLY a year had elapsed since these events had occurred, and still Raymond had not returned: burning with the desire of meeting his enemy, and always directing his course towards those places where he expected to find him, he was still absent from his home.

It was towards the beginning of May, and a large party had assembled at the castle; it was to celebrate the anniversary of the count's birthday. The night was far advanced, and still the company had not retired, when suddenly the captain of the guard came to say that some peasants had come to crave hospitality for a wounded knight. Immediately the order was given to lower the drawbridge, and the stranger was brought into the castle.

He was a handsome youth, and still carried his armor which was covered with blood. He was quite insensible, from loss of blood and a dangerous wound in the breast; but the surgeon having bandaged it, and stopped the bleeding, he appeared slowly to revive, and for the space of a fortnight but little hopes were entertained of his recovery. His name was still a mystery, and no papers had been found about him by which he might have been known.

When the stranger became convalescent, the family would sometimes assemble in his apartment, and then Eleonore, accompanied by her guitar, would sometimes sing upon the death of the poet Petrarchus, or one of those sweet romances of her native province. But it was not without some apprehension, that the knight beheld the time draw near when it would be necessary for him to reveal his name and religion; for Eleonore had made one of those deep impressions on his soul, which change the whole tenor of a man's existence. It seemed impossible for him to quit the roof where he was bound by gratitude and love. He believed that the difference of religion would be no obstacle to his union with Lautrex's daughter; but he little knew the unbending severity of the count, and, besides, he was far from suspecting all the extent of his misfortunes: he was well aware of having slain a young nobleman at the battle of Arriane, but he was ignorant that the ill-fated gentleman was the count's eldest son.

On his part, the old de Lautrex, notwithstanding the increasing interest which he took in his guest, could not help entertaining a wish of learning his origin. The young Duke de Blossac (for our readers have no doubt recognised in him the wounded knight) feeling all the awkwardness of his position, and that it was impossible for him to avoid any longer an explanation, he determined that for once, love should overrule all scruples of honor. He resolved to disguise the truth for a while, but in order to palliate in some measure an action which he looked upon in almost a criminal light, he assumed the name of a near relation, who passed for a staunch Calvinist. With this exception, he resolved to be candid in every other particular connected with his family, and the peculiarities of his education.

At last the critical moment arrived, the Duke de Blossac could no longer delay, and with slow and feeble steps he proceeded to the count apartment. At the end of a long gallery he met Eleonore, who, surprised to find him alone, and walking with difficulty, artlessly offered him her arm for a support.

"You are suffering," she said. "Oh! what a cruel thing is war."

"Alas!" he answered, "the only regret I feel, it is the thoughts of quitting one day, this roof, where I have passed the happiest hours of my life. But ought I to complain of the horrors of war? Otherwise would fate have led me hither? Should I ever have known or loved you? Oh! blessed be the day, when bleeding and dying I received at your hands the warmest sympathy. It is to you that I am now indebted for my life; it now belongs to you alone, for my heart tells me that it is no longer my own. It was your sweet voice, Eleonore, ringing in my ears like heavenly music, which revived me into another existence. The peaceful and happy hours I have passed, those charming melodies, and that infinite grace, all these have made me feel that life had still some attractions."

The young man was silent; so much excitement had exhausted his strength; his hands were clasped in Eleonore's.

"Are you not going to my father!" she said, quickly. "I know that an explanation is about to take place. The count's impatience will doubtless lead you to reveal matters which can but prove satisfactory to him, but which in your present state of health, others would not have wished to hear."

She left him at the door of her father's chamber, and from that day their hearts were united.

CHAPTER III.

NINE had struck from the castle bell, and the family having risen from their evening meal, had gone to take their accustomed walk on the esplanade facing the castle. It was a lovely night, and the moon, which had just risen, threw on the plain the bold shadow of the castle, with its dingy tower, like a huge spirit presiding over the mysterious approach of night. After a short walk, the party sat down to enjoy the coolness of the evening. The rays of the moon as it pierced through the thick foliage of the trees, lighted up the pale features of the duke, who was seated next to Eleonore. The count made some remarks upon the disasters of the war, and the young nobleman understanding the allusion to be an invitation for him to relate the history of his life, he began as follows:

"My father, the Duke de Clisson, whose fame is doubtless not unknown to you, married the daughter of Admiral Coligny, so justly celebrated in the annals of our naval history. I was the only fruit of that marriage; and at an early age I lost my father. Left the sole heir to an illustrious name and a large fortune, I was brought up by my mother in those strict principles of honor and integrity which are so becoming to a gentleman. But the grief she felt at losing her husband, had thrown my dear parent into a dangerous illness, and for some months her life was despaired of. I need not tell you all the anxiety I felt on her account; but thank God, I was not fated to lose her, and in a short time she completely recovered.

"I was then little more than sixteen; and at that early age all the young men began to carry arms in defense of our holy cause: I could not behold the sacrifice of our brave soldiers without also sharing some of their dangers. I was not exactly adapted for the hardships of war, and I felt that the peaceful retirement of study would have been my more suitable vocation; but the cry of honor, and the all-powerful voice of humanity overcame my mild and quiet disposition. I flew to arms, and became separated from my kind mother, whom I have not seen for five years. I quitted Brittany, and constantly fighting from province to province, fate at last brought me to this beautiful country, this ancient Occitania, which has so often been the theme of the poet's song; and where, by a strange contrast, her sons display a cruelty unworthy of its pure sky and smiling nature.

"Wounded, unhorsed, and left for dead at the battle of St. Hyppolite,—where for the first time I had the misfortune to see my brave soldiers overthrown and completely routed by the enemy, I still retained sufficient strength to crawl towards a thick forest, which was hard by, having first taken the precaution to remove my scarf in, order that I might not be recognised by any of those who might have lingered behind for the sake of plunder. But hardly had I reached the skirts of the wood, than I became insensible from the loss of blood; and from that moment I am quite ignorant of all that passed, until I found myself in this castle where I have since received such generous treatment."

De Blossac's tale was told; and although he had concealed his real name and place of his birth, he had been candid in every other particular. He skillfully avoided the questions regarding his religion, and having been obliged to add another deceit, he was still regarded by the count as a Protestant. "Unknown to us, you still showed yourself worthy of my esteem; I need not tell you of the interest I now feel in your welfare. If we had been instrumental in saving your life, we are now amply repaid. Alas! the same good fortune did not befall my eldest son! He would still have lived had he not been foully murdered by the Duke de Blossac; he was struck for the second time when unhorsed and disabled. But you have doubtless heard of the dastardly act by which that nobleman has lately tarnished his escutcheon."

On hearing this, the duke recalled to mind the battle under the walls of Arriane, where he had slain a knight. For some time he was paralyzed with horror, but he soon gained sufficient command over himself.

"I have never heard," he said, "that the Duke de Blossac deserved the name dastard; and, to speak frankly, I look upon it as a singular prejudice, that in the heat of battle a gentleman should observe a rule that is not looked for in a common soldier!"

"No, no," said Lautrex, "I cannot agree with you on that point. I have been on many a battle field—I have often engaged an enemy hand to hand—but never have I been guilty of so vile an action. The Duke de Blossac murdered my son, and I look upon him as the most cowardly of men. But I have still another son, who longs to meet him; and he, I hope, will soon revenge his brother's death!"

The old count could not perceive, as he said these words, the indignant flush which mantled the proud features of his guest. For the first time de Blossac had heard his name branded with that of coward.

"Come," said the old man, rising, "take the countess' arm, and my daughter shall be my guide to-night, for we both need a support, but with this difference—you, in a few days, will be able to walk unassisted, while I, alas!—"

In a few minutes they had all entered the castle.

CHAPTER IV.

THE duke's position was becoming more and more complicated. He could not condemn Lautrex's hatred against the murderer of his son; but still, in his own conscience, he was far from considering himself guilty of a disloyal action. Before that fatal night on the esplanade, he had always flattered himself with the belief that in time the count might forgive the deceit he had practiced concerning his birth and religion; but that hope was now crushed, and a wide gulf yawned between him and Eleonore. Brave and daring, he little cared for Raymond's hatred; and if he wished to avoid him, it was merely that he might spare a fresh calamity to his family. He now had but one course to follow, and that was to quit the castle. But how could he muster sufficient resolution to leave her who now ruled his heart?

Such was the state of things when Lautrex received one day the following letter from his son:

"ARLES, 10th August.

"My dear father:

"It has been reported here that the famous Duke de Blossac was slain at the battle of St. Hyppolite, on the 5th of May. It appears that he was overpowered by Mons. de Grammont; but notwithstanding the most careful search for his body, nothing was found save a small dagger on which his name was engraved. It is now presumed that he could have been only wounded, and that he must have succeeded in reaching his friends. You spoke, in your last letter, of a wounded knight whom you had received at the castle. Excuse me, my very dear father, but was it not imprudent on your part in not ascertaining the stranger's name before you received him? How do you know but what your attentions have been lavished upon a Catholic, or even the Duke de Blossac himself? Have a care, dear sir, for the more I reflect upon the incident, the more I am disposed to suspect that the fate of our mortal foe is in your hands. I am on the point of taking my departure for the castle, and I hope to kiss your hand a few hours after you receive this letter."

Great was de Lautrex's astonishment at this astounding missive. The duke was in his apartment at the time, and the old man, having sent for the countess and his daughter, he revealed to them the contents of Raymond's letter. There could be no mistake—the battle of St. Hyppolite, of which de Blossac had spoken on the esplanade, and many other incidents, all added to the suspicions which they already entertained.

Every one had retired, but not to sleep. All at once, yielding to one of those impulses, which can only be found in a person of strong mind, Eleonore rose, and accompanied by one of her attendants, she proceeded to her lover's apartment, and without any useless preamble, she said, in a tremulous, but dignified voice:

"You have cruelly deceived us, Sir Duke de Blossac!"

The young man was quite bewildered on hearing his real name pronounced, and made an effort to interrupt her.

"Hear me," she continued; "the night wears on apace, and time was never more precious to me than it is at this moment. Yes, you have deceived us, sir; for it was your duty to have quitted this place the moment that the cares of my family were no longer necessary to you, and from the time that you became aware that my brother had fallen by your hands. But do not believe that I view his death in the same light as my father does. No—in my eyes you are neither a murderer nor a coward. If this declaration, on the part of a maiden, can be of any satisfaction, I only tell you what I feel. But after what has happened you must be aware of the conduct which it was necessary for me to pursue; still, I cannot hesitate when such a danger threatens you as the present!"

Here Eleonore revealed to him the contents of her brother's letter, and the sensation it had produced in her family.

"My father's hatred," she added, "was awakened as strong as ever; and at this moment my brother is hastening to the castle; before daybreak he will be here, and then every evil may be feared from his ungovernable rage. Follow me—I will entreat the captain of the guards to open the gates—if it is necessary I will kneel to him, and I know that he will not be deaf to my prayers. Come, you must fly instantly, or you are lost!"

The young man remained unmoved.

"I have done too much to fly," he replied. "The count and his son are men of honor; and I do not believe they would attack a man who has no means of defense!"

"Rash man!" answered the girl. "Little do you know them; and besides, my brother is bound by a terrible vow. Oh, fly, I beg of you, and take pity on a maiden who is guilty in order to save you. I know that you have no fear of death; a noble blood flows in your veins; but do not add to the misfortunes which already overpower me; for is it not a disgrace when a daughter of Lautrex is obliged to sue to the Duke de Blossac in her own cause?"

Still her lover remained calm and unshaken.

"Oh!" said Eleonore, "do not form a hopeless resolution. I appeal to your honor and loyalty—alas! I appeal to the love that you swore to me, one day. Fly—I entreat you on my knees—do not attempt to justify yourself, I believe you, I understand the past, and I swear that I shall never be a stranger to you, I will cherish your memory, and perhaps one day—"

At that moment a noise was heard in the courtyard—the drawbridge was lowered, and Raymond de Lautrex had entered the castle.

"Unhappy man," cried the young girl, "it is now too late. Oh, my God, have pity on us!"

A dead silence succeeded to this scene. Eleonore had regained her apartment, and nothing was heard save distant and confused steps. Raymond was with his father.

CHAPTER V.

At daylight the duke sent a message to the count, requesting an audience, which was immediately granted. On entering de Lautrex's chamber, he found Raymond, who, with flashing eyes and haughty strides, was impatiently awaiting him.

"I am not come," said the duke, "to claim any indulgence to which I may not be entitled. The same fate which made me fall into your power, has, by a singular coincidence, converted those who were my natural enemies into kind and generous benefactors; although I am fully aware that I am only indebted for this hospitality to the ignorance which you had of my name and religion, and had I not known that the mention of them was an object of hatred to you, I would have undeceived you ere this. But an inevitable fatality which ruled my destiny and which has been a source of perpetual anguish to my soul, has always paralyzed my intentions of being candid with you, and added to my misery, by the increase of your kind attentions. The Duke de Blossac, sir, will always think of them with the liveliest gratitude!"

"I was not mistaken, then," said Raymond impetuously, "my suspicions were true?"

"Allow me to continue!" replied de Blossac, still calm and dignified.

"No—no, sir!" exclaimed the young de Lautrex, "you have said enough—between you and my family there can be no explanations!"

"Sir! between men of honor an explanation is never refused!"

At these words the count rose furiously.

"With a dishonored knight," said he, "the rights of hospitality no longer exist. You have acted the part of an impostor under my roof. Passing as a Calvinist, and disguising your real name, you were not ashamed to accept of all the kindness which was bestowed upon you by my family! But this is not all, sir—you have inspired my only daughter with a disgraceful love! Was it not sufficient to murder her brother, without wishing to destroy her happiness for ever? Duke de Blossac, you are an infamous traitor!"

The duke gazed calmly on him who had spoken this insult.

"Sir, count," said he, "never has any man who was capable of maintaining his words dared to utter them to the Duke de Blossac. I never refused an honorable satisfaction, but I never allowed my name to be branded with impunity. I expected more moderation on your part, sir; and I even flattered myself that after having understood my position, you would have been ready to extend to me a friendly hand—"

"Enough!" interrupted Raymond, fiercely. "We shall never be guilty of so mean an action. A gentleman may give his hand to a foe, but never to a coward!"

"Oh! this is too much, sir!" said the duke; "you forget that such words as these can only be washed away in blood!"

"What! fight with you?" exclaimed Raymond, contemptuously. "No, sir! I have archers who shall do me speedy justice!" and throwing up the window, "Ho! there, guards!" he cried.

Then a terrible scene ensued. The duke, who had become aware of his danger, snatched a sword from the wall, and stepping back a few paces, he appeared determined to sell his life as dearly as possible.

There entered at the same time the men-at-arms, and Eleonore all disheveled, who rushing before them, clung wildly to her brother.

"Pity!" she cried, "pity, in the name of our holy religion, I entreat you not to stain your honor with so foul a crime! You see he is alone against you all—"

But Raymond was deaf to her entreaties.

"Away with him!" he cried to the guards.

"No!" shrieked Eleonore, "stand back, or you will have to pierce my heart before you touch him! Brother, listen to me! Mercy belongs to God, and God has given it to men that they may exercise it towards one another. You cannot be so cruel. You will not blast all your hopes of everlasting life. Oh! let me spare you an act that will render you miserable for ever!"

And bursting into tears the unhappy girl clung closer to her brother, while the voice of the old count was heard exclaiming:

"Leave the room, my daughter—leave us instantly!"

Eleonore was deaf to his commands. Suddenly Raymond succeeded in disengaging himself from her grasp, but quick as lightning she flew into her lover's arms.

"Now strike!" she cried.

Only following the impulse of his ungovernable rage, Raymond repeated his order at the risk of his sister's life. The soldiers advanced, but the two foremost soon lay bleeding on the floor. Then the furious din of voices was heard mingled with the clashing of swords. The ill-fated de Blossac succeeded in wounding all those who approached him; and at the same time he shielded Eleonore from the blows of his assailants. In this unequal encounter, in which, however, he seemed to be gaining the advantage, the young girl seemed to be a guardian angel protecting his life.

Raymond, ashamed, and furious at beholding the evident superiority of his enemy, seized an arquebus, and the next moment the gallant, but unfortunate youth fell dead, dragging in his fall the insensible form of Eleonore.

The traveler who may have visited the convent of St. Eleonore, in Languedoc, has doubtless remarked, in one of the chapels, the remains of a gothic monument of exquisite workmanship, which bears the following inscription:

Acte Posite

MARIE ELEONORE DE LAUTREX,

ET LE CORPS DE

TRÈS ILLUSTRÉ ET TRÈS PUISSANT SEIGNEUR

EDOUARD DUC DE BLOSSAC,

LE SORT QUI LES AVAIT SEPARÉ PENDANT LA VIE LES A UNI APRIS LEUR MORT.

Shortly after de Blossac's death Eleonore had entered a convent, having previously abjured Calvinism. Her lover's remains were conveyed thither, and having become abbess of the monastery upon which she had bestowed her dower, she erected a monument over him; and after a life of exemplary piety she died, leaving as a last request that she should be laid near him whom she loved so well.—[Hood, Nov., 1848.]

FRIENDSHIP.—He who never forgets his old friends, and cherishes his attachment for them as warmly as ever, no matter how much time, space or fortune have kept them apart, is one of those rare beings with whom Heaven has endowed the earth, that society may not utterly wither, through the influence of ingratitude, selfishness and the incessant changes in life. As you advance in life, make new acquaintances, but never forget old friends. How much happier the human race would be if they followed this advice; those who parted, meeting after long absence not with lessened interest in each other, as now, but as Brothers meet Brothers, their affection more glowing than ever.—[Anon.]

LOVE THAT FADES NOT.

ALAS! I know Time brings decay,
And Beauty!—even thine—must fade;
Who can expect the charms of May
When winter's blasts the fields invade?

But mine's the Love that will outlast
The stormy as the sunny hour,
And cling the closer, though the blast
Shall on it waste its restless power.

There's still a beauty of the mind,
Which blooms when all the rest are gone,
Oh! may its fadeless wreaths be twin'd
To bind our mingling souls in one.

Then shall I cherish in this breast,
Thee—lovely flow'r when drooped and fading,
Thy grief I'll share or lull to rest,
And shield thee from the world's upbraiding.

SILENT GRIEF.

NAY, cease to ask the reason why
I cannot gaily smile to-night—
Why gloom alone affects mine eye,
When all around are glad and bright!

My bosom owns a silent grief,
That even thou canst never share,
Too stern for smiles to give relief,
Since thine must pass unheeded there!

But dim not, love, that eye for me,
On others happier let it shine,
The last—worst pang must prove to see
One cloud reflected there from mine!

A REVOLUTIONARY EPISTLE.

Mr. Editor: By the politeness of William Latham, Esq., of Bridgewater, I was recently entrusted with a document in cipher, purporting to be a letter, and bearing upon it the following superscription, "To Mr. Edward Hayward, at Bridgewater, South Parish." It was found among certain antique papers, in an ancient garret, now owned and occupied by the descendants of Mr. Hayward. Of its peculiar history I am ignorant, except from a vague tradition, which merely says that, shortly after the evacuation of Boston by the British, in March, 1776, this letter was received by Mr. Hayward in a very mysterious manner, he being at that time a young man just married, a citizen of high standing, and in no way suspected of hostility to the American cause. Being unacquainted with the characters in which it was written, and, therefore, unable to read its contents, or ascertain the source from whence it came, he carefully preserved it as a curious and somewhat sacred relic of the times. He always suspected it might be the bearer of some strange and perhaps important message of weal or woe to him—though to him unfortunately, it ever remained a message whose lips were sealed in an everlasting silence. As such it was left by him to his children, and by them handed down to his children's children, who seem to have succeeded no better in solving the hidden mystery. After a careful examination of the document, I had the good fortune to detect the cypher in which it was written, and thus upon this favorable introduction, an intimate acquaintance followed and a friendly communication was opened—whereupon this gray haired messenger had the kindness to open its venerable lips; and after an unbroken silence of seventy-three years related to me, for the first time, the object of his mission in the following terms:

"SIR: With pleasure I take it upon me now to let you know that I am well, hoping that the same will find you so. What makes me write to you now is to let you know that I am fixing a plan to blow up the town, and which will be done in a short time if I am not found out. What makes me write to you in this form is for fear that Old Dominie West shall trouble the Grand Committee with it—but I shall not write the name of the town where I live, nor my own name. Sir, be pleased to send me an answer as soon as you can, if you think it worth your trouble, and let me know how you like my plan. I must conclude with subscribing myself, without formality your friend and very humble servant,

April 11th, 1776.
HUDYABRASE."

The characters in which it is written seem to be well formed, as if by a skillful penman, though the orthography is very bad in the letter as originally written, yet it is evident from the letter itself that the writer had language and style at his command. The name of the author his place of residence, and the town where it was written or to which it referred, are all carefully suppressed. Its contents smell somewhat of revolutionary gun-powder; and though of very little real importance to us at this late day, when the battle is past, and the victory won—yet under the circumstances mentioned, and as the voice of a revolutionary soldier just uttered, it may be interesting to the antiquarian. For this reason, therefore, and with the permission of those concerned in the document itself, I have taken the liberty of calling the attention of the public to a translation of its contents, trusting that some one, more familiar with revolutionary events, and better versed in the local history of the persons and places therein referred to, may be able and willing to throw additional light upon the matter.—[Boston Evening Transcript.

ON EARLY RISING.—The laborer and artisan commence their work at a very early hour. The countryman rises with the sun. The tradesman expects his young men to see to the opening of the shop at eight. The city man of business makes a point of being in his office at nine or ten. The idler, or the pleasure hunter, or the man of ton, breakfasts at ten or eleven. We may give each person from six to eight hours rest; as a matter of fact, the later we go to bed the more rest we require.

The quantity of repose necessary for each person depends, of course, much upon their age, sex, and state of health; but, on an average, and with healthy people, seven to eight hours are indispensable. Contrast the health of the late and early riser; the difference is detectable in a man's face. Late hours make a man look as though he had lived half as long again; his face shows deep and strongly marked furrows; and his flesh is relaxed; his eyes look vascular, and the lids look red and heavy. The next day always betrays a man who was up late the overnight. The early riser inspires the healthier portion of the atmosphere, and thereby is a great gainer (for the lie abed breathes a noxious one,) he secures a better appetite, also, and is better able to digest what he eats. The late riser comes down stairs as though he had been washing his face with warm water (a very bad habit when in constant practice; even shaving had better be executed in cold water—the face readily becomes accustomed to it, and is much more refreshing than when warm; a good razor will do its duty with cold as well as with warm lather.)

The face of the man just out of bed, after the day has begun for several hours, or half over is appears puffed and soddened, which, as it encounters the sharper air of daylight, or exchanges with that of the living room, or passage or street for his sleeping chamber, assumes a sharpness and thinness of feature indicative of distress—the shiver completes the tell tale.

A portion of the world live and are awake every hour in the twenty-four.

Let any man undertake a ride or a walk from five till eight on a summer's morning, and contrast the same with a similar stroll or adventure after breakfast, and depend upon it, if health be the object, and the beauty of nature be appreciated, he will give the preference to the former.

It is a healthy sign when a man can wake on the instant, at the slightest signal, and can jump out of bed as he would plunge into a river. The refreshing re-action awakens him up, and he feels as strong as a young lion; whereas, the heavy sleeper, the late man, if awoke suddenly finds himself petulant and annoyed, and then requires, if it be important he should get up, some ten minutes to yawn and stretch himself. He may be compared to the timid bather who stands on the brink of the stream fearing to venture in.

DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.—Ah! what so refreshing, so soothing, so satisfying, as the placid joys of home? See the traveler—does duty call him for a season to leave his beloved circle? The image of his earthly happiness continues vivid in his remembrance; it quickens him to diligence, it makes him hail the hour which sees his purpose accomplished and his face turned toward home; it communes with him as he journeys, and he hears the promise which causes him hope—"Thou shalt know also that the tabernacle shall be in peace, and thou shalt visit thy tabernacle and not sin." Oh! the joys of a divided family—the pleasures of renewed interview and conversation, after days of absence! Behold the man of science—he drops the laborious and painful research—closes his volume—smooths his wrinkled brow—leaves his study, and unbending himself, stoops to the capacities, yields to the wishes, and mingles with the diversions of his children. Take the man of trade—what reconciles him to the toils of business? what enables him to endure the fastidiousness and impertinence of customers? what rewards him for so many hours of tedious confinement? By and by the season of intercourse will behold the desire of his eyes and the children of his love, for whom he resigns his care; and in their welfare and smiles he will find his recompense. Yonder comes the laborer—he has borne the burden and heat of the day—the descending sun has released him of his toil, hastening home to enjoy sweet repose. Half way down the lane by which stands his cottage, his children run to meet him. One he carries, one he leads. The companion of his humble life is ready to furnish him with his plain repast. See his toil worn countenance assume an air of cheerfulness. His hardships are forgotten—fatigue vanishes—he eats and is satisfied. He walks with uncovered head around his garden—enters again, and retires to rest; and "the rest of a laboring man is sweet, whether he eats little or much." Inhabitants of this lonely dwelling, who can be indifferent to thy comfort? Peace to this house! —[Rev. W. Jay.

ENGLAND IN 1685.—Could the England of 1685 be, by some magical process, set before our eyes, we should not know one landscape in a hundred, or one building in ten thousand. The country gentleman could not recognize his own field. The inhabitant of the town would not recognize his own street. Every thing has been changed but the great features of nature, and a few massive and durable works of human art. We might find out Snowden and Windermere, the Cheddar Cliffs and Beachy Head. We might find out here and there a Norman minister, or a castle which witnessed the wars of the Roses. But with such rare exceptions, every thing would be strange to us. Many thousands of square miles which are now rich corn-land and meadow, intersected by green hedgerows, and dotted with villages and pleasant country seats, would appear as moors overgrown with furze, or fens abandoned to wild ducks. We should see straggling huts built of wood and covered with thatch, where we now see manufacturing towns, and seaports renowned to the farthest ends of the world. The capital itself would shrink to dimensions not much exceeding those of its present suburb on the south of the Thames. Not less strange to us would be the garb and manners of the people, the furniture and the equipages, the interior of the shops and dwellings.—[Macaulay.

EVIL SPEAKING.—That you may not speak ill of any, do not delight to hear ill of them. Give no countenance to busy-bodies, who are running from house to house and love to talk of other men's faults. Those who delight to hear ill of others, will soon fall into the habit of speaking ill of them. When busy-bodies run out of matter of fact, they will soon resort to conjecture and idle stories to please those who are fond of hearing others spoken against. Such characters are common nuisances, often destroy good neighborhoods and the fellowship of old friends. If we endeavor in good earnest to mind ourselves, we shall find work enough, and but little time to talk to others.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR.

The South—Excitability of the Philadelphians—Periodicals and Newspapers—A new Railroad Project—Odd-Fellows and Philozatheans.

FRANKLIN HOUSE, Philadelphia, Feb. 10, 1849.

HERE we are again, in the city of brotherly love, on our return. We do not think, on the whole, that the journey from Philadelphia to Washington is a pleasant one, even in the pleasant season of the year, and surely not in this season of storms, and snow and mud. The railroads and steamboats, however, are rapidly improving, and so far as these go, this journey may be made comfortably enough. But the country through which one passes between Philadelphia and the Capital, is level, and apparently not very productive. We do not see, therefore, so many fertile fields, and fine farm houses and pleasant and thrifty villages as we do farther north and east. Still we find a polite, and hospitable and intelligent people, full of noble impulses, and capable of heroic deeds.

Philadelphia is distinguished for having the most excitable population of any city in this country. The people, whatever they engage in, act with all their mind, and heart and strength. All their speculations and enterprises are carried forward with wonderful enthusiasm. The spirit moveth them mightily at times. They become Iconoclasts—go forth and break the idols, and destroy the altars and burn the temples of the Gentiles. Sometimes they wax wroth with each other, and Benjamin striveth against Ephraim, and Ephraim striveth against Benjamin. Still the Philadelphians are a most worthy people. Their only frailty of note, is their impulsiveness; and even this is not without its redeeming features, for impulses are as likely to be noble, divine and unselfish, as they are to be mean, selfish and infernal. It is no small thing for a people to be capable of enthusiasm; for "enthusiasm," said the old Grecians, "is the moving of God within us." Mobs and riots are bad, we admit, but we know of vices a great deal worse. Mobs and riots are seasons of storm, where the passions of men are unchained, and they act without reflection, and do much harm to society and to themselves. But we know of terrible wrong inflicted on the property, persons, happiness, ay, and the souls of men, where the plea of irreflexion on the rebellion of the passions cannot be made.

In a former number we spoke of the prison-like appearance of certain portions of the city, caused by the thick wooden shutters—so unlike the light green blinds or shades in vogue with us—with which it is thought necessary to fortify the dwellings of the citizens. We said, or at least we meant to say, that this fashion seemed to imply a strange want of faith in virtue, and of confidence in each other. Philadelphia is, notwithstanding, a great and interesting city.

This city is famous for its periodical literature. Graham's Magazine and Godey's Lady's Book have long had a world-wide reputation; while in its weekly family reading papers, Philadelphia is without a rival. The Saturday Courier, over which Andrew McMakin presides, has a circulation of nearly fifty thousand, which surpasses considerably the circulation of our Gazette and Rule. The Courier has long been a favorite paper with the public. We had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Mr. McMakin. He is a judicious and able editor, and an agreeable gentleman.

Of the dailies, the Ledger and Sun are the chief, although there are others that are quite respectable. We know little of the Sun, however, save that it has a large patronage, and appears to be well conducted. The Ledger owes not a little of its popularity and prosperity to the able articles of its leading editor, Russel Jarvis, Esq. He is a gentleman of strong powers of mind, of extensive knowledge, and is one of our most vigorous writers. His editorials, gathered up and published together, would form a valuable and interesting commentary on the times, and a brilliant exposition of events, political, social and moral.

There are other journals here that are worthy of mention; and among them are the Saturday Post and the Sunday Dispatch. That which surprises us most of all, regarding the Philadelphia journals, is the exceeding cheapness of them. Papers of the largest class, containing the largest amount of reading matter, like the Courier, and Scott's Weekly, are offered to subscribers at a dollar a year! Will this pay? Certainly not in New York. This price would not meet the expense, scarcely pay for the paper, to say nothing of editors, contributors and compositors. Will our Philadelphia cotemporaries reveal to us this secret of cheapness?

We see that an effort is making to procure from the New Jersey Legislature, a charter for a new railroad from New York to Philadelphia. This project has been conceived by some restless and disappointed spirits, who hold grudges against the Camden and Amboy and New Jersey Railroad Companies. For our part, we see no room for a new route between these two cities. The present lines offer ample accommodations to the traveling public, and it would be worse than madness to establish another. The existing roads are well managed, and the administration of their affairs is in the hands of gentlemen of known probity and worth. We have no idea the new project will succeed.

The Odd-Fellows of this city are living and active, and so are the Odd-Ladies, of whom we are told there are many. The Philozatheans, for this is the name these lady Odd-Fellows have assumed, are full of zeal, and are rapidly increasing. We wish them much success.

To-morrow we shall leave our snug quarters here at the Franklin House, and return to New York. We again introduce Bro. Burroughs, the proprietor, to our readers, as the prince of hosts. His house is superbly kept, and all our friends must give him a call.

ODD-FELLOWS AND THE CHURCH.

POLISHED nations, from the remotest ages of antiquity, have always had their secret societies, either benevolent or political. The history of Egypt—that of the Assyrians—the schools of Philosophy in Greece—the traditions of Cosmogony—the sacred colleges of the Syrites, are many and sufficient proofs that their origin is founded upon the necessities of every age and nation. We find that Masonic Societies flourished before the Christian era, and afterward it was even countenanced by St. John, and by many other Evangelists. The principles of Masonry and Odd-Fellowship are just the same as those of Scripture—Love, Charity and Brotherhood. But in spite of the charitable objects of these societies, and the good performed by their members, the many thousands of hungry, perishing and cold helped by them, we find the Church of Rome hurling its bulls against them, and employing every art of intrigue and fanaticism to injure and calumniate those who have saved her religious children from starvation, in Ireland and elsewhere. In Europe, where secret societies were established for charitable and political purposes, they have suffered persecutions of all kinds by royal despots; but the Church has sometimes been equally culpable in torturing and executing the members of these societies.

Bulls of excommunication were hurled by the Popes against Masons and Carbonari in Italy, as tending to inspire religious indifference, contempt for the Church sacraments and the mysteries of Catholicism, to deteriorate morals and destroy all social order! The members, when discovered, were anatomized, tortured by the Inquisition, and executed as criminals on the gallows of infamy. These monstrous persecutions were practiced but a few years since in Rome, under Gregory XVI; and here in this country, where there is no union between Church and State, the Catholic Bishops, impotent to practice corporal punishment, avenge themselves upon a dead body. They refuse to bury any member of the Order of Odd-Fellows, and look upon him as worse than a murderer or a parricide. The Church of Rome does not pardon even after death, nor regard the sanctity of the desolate family of the dead. We have often read and recorded the great intolerance of Priests toward Odd-Fellows and Masons; and we find at present another instance, in the Rochester Democrat, which we give to our readers as a good proof of our assertions. The Democrat says:

It will be remembered that some time since the Catholic Bishops or some other authority of the Church, issued letters against secret societies of all kinds; and the clergy prohibited from encouraging them in any way. Yesterday, at the funeral of Mr. Ray Marsh, several Lodges of Odd-Fellows, with their usual badges, followed his body into St. Patrick's Church. Father O'Reilly, however, before proceeding with the funeral services, gave notice that the rules of the Church forbade the tolerance of such badges, and unless they were removed, the ceremonies could not proceed. Whereupon the Odd-Fellows left in a body, followed by several of the citizens who sympathized with them, and returned to their Lodge rooms.

We admire the noble conduct of the Odd-Fellows of Rochester in general, in leaving the Church and returning to their Lodges, which are the sanctuaries of true religion; where is preached Love, Charity and Brotherhood. The persecutions of these demagogues in priestly gowns, who pretend to rule over people as absolute masters of the consciences and bodies of their communicants, should be stopped; and we think it is time to adopt urgent measures, so as to avoid in future anything disagreeable at the burial of a Catholic brother. The Catholic Church, which wishes to know by the way of confession, all the secrets of the human heart, cannot endure that another society, established on more noble principles, should prevent its members from revealing to a religious spy the secrets of its institutions. As the Pope has been overthrown by the Romans, so we hope that our Catholic brothers will throw off the authority of ignorant and fanatical Priests. We shall have more to say upon this subject.

CYPRESS HILL CEMETERY.

Is a burial ground just consecrated on the most beautiful spot of Long-Island. It is as easy of access as could be desired, and afar from the struggle and strife of the world, and here the dead sleep in silence and peace, undisturbed and safe from vandal invasion. At the dedication of this place of graves, C. Edwards Lester, Esq., delivered an eloquent address, which is creditable to our Literature. The orator says, "at this solemn occasion, here midway between the creation of man and the great day of resurrection, we are come to prepare a tomb of repose for an hundred generations." It is time that there should be a burial place prepared, especially by philanthropic societies, where they can entomb their brethren, sure that their dust will return from whence it came, undisturbed, as is not often the case in the city cemeteries. This place affords an opportunity for the city authorities to purchase ground to bury the poor who leave the world without a friend, and are carried to "Potter's Field," where bodies are often stolen, mutilated and dissected. Only a few weeks since we had an account of a young man's search for the body of his father at the burying ground for paupers. Six coffins were opened, and found only—"mutilated remains"—"pieces of flesh"—"parts of bodies which had undergone" all sorts of mutilations, too horrid to recount, and the cause of this great evil in our large city, is the want of graves for the poor! Certainly, no civilized or demi-civilized race exhibit so little consideration for the dead, as our beloved Anglo-Saxons on either side of the water, especially in large cities. The French dress graves in flowers; wherever Spanish manners prevail, a funeral is a festival. In Germany the grave is an object of affection; in Italy of sanctity. But among the Mahometans of all countries, the grave is specially an object of both piety and sanctity. When we visited the Turkish cemeteries in the vicinity of Constantinople, we felt shame for some parts of Christendom, especially Protestant Anglo-Saxon. The creation of the Cypress Hill Cemetery is one step toward the removal of this grievance.

BROTHERHOOD.

AMID the turmoils and strife and difficulties of this world, in the midst of its utter selfishness and abandonment of every social relation, it is sweet to realize that we can occupy one spot held sacred to the purer feelings of our nature, and that is Brotherhood! Man has ever been reaching for something more elevated than the mere instincts of his animal life. There is that within him, the tendencies and aspirations of which are far beyond the groveling appetites of earth, and which unite him, it may be remotely, to a nature altogether angelic. Hence, in a venerable book, we read that man "was created but little lower than the angels." If thus allied to the beings of a purer and a better world, we have reason to believe that his angel-life is begun here, and that all of good he is permitted to accomplish is by the influence, and under the direction of the spiritual influence, of his semi-angelic nature. This tends to Brotherhood,—under the belief that we owe our origin to a common cause, our Father, and our God. All nature teaches this; and her harmonious tunes go up to Heaven at morning, noon, and eve—when Winter comes, with its frost and snow, and bitter wind—or when Summer greets us with her spicy gales and flowers—or Autumn shares her ripened fruits and garnered stores. And the Son of Man also taught the same holy truth—he taught it by precept and example—he taught it through an advent of suffering and trial—mid his bitterness and tears! Yet, alas! and the earth mourns it—the teachings of nature are neglected, and the admonitions of the Son of God pass by as the idle winds, unheeded by thousands of his professed disciples! Oh, where is Brotherhood?

Answer: In Odd-Fellowship! And we say it is sweet to reflect that there is one spot in the world's wilderness where the angel of Brotherhood can rest her weary wings! A thousand altars are consecrated to her service,—and myriads of human beings, united in the holiest bonds, offer their nightly vows to love and serve each other,—to be friends in storm and shine,—to be brothers in weal and woe! While sects abound and fanatics rail, Odd-Fellowship is a Brotherhood! While strife and selfishness prevail in the world without, it is a blessed reflection that in our Lodge rooms the spirit of Brotherhood is cultivated,—that lessons of good are there learned, which benefit the world by practice.

Bless the Order, then! Its mission is a high and a holy one. It is an adjunct of all that is good, and is destined to effect its share in the redemption and regeneration of the world! Falter not, ye skeptics! Come and see, and you will perceive that something good can "come out of Nazareth." P.

AERIAL NAVIGATION.

WITH other representatives of the Press, we visited Washington Hall, a few days since, to witness some experiments in aerial navigation. We confess frankly that we had no faith whatever in the feasibility, nor even in the possibility of the project. We considered that there were several insuperable difficulties in the way of ever achieving a safe and rapid progress through the air; but the experiments which we witnessed at Washington Hall have vanquished all our doubts. That the sanguine expectations of Messrs. Hannegan and Porter, however, will be realized as speedily as they anticipate, we do not believe. Yet we have not a doubt that the efforts of those gentlemen will be successful, and that before the expiration of a year, we shall see several of these aerial steamships navigating the "waters that are above the earth."

The model exhibited on Thursday of last week is about twelve feet in length, sharp at both ends, so as to offer the least resistance to the air. The instrument of propulsion is a collection of paddles, made to revolve rapidly, and strike the air in a peculiar manner, producing a beautifully steady as well as rapid motion. We consider this one of the most important inventions of the age, and believe it will be productive of immense results.

ALLEN LODGE NO. XCII, HUDSON.

HUDSON, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1849.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GAZETTE AND RULE: Much has been said by the New Constitution brethren in this State, in regard to the course pursued by Allen Lodge No. 92, and especially some of her members, in obeying, promptly and honorably, the mandates of the acknowledged supreme head of the Order, the Grand Lodge of the United States, in its decision upon the New York controversy. Many hard names have been heaped upon her, by those who profess to be governed by the pure spirit of Friendship, Love and Truth! She has wrongfully been accused of manifesting "a want of good faith," of "deserting her friends," of "committing an assault upon the New Constitution party," of "proving recreant to principles of reform," and so on to the end of the chapter. Not being satisfied of making an attack upon the Lodge, they have also grossly misrepresented, either ignorantly or intentionally, the motives of some of her members—they have been accused of having been governed, in the part which they took in the controversy, in submitting to the decision of the G. L. of the U. S., by sinister motives, because, forsooth, they had, during the difficulties in the Order in this State, advocated certain measures of reform.

I do not wish, and would not knowingly, offend any one; yet I must be allowed to say in all candor, there has been manifested by our opponents, in many instances, an utter disregard of plain and open fairness. They have many times exhibited a strong disposition to pervert facts, and use sophistry instead of truth. Many dark insinuations have been thrown out, and left unexplained for doubtful inferences to be drawn therefrom; and false imputations have been made, which it would have been much more manly, but not perhaps so easy of evasion, to have openly and bravely affirmed. Many of their assertions, I fear, have been dictated by something beside ignorance or good-will. It must, however, be a poor cause that cannot be sustained by strong arguments, but must bring in the aid of low wit and misrepresentation.

It will not be denied that Allen Lodge was in favor of certain needed reforms in the Order, and that some of her members advocated those reforms. It is a well known fact that she stood in the front ranks of those Lodges which were suspended by the Grand Lodge of this State, for insubordination to the legal authorities in this jurisdiction. She also sent a full delegation to the celebrated "Albany Convention," and also paid her "assessment" to carry on the warfare, which was no small sum, I can assure you. She had, however, previous to the holding of said Convention, at a regular meeting, (I think on the reading of Grand Master Joseph R. Taylor's Proclamation,) unanimously adopted resolutions, that she would abide by, and sustain, the decision of the Grand Lodge of the U. S., when it should be made. She was induced to adopt resolutions of this kind, from a sense of duty which she owed the Order at large, and from the fact, that it was generally conceded the New Constitution brethren were perfectly willing to leave the question of our difficulties for settlement to the G. L. of the U. S., and that they would submit to that decision with cheerfulness and in good faith. But it should be remembered that there is a vast difference between advocating needed reforms, or remaining in open rebellion to that supreme head, to which both parties professed a perfect willingness to submit the question of difference for adjustment, and openly avowed their intention before-hand to acquiesce in said decision. The advocating of necessary reforms, if conducted in a proper manner and in the right spirit, the spirit of true friendship, conciliation, and marked by a love of truth, cannot result in evil consequences, either to individuals or to our vast-spread brotherhood. The right, in such controversies, carried on in the above named spirit, must and always will conquer. Light and knowledge will dispel darkness and ignorance. Truth will overcome error under all circumstances. But, on the other hand, insubordination or rebellion, call it which you please, will never accomplish any good purpose—will never satisfy any that you occupy the right position, or convince any one of error, but will be of lasting evil to all concerned. In my opinion, the end or result desired to be brought about by the New Constitution brethren, could be much better effected, by submitting to the decision of the G. L. of the U. S., than to remain in the position which they now occupy, and which they wished Allen Lodge to occupy. If they had complied with the mandates of the supreme tribunal of the Order, they would have given, as Allen Lodge has, an evidence of the sincerity and fidelity of their attachment to their cherished principles, which would have exerted a powerful influence over the minds of those who might compose the G. L. of the U. S. at any future time, when the professed friends of reform should feel disposed to carry the question of their grievances again before that body, for a rehearing. The New Constitution brethren could say: "We have, as brethren are in duty bound, obeyed your decision, although we conscientiously believe your decision was, in point of fact, wrong; that you overlooked many material facts and circumstances that we think have a strong bearing upon the case; we would therefore most respectfully petition your worthy body to give us a rehearing upon the subject."

But, as it now stands, that body have no good grounds to meddle in the matter at all. What evidence has it, or will it have, that its decision, if made a second time, would meet with any better reception from the New Constitution brethren than heretofore? It has none. If the question should, in any shape, go before the G. L. of the U. S. for a rehearing, that body would undoubtedly say: "Obey our late decision before you petitioned us to reverse, alter or amend our acts made in your cause, and then we shall have an evidence of your sincerity, and will believe you will obey our future decision. Until you do this, we cannot, consistently, as men and as Odd-Fellows, take any notice of your request. You are in a state of open rebellion to our laws and regulations; first become reconciled to our requirements, and then we will hear your petition."

Viewing the subject in this light, Allen Lodge was induced to take the steps she did, which resulted in her re-instatement into the Order; and thus she acquiesced in the decision of the G. L. of the U. S. I fully believe all the Lodges, situated as she was, should have followed her example. If all the other Lodges had gone back under the old order of things, they certainly could have in time, accomplished all they could wish; for they would have had a large majority in the Grand Lodge of this State, and as a matter of course, could have adopted such regulations and laws as they might deem for the best interest of the whole Order. They having learned experience by the past, could easily have shunned the rocks upon which they had run in their previous voyage—they could eventually have adopted the New Constitution, or one that would have met the views of the Order generally in this State.

But, because Allen Lodge thought it not only proper, but right, to redeem her previous pledge to be governed by the decision of the highest tribunal in the Order, does not debar her from advocating, and being the friend of all necessary reforms, by any means. It does not necessarily follow that she has changed her views upon any of the questions which she previously took a part in. She always has, and does now, believe that the so called New Constitution was better calculated to meet the wants of the Order in this jurisdiction, than the Old Constitution. Although Allen Lodge was a New Constitution Lodge, she did not under the cry of reform, swallow it down at one gulp, simply, because it came from one particular party. She never believed it was perfect—it had as she viewed it many defects. What she saw in it that was good, she approved, and so she does at the present time, the ipse dixit of some to the contrary notwithstanding. She is as much in favor of all needful reforms as she ever was; and so far as I can judge, her members are in favor of introducing into our organization as much pure republicanism as possible, and of striking off all and every feature which has the least semblance of anti-republicanism.

Thine, as ever, AMICUS.

LETTER FROM BOSTON.

Boston, Feb. 16, 1849.

GAZETTE OF THE UNION: It is quite as cold as—"no consequence" Mr. Toots would swear at, in this goodly city. While I write, the mercury in a thermometer "in the shade," outside my window, has fallen to 3 below 0. It is difficult to get one's ideal steam up without its congealing instant.

En passant, talking of steam, I came on yesterday from your city, in the steamboat "State of Maine," an easy, substantial, and withal swift craft, with a most gentlemanly captain, a courteous clerk, and attentive servants. I like the Stonington route in many respects, only wishing that a better fire could be kept in the cars, without continual poking by the fireman. A stove should not be too much subject to the "man with the poker."

Boston is constantly and rapidly improving. It is astonishing what "seven league boots" these Yankees put on in the way of business. Nothing stays or daunts them. Salt marshes are to their eyes only so much foundation for future granite blocks, and as for useless or unimproved land, Boston contains none. Such unsightly and profitless buildings as one meets in Chatham, Center, Nassau, and other streets of New York, would not be tolerated a day by these good citizens. The "Five Points," under the influence of Yankee improvement, would have been covered five years ago with substantial warehouses. I verily believe there is no city in the Union which is so ambitious of excelling in architectural beauty, as that "of notions." Philadelphia and New York must make long strides to overtake the Yankee pioneers.

Amusements here are on the wane, except, indeed, "Mrs. Pierce Butler's" readings, which are the rage. It is estimated that the amiable Fanny nets $1200 per week by these entertainments; better than a jointure with that "elegant man," her husband, or a "separate maintenance," at any rate.

The Buena Vista celebration, to take place on the 22nd inst., occupies a considerable share of public attention. The dominants will, no doubt, enjoy it. I see by the papers that various entertainments and celebrations will mark the anniversary of the pater-patrae. Among the rest, I perceive that Duganne, the poet, delivers an address or poem before the Mechanics' Association, at the Masonic Temple, on the evening of the 22nd.

I leave for the eastward to-morrow, and will write again soon. My quarters in this city have been at the Pemberton House, kept by Murdoch, well-known as a gentlemanly host and good citizen. The location of this house is excellent, being at the same time central and quiet. It is in Howard-st., next door to the Athenaeum.

Sleighting continues good, and horses know it. The Temperance Convention, lately in session at the Tremont Temple, adjourned this evening.

The California fever is scarcely abated as yet; companies being still in process of formation. When will men get wise by experience? Echo answers, "Really, I don't know." Buenos noches. GUENDAN.

LETTER FROM PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 18, 1849.

THE people of Philadelphia have been "let down" a little since the "Hyer" excitement has passed away, and now that the "sober second thought" has come many of those who were turned topsyturvy in their mad enthusiasm in favor of the lion of the ring, begin to think the whole affair was most disgraceful and shockingly disgusting.

WITHIN the past week we have had very cold weather—some say the very coldest of the season. The skating on the Schuylkill is very fine. The Delaware is full of ice abreast of the city.

THE ship Mason sailed on Monday from this port for California. She took a full cargo of freight and 150 passengers, real good fellows, some of whom we know full well, who go to seek their fortunes on the banks of the Sacramento, the El Dorado of the 19th century. Well, we have only one wish to utter for the adventurers, and that is, may they be well dust-ed when they return.

A MEETING of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, I. O. of O. F., was held on Monday evening last. There was a pretty full attendance of the members, but little business of consequence was transacted.

IN the Subordinate Lodges the initiation of new members is increasing, I think—a pretty fair evidence that the rising generation fully appreciate the utility of Odd-Fellowship.

THE cold weather, it appears, has a tendency to drive people to our places of public amusement, if we may judge from the fact that they are all crowded nightly. The play of "Monte-Cristo," dramatized from one of Dumas' novels, was the "card" at the Walnut and the Arch for three consecutive weeks. It had a great "run," and now they've run it off to make room for other novelties. Burton has introduced a burlesque called "Monte-Christy," and a sparring piece called "Fistimania"—both are said to be good enough to laugh at, and the latter of a higher order than usual. Tom and Jerry has been revived at the Walnut by Marshall, and seems to take as well with the public as it did twenty years since.

THE National Circus is still the center of attraction. Welch (the General) is well patronized, and he deserves it. The Ethiopian Serenaders are doing well at the Chestnut. The concern is under good management, and the house is always well filled. The Athenaeum is the place where Major Littlefinger holds his levees, and where Harrington shows forth his ventriloquian powers. This place is looking up. Blitz, the great Blitz, is playing the devil at the lecture room of the Chinese Museum. He makes money, and he deserves to, for he's a clever fellow.

WHEN you visit Philadelphia again, you must permit me to introduce you to a young friend of ours who has just opened in front of the Masonic Hall, Chestnut-street, one of the neatest establishments for the manufacture and sale of Perfumery that we know of. His store is full of sweets, and all sorts of delightful matters for the hair, the face, the clothes, the nose—for the ladies, the beaux and the babies. You must drop in at Harry Guiler's when you pass this way.

I ENCLOSE you a poetical effusion from a talented young friend and brother Odd-Fellow, James W. Coffroth, Esq. He is one who, by dint of persevering industry in cultivating the genius and powers which belong to him, has gained some deserved laurels in the literary world. He promises to send you other articles from time to time.

DEATH OF AN ODD-FELLOW—AND BENEFITS OF THE INSTITUTION.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—On Thursday evening last, Mr. Caleb Parsons, late a member of the Quinpiac Lodge, No. 1, I. O. of O. F. in this city, departed this life, after suffering three years and more, with that insidious disease, consumption; and it is worthy of remark that this death, out of four hundred and fifty-one members which that Lodge comprises, is the first that has occurred in sixteen months; a circumstance by the way, which tends to show the healthy state of the members of that Lodge. Brother Parsons, during the whole period of his sickness, has been diligently cared for by the members of his Lodge. Not only has he been watched when his sick bed required it, but from the time he was reported sick, to the day of his death, he has been in the receipt of four dollars and twenty-five cents per week, from the funds of the Society, which the following receipts, copied from the books of the Lodge will show, amounts (funeral included) to seven hundred sixty-five dollars and twenty-five cents, viz:

1846—February 2, $33 50; March 23, $34; May 25, $28 25; September 21, $55 25; December 21, $59 50.

1847—March 1, $51; August 2, $89 25.

1848—January 31, $108; July 24, $92.

1849—January 1, $106; two weeks due $8 50; funeral $30. Total $765 25.

Who will doubt after reading the above statement, but the institution of Odd-Fellowship is a noble one! By the way, a number of times has brother P., when I was Chairman of the "Sick Visitation Committee," expressed his thanks and gratitude to the members for their kindness and attention. "In fact," said he, "were it not for the Order I have the good fortune to be connected with, I must have gone to the Alms House ere this. Yes, brother G." added he, "the money I receive from that, not only keeps me off the town, and pays my board bill, but other contingent expenses that make me comfortable." Such were the generous, grateful sentiments of our departed brother; and such show the benevolence and usefulness of the I. O. of O. F. May the Order, and all such noble institutions flourish, is the wish of the writer, who has been a member of the same some thirty-five years, and has the pleasure now of subscribing himself in F. L. and T., yours very respectfully. W. G.

ARTISTS AND HONORS.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH FOR THE GAZETTE AND RULE.

NERO prided himself more upon his skill as a musician, than upon his position as Emperor of the Romans. When menaced by the downfall of his greatness, and fearing the loss of all the advantages of his station, he said: "What matters it?—talent is always wealth." Even when at the point of death, the musician thought not of his empire, but of his talent—"Proh Jupiter! qualis artifex pereo"—an almost sublime expression, but our historians have neither noticed or appreciated it. In giving the following extract from the old Revue de Paris, we will not commit any plagiarism:

"Nero died as he lived, an artist and a musician; he expired with consciousness of his talent; a skill acquired by twenty years of study and assiduous perseverance, and which he could not bequeath to any person. The artist was dead to his country and countrymen, then; nothing remained but to elect his successor to the empire. Nero thought no more of his regal estate, for he well knew how easy it was to fill up the vacancy. He also knew that the thunder-bolt, the plague, fever, the disease of Francis the First, could mow down all the potentates of the earth. This would certainly be a loss to the families and friends of these gentlemen, but would it be to the world in general? A rise or fall in the funds, a few notices in the newspapers, and profits to the undertaker for the pomp and parade of funerals, would be the only result of such an event. The next day you will find plenty of sons or brothers, adventurers or idiots, ready to succeed them. It requires the gifts of nature, genius and study, with a constant application, and twenty years' experience, to be an artist; and but ten minutes are sufficient to enthrone a king. He is supposed to be an ass, and is given seven or eight hundred tutors, among whom the fools are numerous, and is thus afforded a margin to choose from. You will always have more kings than you wish for; that is clearly seen; their history attests it. The great artist, however, resembles a meteor, a star, which illumines the horizon of the world at periods 'few and far between.' If a king be sick they laugh at him, and say that he has eaten too much soup or truffles; if he cut his throat, the philosophers discourse upon the danger of arrogating to oneself the right of taking away life; when they lose the reins of power by a pistol shot, as was the case with Gustavus the Third. Vagabonds perhaps will make an excuse for it, or may be sufficiently impertinent as to praise the courage of Ankastroem. Kings have their diseases, as well as butchers, or manufacturers of white lead, &c., &c., and thus run the hazard of dangers common to all. But if some infamous scoundrel should cut the throat of Rubini or Malibran, or stick a poniard into Rossini or Paganini, what a cry of horror would resound throughout Europe. All are bound to assist in the conservation of talents so precious, the loss of which would be a public calamity; and the senseless madman who would attempt lives so dear would be torn in pieces, burned, and his ashes scattered to the winds, by a host of enraged dilletanti.

"Nero hesitated long before he cut his throat, and when dying whispered these words, beautifully modulated, 'qualis artifex pereo.' What an artist is to be mourned! Why did political events destroy such a musician? These words are among the most remarkable of antiquity, but barbarians turn them into ridicule. In the Order of St. Michael there have been but two ladies, and both of them belonged to the Opera—M^{lle} Quinault Dufresne, 1745; M^{me} St. Huberti, 1790. In 1745, the king sent his carriage to conduct M^{lle} Le Maure to Versailles, accompanied by a gentleman of the bed-chamber. When passing through Paris, M^{lle} Le Maure cried out, 'Oh, how I wish I were a window, in order to see myself passing!' In 1771, the Directors of the Colysée, which was built in the Faubourg St. Honore for public fetes, &c., &c., entered into a treaty with M^{lle} Le Maure to sing at their concerts. This heroine of French song had left the opera twenty-eight years previous, but accepted of their brilliant offers. Although sixty-eight years of age, her organ was still admirable, but she could only sing one song at each concert. M^{lle} Le Maure again wished to be treated as a queen, but not as the queen dowager of the Academy of Music. Two files of servants, elegantly attired, preceded her, and ladies of honor, in full dress, followed. These always accompanied her when she made her entrance into the great hall of the Colysée.

"The Marseillais, in August 1785, feted M^{me} St. Huberti on land and sea. After the different representations, this talented artist received homage worthy of a queen and many gold crowns and chaplets exquisitely wrought. M^{me} St. Huberti appeared at this fete attired in a rich modern Greek costume, given to her by the Greek ladies residing in Marseilles. In 1787, a young artillery officer was wont to attend her performances. All knew with what talent and sublimity she played and sung in the solo of Didon. Enthusiasm inspired to write the following, 'Romans, who vaunt of your illustrious origin, see upon what depended the existence of your growing country: Dido had not charms sufficiently powerful to arrest the flight of her obstinate lover. But if the other Dido, who ornaments this place, had been queen of Carthage, he would, to serve her, have abandoned his gods, and your beautiful country would still be barbarous.'

"These lines are by that Napoleon Bonaparte, who ultimately turned the Republic of France to his own account. We can vouch for the authenticity of them upon the assertion of Louis Gregoire of Marseilles, a friend of M^{me} St. Huberti, and secretary of music to the first consul. 'The emperor of France to the author of the Bardes,' such is the inscription engraved on a superb gold snuff box, which Napoleon sent to Le Sueur after the success of this opera in 1804. The celebrated singer Forst, refused the letters of nobility which Joseph the First wished to confer upon him. The artist however accepted the pension of three hundred florins which was proposed as an exchange. If the emperor wished to bestow a present equal in value, it would appear that he did not estimate his letters of nobility at a very high price. In 1690, Forst's voice was a deep bass, so well cultivated, and of such volume, that Joseph declared that he would willingly pay 100,000 ducats to have a similar voice if it could be purchased. The Italians belonging to the Imperial chapel, jealous of his astonishing success, poisoned him.

"Rameau received letters of nobility, as a necessary qualification for receiving the cordons of the order of St. Michael, which the king destined for him, 1760. In June, 1785, the minister Baron Breteuil offered the cordon of St. Michael to Beaumarchais, who refused it with disdain, saying, that men of recognised merit can do without decorations, that are prized only by fools. The King of Prussia had subscribed for a copy of Beethoven's Mass, No. 2. The Prince de Hatzfeld, ambassador from Prussia to Vienna, sent a counselor of the chancery to ask the great master, if he would not prefer a royal order or fifty ducats, the price of the subscription. Beethoven replied suddenly, with energy, 'Fifty ducats!' He always refused gifts of this kind, no matter from what quarter they came, and even titles voluntarily offered. If you offer a distinguished artist the embarrassing choice of an order or a sum of money, if he take the cross, for him it never can be an honorable distinction. Military men sollicit orders and consider themselves very fortunate if they obtain them. The cross of a soldier is always an object of general and profound veneration: it is above suspicion. We sometimes see artists refuse those which have been offered to them, and utter mysterious hints and prayers that they may not be decorated. Artists of negative merit go wandering about at literary and musical soirees, intriguing to obtain an insignia which their talents do not entitle them to. It is no wonder therefore, that Rameau, Forst, Beethoven, &c., &c., refused to be enrolled in a regiment of cadet artists, lest by so doing they might tacitly admit of an equality between such great masters and those raw recruits."

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, D. C. Jan. 29, 1849.

EDITOR GAZETTE AND RULE—Dear Sir and Bro.: In my last I noticed several typographical errors, of so little importance, however, as to be easily supplied by the attentive reader, and would probably pass unnoticed by any other.

Though we have nothing of very great importance within our jurisdiction in regard to the "work," yet there are some thoughts which might be rendered practical and useful, by being penned for inspection, and serving somewhat as mere chronicles of the times, if nothing else. Since my last, two deaths have transpired in our midst; Bro. Jno. Simmons, of No. 12, and Bro. Jacob Acker, of No. 10, are no more! They have gone to their long accounts in another and a better world. A large concourse of the brotherhood were present, and performed the last sad tribute of respect to departed worth. They were both industrious and kind husbands, and useful members of society. May they rest in peace, and green be the sod above their graves. "And this is the state of man! To-day the tender leaves of hope put forth; tomorrow they blossom, and bear their blushing honors thick and fresh upon them. The third day there comes a frost—a killing frost—and when he thinks, good and easy man, full surely that his greatness is ripening, all his glory vanishes, and he falls to the ground." Then let us boast no more of our power and greatness, but remember they are but as a shadow—this moment present, the next, gone for ever.

Some objection has been made by some of the good, pious ministers of our city, against attending Odd-Fellows' processions, especially on Sundays, and where music is an accompaniment. And this objection has become so inveterate in some minds as to be put in operation in the case of Bro. John Simmons. His minister objected to officiate at his funeral, because music was used in the procession that followed him to the grave. Now, as this question deserves a little notice, from the fact above cited, I propose to make a few passing remarks.

The reason why Odd-Fellows bury their dead on Sundays, is most obvious to the least reflecting mind. The mass of Odd-Fellows are working and business men, and cannot, on all occasions, afford to lose a day; or if they can afford it, their business would not admit of it; and we believe that they could not be engaged in a more solemn and important manner, than in performing those sad rites to a brother dead—in giving to his mortal remains decent sepulture. And further, to effect that object, they have music, which is employed on the occasion to perform mournful tunes and marches, suitable to the occasion, and also in order to secure a fuller attendance upon the processions. There was a class in days of yore, who chided even the Saviour of the world for healing on the Sabbath, or for pulling an ox out of the mire; others there are, in this, our day, whose scruples are alike delicately attuned, and who would bottle up the sunshine and veil the moon.

You noticed, in your paper of the 20th inst., the departure of many sterling Odd-Fellows from your goodly city of Gotham for the gold regions in California, that El Dorado which Spain so many years sought for in vain, and at last gave up the pursuit. We have a good many brethren also speeding their way to that great center of attraction, and have taken their lives in their hands to pursue, possibly to some, a mere phantom. While on the subject of California gold, I am reminded of the Sandwich Islands, not far from that happy, happy land, whose inhabitants, we are told, are all fleeing away to the diggings. You will recollect the Grand Lodge of the United States are making up collections to build the Odd-Fellows in Honolulu a hall, devoted to the sacred teachings of F., L. and T. I, in conclusion, would submit whether it would not be well to hold on to the funds until this gold mania has subsided, for money is said, by a wise man, to be the root of all evil.

In a book called the Probe, edited by J. Carroll Judson, in which are some life-like portraits of men and things, and which abounds in "gems of eloquence," it is gravely asserted that Gen. George Washington was born in Fairfax Co., Va.

Our citizens are making great preparations for the two inaugurations balls, which are shortly coming off in this metropolis, commemorative of the hero of Buena Vista, &c. I must now conclude my much lengthened letter, by subscribing myself,
Yours, in F., L. & T., T. W. J.

MATTERS AND THINGS IN BALTIMORE.

THE FUNERAL OF P. G. JAMES PATTERSON.—The funeral of P. G. Patterson, which took place on Sunday of last week, was attended by a large number of Brothers of his own and of other Lodges. He was very justly held in the highest estimation by his very extensive circle of acquaintances. He possessed, in an eminent degree, all the traits which make the good Odd-Fellow, and all the virtues that adorn and ennoble the man. To the orphans and widows of deceased Odd-Fellows, his death is a serious loss. As a member of the "School Committee," he had for years been most indefatigable in his attentions to the education and other interests of the young. That portion of the city known as "Federal Hill," was, for the most part, the scene of his labors; and in that neighborhood many a widow and orphan have, by his death, lost a faithful friend. He combined, in an unusual degree, the qualities which constitute the humble Christian, the good citizen, and the sincere friend. He has gone from labor to reward.

OFFICERS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF MARYLAND.—At the late Annual Communication of the Grand Lodge of Maryland, the following named Brethren were elected Officers for the ensuing year:—N. T. Dushane, G.M.; B. F. Zimmerman, D.G.M.; Geo. D. Tewksbury, G. Sec.; J. McGooch, G. W.; Wm. Bayley, G. Treas.; J. Jarvis, G. Marshal; J. Hunt, G. Conductor. The interests of the Order in Maryland, under so able an officary, cannot fail of prosperity.

THE CALIFORNIA FEVER.—This fever continues to rage in Baltimore. Several expeditions have lately left the city, composed of our most worthy and enterprising young men. Among others who caught the fever and started away, was our old friend and associate, Wm. T. Preston, Esq., the former publisher of the "Iris and Odd-Fellow's Mirror." He sailed in the barque Sovereign, in company with as fine a set of fellows as could be well got together. He deserves success—may he reap it abundantly.

A WORK-HOUSE.—We were pleased to find in the late annual message of the Mayor of Baltimore, a strong recommendation to the Councils to adopt the necessary measures for the immediate establishment of a work-house. From the spirit manifested by the Councils, there is reason to believe that the incipient steps will forthwith be taken toward the getting up of this much needed institution. Nothing would conduce more to the moral improvement of the youth of the city than a work-house, where the tyro in crime might, by kindly restraint and discipline, be reclaimed or prevented in his career of vice.

EXHIBITION OF CADETS OF TEMPERANCE.—We have heretofore taken occasion to allude to this promising juvenile Order, and would here again call attention to them.

FROM OUR LADY-CORRESPONDENT.

Mrs. Lucretia Mott's Sermon to the Students of Philadelphia. California Fever. Valentines.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 13, 1849.

FRIEND ARNOLD:

Last evening, a meeting was called by Lucretia Mott for the purpose of addressing the students of the different Colleges. It would be impossible for me to depict the novelty of the scene. I can but say it was in truth a sublime and imposing spectacle, to see that mass of human beings, most of them young men, wrapped in profound silence, listening to the words of divine truth from the lips of a woman, as she stood in their midst, with her melodious, rich and distinct delivery, preaching the gospel of Christ. It were enough to make one feel proud she was a woman; and to wonder if theologians did not envy her the talents which they had to strive to obtain.

I regret there is a dark side to the picture, but justice bids me say, that inimitable female preacher is on some points a fanatic, and most so on the subject of Slavery. I was sorry to hear her refer to it last evening, and in such plain terms, too, placing the negro equal with us, only differing in color. At this point, a low hissing sound came from the heretofore still audience, and general marks of disapprobation were heard. Quietness was restored by her changing the subject.

I think I hear you say, "My correspondent is in truth a fanatic to Quakerism, and will no doubt shortly put on a pasteboard bonnet." Not yet, Mr. Arnold. There are many things objectionable and uncongenial with my "spirit," even among the Quakers—so I am not yet ready to be a preacher.

I'll devote a little space to speaking of things in general, as 'tis against my conscience to leave this unwritten on. The California fever has somewhat abated. Men begin to think 'tis "paying dear for the whistle" to go so far in chasing an ignis fatuus, and so they sing "Home, sweet home."

The joyous season of "Saint Valentine" is at hand. I have heard but little else for the last few days, and I suppose shall not hear much else for the next few. I am most tired of the game, so far as writing of them is concerned, as I have, for the use of my friends, written some half a peck. For my own part, I shall send none, until I can send something worth reading.

You must be really tired; if you are not, I am, as my hand aches. It has been in constant motion for the last eight hours. I shall not attempt to correct this scrawl, for in doing so I shall have to read it over, and the consequence would be, I should commit it to the flames.

The clock just now has struck the hour,
When ghosts and witches have the power
To stalk abroad, and take a peep,
And fright all those who vigils keep
At midnight's hour. But I've no fear
Of supernatural visits here.

Farewell. Respectfully, K. W. S.

DIGGINS IN THE MINES OF NEW-YORK—NEWS.

A WHOLE week is a long period for this "pent-up Utica" of ours for its accumulation of expectancy. The city had been, until the arrival of the United States, very similar to a man holding his breath from a sudden fear, who, when the cause of alarm is removed, breathes again.

Dear reader, we held our breath, among many others, until we heard "the sound of revelry at night," created by Mr. Beach's extra Sons; and we can now breathe more freely than any one, save those who chanced to have a dear friend (or an enemy) in this staunch and well-tried steamer. The news is like last year's fruit, good for nothing after the new has come. It was brought by the Canada, well digested, and a craving for more created, just in season to be gratified by a dispatch from Maryland about the prize fight. The intensity of the excitement upon this subject exceeded all bounds—exaggeration had reached the last round of the ladder leading into the realm of vague and unsatisfactory report. Extras were cried by the newsboys with their voices pitched a note higher than their natural tones will rise, in order to produce perfect music; and lo and behold! not until the next day did the precise intelligence arrive concerning these two important personages, and their lawless proceedings. These two philosophers (we have not decided as of what school) have the sympathies of the community with them far enough to regret that both were not killed. This must be a source of great consolation to either party. Hyer was the winner of the battle, which came off, notwithstanding the praiseworthy efforts of the Governor of Maryland to prevent that time-honored State from being the scene of this inhuman warfare.

In the midst of all this, brooding in the city-hall belfry, rings out its startling peal, and the town overflows with a hurried stream of red-shirted men—worthy, hardy fellows—who always, somehow or other, contrive to keep the "good servant, but bad master" within harmless limits.

"What fiend is like the might of fire?"

asks Schiller, and the Hoe, whose establishment was so much injured a few days since, can found an answer upon his own experience—perhaps.

PROMOTION.—LIEUT. A. A. HARWOOD.—We are gratified to see that this distinguished friend and brother has been promoted to the rank of Commodore U. S. N. Bro. Harwood is a gentleman of superior talents, an accomplished officer and a good Odd-Fellow. He is a P. G. of Mystic Lodge, located at Bordentown, N. J., where he resides. Capt. Harwood is also well known as a contributor to some of our best annuals and magazines.

OF WHAT USE IS ODD-FELLOWSHIP.—This is a question which is frequently asked, by not only our opponents, but by many, no doubt, who would at once become members of the Order if they rightly understood its principles and objects.

The advantages to be derived from a connection with the Order of Odd-Fellows are numerous and invaluable, when we take into consideration the beautiful and benign precepts which its laws inculcate, and the kind and fraternal feelings with which it endows its votaries. The Odd-Fellow that is in good standing in the Order, however far he may travel from kindred and friends and among strangers, if by accident or misfortune he is reduced to want or lain upon the sick bed, will then find those which are friends in deed, and friends that are sure and steadfast, if he can but converse with the cabalistic signs.

Odd-Fellowship not only renders pecuniary aid in time of need, but teaches us many useful and salutary lessons, if we will but profit by them. To obey its injunctions makes us better men, better citizens, more liberal hearted and more sympathizing.

These are some of the benefits derived from a connection with the Order. The husband and father on his death bed, who is about to bid his companion and offspring the last farewell, and who has but a scanty pittance to leave for their maintenance and support, has the consolation of knowing that they will not be left to the mercies of a cold hearted public, to suffer and grow up in ignorance, but that their wants will be relieved, and the orphan educated and fitted for after life.

Though Odd-Fellowship has already done much for the relief of the widow and orphan, we believe it as yet to be but in the dawn of its mission of good works. As its principles and objects become better known, and its benefits more visible, the acquisition of members and consequent funds will be such as to enable it to bestow still greater favors, and ere long be allowed by all as the most benign of all human institutions. What a world this would be if everybody were true Odd-Fellows!—[Boston Odd-Fel.]

TEMPERANCE AND FREE-MASONRY.—The Nashville Union relates the following interesting and curious fact:

"The Mercury of yesterday contains an ancient pledge of teetotalism, written and signed by a Bachelor of Divinity and Preacher of the Gospel, in England, two hundred and eleven years ago." It may be interesting to the friends of the cause to know, as a mere matter of history, that the first Temperance Society on record was established by the Free-Masons of Italy, just a century since. On the 28th of April, 1748, Pope Clement XII issued his celebrated Bull forbidding the practice of Free-Masonry by the members of the Roman Catholic Church. Many of the Masons of Italy continued, however, to meet; but for the purpose of evading the temporal penalties of the Bull, which extended in some instances to the infliction of capital punishment, they changed their exoteric name, and called themselves Xerophagists. This is a compound of two Greek words, signifying 'those who live without drinking.' This title they selected because they then introduced a pledge of total abstinence into their by-laws; and hence the Free-Masons of Italy may claim the honor of having taken the initiatory step in the great reformation which has since done so much good to mankind.

"A. G. M."

SECRET SOCIETIES.—But it is said to be inconsistent with the Gospel to hold societies thus secretly guarded. Let Him who "spake as never man spake," speak for Himself: "Unto you," He says to His disciples, "it is given to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven, but unto them without all these things are done in parables." When He stood before the High Priest, and was asked of His doctrine, he replied, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the Synagogue and in the Temple, and in secret have I said nothing" contrary thereto. This He said of His doctrine and teaching. But the secrets and mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven were another matter. It was only a few hours before He thus spake of His teaching—His doctrine—that he had instituted the great sacramental mystery of His religion, in secret, with His disciples alone. And this sacrament of the last supper was, for some centuries, always a secret mystery, known only to those who by baptism had been initiated; until, alas! the Church began to court the world, and then those sacred mysteries of that heart-rending event were made a public spectacle of—alas for the Church that it is so!—[Rev. E. M. P. Wells.]

The Gold Fever shows no abatement. Mining Companies are organising in every part of the Union for California.

THE MICHIGAN COPPER REGION.—A letter dated Ontonagon river, in the Lake Superior region, states that mining in that section is carried on pretty vigorously. Mr. L. O. Knapp, agent of the Minnesota Mining Company, has struck one new vein—in sinking a shaft eight feet he has raised to the surface four tons of pure copper, and fifteen tons for stamping, and he has about four tons more of pure copper in sight. They have also struck a sheet of thin copper, and after cutting through it they found underneath a solid mass of copper, that entirely blocked up the hole, and they had to stop work and commence at the surface, and sink anew in the solid wall rock. Mr. Knapp is putting on all the men he can procure on this new discovery. Mr. Stevens, the agent of the Ohio Trap Rock Company, is doing very well, and is making preparations to push his works. The Boston Company are doing well—their new vein has turned out much better than was expected. They have just ruck a new vein we filled with copper.

SISTERS OF CHARITY FOR CALIFORNIA.—A philanthropic lady in New York, aided by several wealthy gentlemen, proposes to charter a vessel for California, and freight it with every article necessary for the aid and comfort of the sick and disabled, including the frame of a hospital building. She is to be accompanied by several intelligent and respectable females, 25 years old and upwards, who will assist her in the benevolent enterprise. Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of the scheme, it speaks well for the noble heart that planned it.

TAR PLACER GOLD.—We yesterday had exhibited to us by Messrs. Logo & Nelms, gold beaters of this city, some of the gold found in California. The quantity we saw was worth about sixty dollars. It was that found in the sand washings, and it could easily be accounted for why it is called gold in scales. The particles were as thin as the scales of a fish, which it resembled somewhat in form, the scales varying from the size of a pin's head to the eighth of an inch in width. Except in color, they closely resemble the scales of the perch. It was a very fine quality of the metal.—[Philadelphia Ledger.]

SHOCKING CASUALTY.—In Ellenville, N. Y., Mr. W. Hutchinson's house took fire from the boiling over of oil and turpentine on the stove. The room was instantly filled with smoke, when his daughter, aged nine years, seized her brother, a babe, and ran into the hall. A person living in the house caught the blazing vessel, but being burnt and blinded, threw it from him. It struck the little girl on the temple, knocked her down, and the blaze spread over her and the infant. The father coming in wrapt the carpet round them, but it was too late, and both died after lingering several hours in torment.

NEGROES IN CANADA.—According to a census taken one year since, the entire black population of Canada is 5571, being 4167 more than in 1842. So the statements of 15 or 20,000 slaves having escaped there from the United States are all moonshine. The majority of males over females is 145—accounted for on the reasonable supposition that those slaves who do escape are men. This disproportion is found chiefly in the districts of Gore, London and Western, nearest to and most convenient of access from the United States.

TRAVELERS inform us that in some mountainous countries meat cannot be cooked by the ordinary process of boiling. The superincumbent column of air becomes so short, and the pressure upon the water so much diminished, that the boiling point of water at which it passes off in steam, is so low that there is not sufficient heat to cook with; a descent of a little over eight hundred feet, lowers the boiling point one degree.

A LITTLE boy, that had been missed about two weeks from Pittsburg, was recently found in a lot, lying upon his face, dead. He was about seven years of age, and had evidently died from cold and exposure.

DEFENSE OF ROMPS.—Never, says the Chicago Journal, find fault with girls—young girls, in particular—if they are decided romps; but be thankful that they have the health and spirits necessary for romping. Better a romp than have a narrow chest and a hectic flush on the cheek. Better wild as a hawk than tame as a dove. Better pay the butcher and the shoemaker than the physician and the undertaker.

Humorous.

MAT MORGAN,

WHO WAS CURED OF THE CHOLERA BY FRIGHT.

We have heard of several persons whose fear of the cholera invited its attack. We know of no one except it be Mat Morgan, from whom fear banished it. Mat was gardener, groom and man of all work to a merchant up-town, and an honest fellow he was—and is, for that matter—and most assiduous in the discharge of his multifarious vocations. At early morning he might be heard, as he cultivated his vegetables, singing a "high faluting" song of some twenty-one verses, of which the following are the first three:

It was in the month of May,
When the lambkins sport and play,
I roved to receive a recreation:
I spied a comely maid
Sequestered in the shade—
On her beauty I did gaze with admiration.

Telemachus so grand,
Who e'er the scepter reached his hand,
Might be certainly prepanned if he'd perceive her,
Or Mentor her dissuade
From that sweet and simple shade,
If Calypso by her arts had not ensnared her.

His sire would seek no more,
Nor descend on Mammon's shore,
Nor venture on the tyrant's dire alarms;
But he'd daily place his care
On that emblematic fair;
He would barter coronation for her charms.

And then, at evening, as he brushed the "boss's" horse, he might be heard whistling in tones of thrilling pathos, the "Colleen das scruihen amo," or the "Black Bird." Mat was taken suddenly ill, on the twenty-third of last month, with cramps in his stomach, and he thought that his whistling and singing was all over with him. "Oh! ah! ee!" said he, running into the house of his employer, who happened at that time to be at his office; "Oh! ah! ee!" he repeated, clasping his hands over his abdomen.

"Why, what's the matter, Matthew?" said the wife of his employer.

"Oh, murder, madam! I'm kilt intirely. I feel me bowels tumblin' in me belly, like eels in a barrel. I've got the cholera morbus. Oh! ah! There it is agin!"

"Well, then, Matthew," said his mistress, "Sampson has the buggy at the door; get into it, and he will drive you right off to the Charity Hospital, for I am told the cholera patients have the very best nursing and medical attendance there."

Mat did as she bid him, and he was soon in the Charity Hospital. As soon as he went in, some medicine was administered to him, which alleviated in some measure his pain. He then looked about him, and sooth to say, he did not like the appearance of things in his ward over well. Some poor fellows were writing in pain; others, prostrated by the disease, were still as if death had already set his seal upon their lips, and others were breathing as men do when life is about to depart from them. Now some poor fellow was carried in, cold and livid—a strongly-marked case of the disease—now the porter's bell tolled fitfully, and two men entered, and rolling a corpse out of the bed where it lay, carried it between them down stairs. It was too much for poor Mat. Up he bounced from his bed, thrust himself into his clothes, and in twenty minutes was back to the house of his employer, whom he found within, before him.

"Why, Mat," said his employer, "I thought you were at the Hospital?"

"So I was, sir," said Mat.

"And why did you not remain there?" said his employer. Surely you are not well, yet?"

"Never was better in my life sir," said Mat. "Be Gor, half an hour in that establishment ought to kill or cure any one!"

"How so?" said his employer.

"O, there's such mortal sights there," said Mat. "I was not well laid in me bed when I heard the bell; it was not a natural ring, ather, but a kind of a growl, like the bark of a spirit that w'd assume the shape of a dog in a graveyard. What's that—fire is it? six I to an old fellow that was tying a bit of paper with my name on it, to the bed-post."

"No, it's the dead bell," said he. "No. 70 is to be taken to the dead-house."

"What for?" said he. "To be dissected," said he. "What! like a pork pig?" said he, "divided at the joints?" "Just so," said he. "And what's that for?"

siz I. "For the benefit of science," says he. An sure enough, a couple of fellows came in, and very unconcernedly, in they rooled "70" into their hand barrow, and carried him off. There it is agin, siz I. "What's that?" siz he. That frightful old bell, sez I. "Yis," siz he, "it's 73's turn this time." And does he go to the dead-house too? siz I. "Of course he does," siz he; "where else would you have him to go?" And do ye have no wakes here? siz I. "No, nor funerals neither," siz he. Nor no cryin' over the corpse? siz I. "No, that's vulgar," siz he—"no people does that but the Irish." O, murther? siz I, and ye call this a Christian country, but you won't catch me dyin' or livin' here long either, ould boy, siz I. When I want to die I want to drop off somewhere that they'll bury me decent, and with that I jumped up, had me clothes on in a jiffy and here I am, as well cured of the cholera as if I had swallowed a whole apothecary's shop."

"And what cured you so effectually, Mat?" said his employer.

"Well, to tell you the thruth," said Mat, "divil a thing did it but the fright!"

A YANKEE ATTORNEY ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—The following oration was delivered somewhere, in Wisconsin, by one who would seem to have quite an aversion to capital punishment:

"May it please your Lordship and Gentlemen of the Jury—The case is as clear as ice, and sharp to the doin' as no from your sweetheart. The Scripture saith, 'Thou shalt not kill'; now if you hang my client, you transgress the command as slick as grease, and as plump as a goose egg in a loafer's face. Gentlemen, murder is murder, whether committed by twelve jurymen or by a humble individual like my client. Gentlemen, I do not deny that fact of my client's having killed a man; but is that any reason why you should do so? No such thing, gentlemen. You may bring the prisoner in guilty; the hangman may do his duty; will that exonerate you? No such thing. In that case you will all be murderers! Who among you is prepared for the brand of Cain to be stamped upon his brow to-day; who, freemen, in this land of liberty and light? Gentlemen, I will pledge my word not one of you has a bowie-knife or a pistol in his pocket. No, gentlemen, your pockets are odoriferous with the perfumes of cigar cases and tobacco. You can smoke the tobacco of rectitude in the pipe of a peaceful conscience; but hang my unfortunate client, and the scaly alligators of remorse will gallop through the internal principles of animal vertebrae until the spinal vertebrae of your anatomical construction is turned into a railroad for the grim and gory goblins of despair. Gentlemen, beware of committing murder! Beware, I say, of meddling with the internal prerogative. Beware, I say. Remember, the fate of the man who attempted to steady the ark, and tremble. Gentlemen, I adjure you by the manumitted ghost of temporal sanctity, to do no murder! I adjure you by the name of woman, the main-spring of the ticking time-piece of time's theoretical transmigration to do no murder! I adjure you by the love you have for the esculent and condimental gusto of our native pumpkin to do no murder! I adjure you by the American Eagle, that whipped the universal game-cock of creation, and now sits roosting on the magnetic telegraph of time's illustrious transmigration, to do no murder! And lastly, gentlemen, if you ever expect to wear long tailed coats—if you ever expect free dogs not to bark at you—if you ever expect to wear boots made of the free hide of the Rocky Mountain buffalo—and, to sum up all, if you ever expect to be anything but a sneaking, loafing, rascally, out-throated, braided, small ends of humanity, whittled down to indistinctly, acquit my client and save your country!"

The prisoner was acquitted.

A FAT JOKE.—The American Courier asserts it to be a fact. A lady in Spruce-street, wishing to get clear of the offal fat, grease, &c., that had accumulated in the kitchen, directed an English girl, who had recently come into her employ, to call the first fat man she saw in the street, stating that she wanted to see him. The good creature thinking that the term "fat" applied to the man's size, and not to his business—a little while after, on going to the door saw a man whose corporation justified her in informing him that her missus wished to see him if he would be so kind as to step in. He did so, and was seated in the parlor. The girl called her mistress down stairs to attend to the fat man. When she had descended she was informed he was in the parlor. "In the parlor!" exclaimed Mrs. —, "and what is he doing in the parlor?" She hurried in, and there discovered a gentlemanly looking personage, with hat off, waiting to hear the cause of his detention. The lady, whose presence of mind did not forsake her, immediately saw the whole mistake, and apologized for the ridiculous error. The fat man left, evidently much amused at the joke.

DEEDS ETERNAL.

The deeds of reasonable men
As if engraved with a pen of iron grain,
And laid in flinty rock, they stand unchanged,
Written on the various pages of the past—
If good, in rosy characters of gold—
If bad, in letters of viadictive fire;
God may forgive, but cannot blot them out.

IMPORTANT FOR "JACK."—It will be seen by the report from Washington, that Jack is, as usual, to have his grog, and his flogging, too. Jack, it is understood in Washington, had no objection to reform in the matter of flogging; but if it is to be accompanied with the stoppage of his grog, Jack has great doubts whether it is any reform at all. The Senate by a vote of 32 to 17 decided that whatever was to be changed in this matter ought to come from the Naval Committee, not in an Appropriation bill.—[Express.

THE LARGEST LIBERTY.—The Senate of Indiana, on the 9th ult., adopted a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency of so altering the civil and ecclesiastical laws of the State, as to render the marriage covenant void at the option of the parties, and that man and wife may abandon each other at pleasure.

OLD DOCTOR Jacob Townsend, THE ORIGINAL DISCOVERER OF THE GENUINE TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA.

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Being poor, he was compelled to hunt its manufacture, by which means it has been kept out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who proved its worth and know its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, as those persons who had been healed of sore diseases, and saved from death, procured its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. Thus is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land. Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the better, because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The high knowledge of Chemistry, and the latest discoveries of the Art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S SARSAPARILLA. The SARSAPARILLA root, it is well known to medical men, contains many medicinal properties, and some properties which are hurt or injured, and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of SARSAPARILLA are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, when used in the system, it is not only a tonic, but, as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medicinal properties of the root, which give it all its value. Thus

Grand and Unequalled Preparation

Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's SARSAPARILLA

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the SARSAPARILLA root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the Cure of Innumerable Diseases.

Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women and children. We find it does wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA and PILES, COSTIVENESS, all CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from Impurity of the Blood.

It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from Indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, determination of blood to the head; palpitation of the heart; cold feet and cold hands, cold limbs and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes easy expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing structure of the lungs, throat, and every other part.

But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of Female Complaints.

It works wonders in cases of four albes or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstruation, irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility,

and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Swooning, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not so harmful to the medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which is hurtful to the system; it can never become acid, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth equally all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then, The Medicine you Pre-eminently need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s, because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,

while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments, acid liquid exudes, and damages other goods! Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system? What! put acid into a system already diseased with acid! What causes Dyspepsia but acid? Do we not all know, that when food sours in our stomachs, what mischief it produces!—flatulence, heartburn, palpitation of the heart, liver complaint, diarrhoea, dysentery, colic, and corruption of the blood? Is it not Scrofula but an acid humor in the body? What produces all the humors which bring on Eruptions of the Skin, Scald Head, Salt Rheum, Erysipelas, White Swellings, Fever-Sores, and all ulcerations internal and external? Is it not itching under the arms, but an acid substance, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then, The Medicine you Pre-eminently need?

Now, is it not horrible to make and sell, and infinitely worse to use this and yet he would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of his inferior preparation!

Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the most distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article! and which would bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain load of complaints and examinations from Agents who have sold, and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's SARSAPARILLA are heaven-wide apart, and infinitely distant, that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacist—knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of changes which might render them the AGENTS OF DISEASE instead of health?

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and bloom and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to banish infirmity—that OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND HAS BOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

Grand Universal Concentrated Remedy, within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its Transcendent Power to Heal!

and thus to have the unpurchasable satisfaction of having raised thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and dependency to hope, health, and a long life of vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.

THE INDIAN.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY BRO. ALBERT G. LEARY.

Gone, glimmering through the dream of things that were
A school-boy's tale, the wonder of an hour.

CHILDE HAROLD.

The wild beast from his covert broke,
The wild fowl clave the vacant air,
The birch-boat felt the paddle's stroke,
And the young eaglet nestled there;
Around, above, below, was heard
The sweet voice of that fabled bird,
Which erst Philomela was called—
The woods were vocal,—on each spray
The mock-bird sung his varied lay,
And earth looked beauteous and gay,
From icy fetters disenthralled.

A stranger came,—with lowering mien
And aspect dark,—with lordly pride
He trode the forest paths—I ween
Lord of the soil and all beside,
He ranged the wild wood—every flower
That e'er adorned a lady's bower
Beneath his feet in beauty grew.
And these were his, and as he prest
The eaglets from their storm-rocked nest
To cleave the vaulted blue,
I could discern a look of pride
Flashing in his dark-black eye,
To think the glorious prospect wide
Was his, e'en to the star-gemm'd sky.
A maiden form beside him stood—
Oh! do not ask, words cannot show
That maiden's beauty;—as the flood
Bears on its bosom many a prow
Of precious cargo,—never telling
The treasure on its bosom dwelling,
Upborne upon its heaving breast;
So in that maiden's eye, unknown
The Syren glance of love had flown,
And made its rosy nest.

A mother came, and by her side
Her cherub boy in childhood's glee;
And as he sped his father's stride,
Or clambered on that mother's knee,
A smile lit up her raven eye
To see her loved one standing by;
And as she clasped him to her heart,
Undreaming they were soon to part

By white man's guile—by white man's art,
No mother near his eyes to close;
Say, you who know a mother's joy
When gazing on her first-born boy,
Was hers not bliss without alloy?
Dreamed she of future foes?

A century had passed; and where
Was he, the lord of by-gone days?
The soil, the clime, the boat was there,
The wild fowl with its matin lays;
But where was he?—did he still roam,
Unchecked, untamed, his forest home?
Or did he bend the suppliant knee,
A slave in lands his fathers trod,
Nought left, save but the Indian's God,
To tell he once was free?

Where is that maiden? on her brow
There plays no smile of gladness now;
That youthful mother, dark and low
She slumbers with her boy.
The Indian is gone! Oh ask not his story,
Let it never be known how he sank to his rest;
'Twill tarnish the flag of American glory,
'Twill sully her name and dishonor her crest.
With open arms, the Indian gave
That soil—now but the Indian's grave.
What, but ingratitude
So long could nerve the red man's arm
To do the sons of white men harm,
And keep alive the feud?

'Tis past! let him sleep in Oblivion's dark shade,
His wrongs and his sorrows be it ours to forget,
For he fell, by the arts of the white man betrayed,
And he, round whom the sun-beams of glory had played,
Now mourns, for the star of his glory has set.

On history's page the deed is told,
On history's page the reason given,
How white men, for accursed gold,
To hell have turned the Indian's heaven.
With many a sigh thy doom we speak,
With many a tear thy wrongs survey,
As o'er the past our memories stray,
Ere treachery had made thee weak.
St. Louis, (Mo) Feb., 1849.

How swift and bright the thought, but slow behind!
The dull work lags, and mocks the fervid mind!
Yet still the work is good: to One alone
The winged and blooming phantom Thought is known;
But the pale image to earth, sea, and air,
Proclaims the unseen Spirit hovering there.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PLOT TO MURDER.

Murder's ill-timed at best;
But now 'tis too ill-timed.

SHERIDAN KNOWLES.

LEE had gone to the American camp to superintend the preparations there going on, for what he anticipated would be a desperate and hopeless defense, upon the morrow. Moultrie and his brave comrades were toiling in the entrenchments of Sullivan's Island—each with that firm resolve which makes the benevolent man a hero. Yet still, along the shores of the starlit river, were gathered groups of anxious citizens, speculating, with longing hearts, upon the chances of the coming conflict.

Among those whom we introduced with Moultrie, as watching, an hour before, the first appearance of the British fleet, the reader will recall a dark-featured individual, who had ventured the contemptuous remarks regarding the fort, which had called forth a signal rebuke from the gallant Colonel. This dark-featured man still lingered by the river side.

There are some persons whom we meet in life, whose faces on the instant of beholding them win us to confidence or respect. And there are others which as instantaneously repel us, and perhaps cause a shuddering sensation to creep through our nerves. We may be able in neither case to account for our impressions, but experience will generally satisfy us that the instinctive warnings which thus are given, result from something more than mere nervous excitability. One of those repulsive countenances the individual possessed to whom we alluded in the last paragraph. A sneering, invidious smile dwelt continually upon his dark lip, the covert meaning of which was heightened by a cold, artful gray eye that seemed dozing in its sockets, yet ready to light up at any moment with fierce malignity.

He stood still upon the bank of the river, his arms folded across his breast, at times watching the far-off ships, or the glancing lights on the Island, then regarding stealthily the anxious faces of those about him, or listening attentively to their remarks. He was a man apparently of about thirty years of age, strongly limbed, and of great muscular development, with a broad chest, and massy, bull-like throat. His complexion, nearly as dark as an Indian's, or rather of that bronzed hue which is more common to the Spanish race, seemed to have become so from exposure to the elements; and the seared and indurated look which it bore, appeared to denote that the man's life had been passed less upon the land than among the winds and tempests of the ocean. He wore a half-marine and half-soldier costume; his boots and breeches being of military style; while a thick pea-coat and slouched tarpaulin gave his upper proportions decidedly a nautical air.

He lingered, as we have said, upon the beach some length of time after the American officers had departed to their respective stations; and it was not until the last boat-load of volunteers had pushed off from the shore, that, with the same sardonic smile blackening his lip, he turned from the group around him, and slowly took his way toward the town.

Many troubled faces, many tearful eyes, met the dark man's gaze, as he walked with measured steps past the trembling citizens, hurrying back and forth along the river's banks. But he took no heed of them, save perchance when a half-stifled sob from some veiled woman caused his lip to curl with deeper scorn. Along the streets, beneath the shadow of the houses, and under the thick trees that lined the walk, the strange man pursued his way. He looked not up to the beautiful heavens, nor seemed to perceive the fragrance with which the night breeze was laden. On went he, through the moon-lit avenues, like a shadow of evil.

Arrived at a narrow street, at the upper extremity of the city, where were situated many of the ancient mansions of the first settlers, the pedestrian turned suddenly from the pavement, and entering a dark passage, knocked twice upon the panel of a door. It was almost immediately opened by a young man, clad in the most fashionable garb, and bearing the marks of high breeding, thought at the present moment it was apparent that he labored under some violent excitement. His clothes, of the finest material, were soiled and crushed, as if he had been sleeping in them; and his powdered hair was disordered, and hanging in tangled knots about his shoulders. His cheeks, too, were flushed; his eyes blood-shot; and his entire appearance indicated either a late debauch, or the most terrible mental agitation. He seized the dark-faced man's hand, as soon as he opened the door, and hastily drew him within the room.

The apartment in which the two men now were was a small, square chamber, with little or no furniture, if we except various implements of hunting and war, that were hung around its walls. A double-barreled gun crossed with a rifle, ornamented the space above the fire-place, which itself was filled with a saddle, bridle, game-bag, and knapsack. A table, on the edge of which was a small ebony writing-desk, stood in the corner of the room, and the greater portion of its surface was filled with a heterogeneous array of military and naval uniforms, hunting-coats, wagoner's frocks, and even the aboriginal head-gear, wampum, feathers, tunic and leggins, of the copper-headed denizens of our primal forests, interspersed likewise with drafts, maps, and half-finished plans of military works and surveys, pistols, daggers, and other offensive weapons; all in the most reckless confusion, and resembling more the paraphernalia of an actor's dressing room, than anything else which we can fancy.

"Well?—what?" asked, or rather gasped, the young man, as he drew his visitor within the room, and closed the door.

"I'm as thirsty as a red-skin," said the other, coolly seating himself upon the edge of the table, to the manifest danger of the desk which occupied the edge.

The young man pointed to a cupboard over the table, within reach of the speaker; and as the dark-faced individual proceeded to draw from its recess a bottle and glasses, threw himself in the only chair which the apartment contained, and covering his face with his hands, watched his companion's motions through his parted fingers. The other leisurely filled a glass with the colored liquor which the bottle contained, and swallowed it at a draught. Then depositing the flask and another glass upon the table, he motioned to his host to help himself.

"Go on! In the devil's name, go on with what I wish to hear," cried the young man impatiently. "Tell me where you have been, and what you have done."

"In the devil's name I will do nothing, Master Robert Atree," returned the other. "But in the name, and for the sake of this good Jamaica rum that I now drink your health in, I will do and say anything you wish." So saying the familiar guest poured out another glass of the spirits, and raised it to his lips.

"Stop, Matthew, you shall drink no more till you answer my questions. Nay," continued he, as a frown lowered upon the other's brow, "there'll be time enough to drink by and by, and I will join you then, in a dozen glasses. But at the present moment, Mat, put down that liquor, and listen to me."

The young man spoke these words in a determined voice, and with the accent of one who expected obedience; and the dark-faced Matthew immediately removed the glass from his lips, and replaced it upon the table. "Well, Master Robert Atree—what would you of me?" he grumbled.

"Briefly, where have you been?" asked Robert Atree.

"First, to Arnault's mansion—secondly to the river—thirdly, back again," responded Matthew, with his usual sardonic grin.

"And what have you done?"

"As yet,—nothing."

"Is that accursed marriage consummated?" cried Atree, striking the table with his clenched hand. "Tell me—is it over?"

"From all that I could learn, I should say it was, Master Atree. The bride may, however, be a widow before to-morrow night, since there'll be doubtless some of the hottest kind of work down at the fort."

"Then he will go there, Matthew? You are sure young Rivers will be at Sullivan's Island?"

"If a man's own eyes can make him sure, I am; since I saw him embark with the colonel, and that devil, Marion. And if a man of them comes home alive, my name is not Matthew Orrall."

Atree mused a moment as his companion said this. Then pouring out a goblet of the raw Jamaica spirits, he motioned to Matthew Orrall to take up his glass. "Drink, Matthew," cried he, "drink to the success of your next service."

"Providing it pays me well," rejoined Orrall, as he lifted the liquor to his lips.

"Curse you, are you not always paid well by me?" exclaimed Atree, angrily. "When will you cease grumbling at fortune?"

"When I cease running my neck in a noose for the benefit of others who run no risk at all," retorted the other. "But, no matter! I'll drink, if it please you, Master Atree, to the success of my next unlawful service."

"Who said it was unlawful?" cried Atree, quickly, as he noticed the emphasis with which Orrall had pronounced the word. "I said your next service."

"Ha, ha," laughed Matthew. "If it were not unlawful, would Mat Orrall be employed to perform it? Drink, Master Atree, drink to the next hang-dog business you have in hand. May it prosper."

The young man affected to laugh as he drank the other's toast. But it was evident that his bosom was torn with an internal struggle. At last, however, he fixed his eyes upon Orrall's face, and regarded him with a scrutinizing glance. "You are a shrewd villain, Mat," said he, "as well as a bold one! Let us be friends and trust each other."

"With all my heart," replied the dark-faced man.

"To-morrow will be a bloody day, Matthew, and it is probable that all who are at Sullivan's Island will be killed."

"Very probable," returned Orrall.

"But—it is possible, also, that all may not be killed, Matthew. Some may survive! One may survive—eh, Mat—you understand me?"

"Ay, and that one may be Ernest Rivers," said Orrall, with his peculiar smile.

"That you must look out for," exclaimed Atree, hurriedly, while a demoniac glance lit up his blue eyes, which usually were calm and apparently passionless. "Ay, Mat—you must prevent that mischance. Rivers must never come back to claim his bride."

"And how must I prevent it, Master Atree?"

"Do you pretend not to understand me? Can you insure the death of Rivers in the fight to-morrow? Answer me, Mat. Orrall."

"It might be done," said the dark-faced man, pouring out another glass of the potent liquor. "It might be done, and the man who does it might not live to tell the tale."

"You have risked your life before this, Matthew. Serve me now, and I will reward you so well that you will have no necessity of risking it again. If Rivers returns not from Sullivan's Island, a thousand pounds shall be yours."

The dark ruffian's eyes glittered like a serpent's scales with cold grey light.

"That's a round sum, Master Atree," he said.

"It shall be yours, Mat, if Rivers crosses my path no more."

Matthew Orrall bent toward his employer, and gazed with singular earnestness upon his countenance. It was a fair, classic, and it might be called beautiful face that of Robert Atree. His forehead was clear and high, the skin pure and transparent, through which the blue veins could be distinctly seen. His eyes were of a deep blue, his lips round and swelling like a woman's, and curled at all times with a haughty expression, which, with his firm nostrils, imparted an almost disdainful air to all his features. Long, redundant ringlets, silky and soft, fell like gold about his shoulders, as if spurning the powder and ointments with which fashion had hardened it. Robert Atree was, in truth, such a man as women delight to look upon, if not to love.

And thus thought Matthew Orrall as he perused his companion's features, and marked the determined tone with which the young man had pronounced the last words.

"You are willing to pay a heavy price for a woman, Master Atree," said he, "a heavy price in money, and in—blood."

"What is that to you, Mat?" cried his employer abruptly. "Did I ask your opinion in the matter?"

"Oh, I forgot," returned Orrall. "You are a gentleman, and I am but a scoundrel. It is you who plan—I merely execute."

The ruffian laughed bitterly as he uttered these words.

"Well, well, say no more, Matthew," cried the young man. "We know each other, and I have no fear of you. I tell you I hate this Ernest Rivers with a bitterness only equaled by my love for his bride. My hate and my passion must both be gratified, and it is you, Mat., that I rely upon to assist me. Let but this romantic fool perish, and my path lies open before me. If Rivers dies to-morrow—"

"Then you marry the widow the day after," interrupted Orrall, with his low, sneering laugh.

Atree half sprung to his feet with an oath. But he caught the expression of his companion's lips, and restrained himself with a violent effort.

"A truce with your ill-timed jests, Matthew," said he. "We have more serious matter on hand. I want your aid, and will pay high. Shall I have it?"

"If you pay high, yes."

"Is not a thousand pounds—"

"Enough? yes! Your rival is scarcely worth more; being such a fool as to leave his wife on her wedding-eve, and lend his body for a merlon to a log fort. The fool shall die; there's my hand on it."

And the hardened bravo stretched out his hand in token of agreement to his employer's terms, while with the other he lifted his glass to his mouth and swallowed the remaining liquor. Robert Atree slightly pressed with his white fingers the hard wrist of his associate, and then rose from his chair.

"Enough, Matthew," said he, drawing a purse from his vest. "Here is money for you now. You will earn the thousand pounds to-morrow."

"I shall earn it, and yet not claim it," returned Orrall with a laugh. "The shots will, no doubt, fly thick on yon Island, and every bullet, you know, has its billet. Perhaps Mat. Orrall's leaden messenger may be rammed hard down already in one of Sir Peter's cannon."

"Persevere, Mat, you fear nothing of that kind, I am sure; and, besides, there's an old adage that protect's your life."

"Aha!" muttered Orrall, "I understand you; you think your friend Matthew is 'born to be hanged.' Well, well, as you will, good master Atree. I will earn the thousand pounds before you see me again."

"How do you intend to—to—"

"Speak out like a man, Master Atree," cried the villain with a laugh. "You wish to know how I shall kill him—how I shall murder your rival? Well, Master Atree, I shall pistol him in the smoke of a gun. Do you understand me? ha, ha!"

Robert Atree shuddered as he heard the cold sneering laugh, with which the bravo avowed the dark method in which he intended to assassinate his victim. He turned away toward the fire-place.

"Ha! ha! shoot him while the smoke is rolling around us, Master Atree. That will be a sure way. Through the head—through the head, for dead men tell no tales."

"Enough, Mathew," said Atree, who saw that the strong spirit he had imbibed was producing a powerful effect upon the ruffian's senses. "Enough, Mat, good night. To-morrow you will fail me not."

To-morrow he shall die," muttered Orrall, leaving his seat upon the table, and approaching his employer. "I will risk my life in that cursed fort, but I will go there, Master Robert Atree, I will earn the thousand pounds."

So saying the bravo deposited the purse which Atree handed him in the pocket of his rough outer garment, and shaking the young man's hand again, left the room. Atree bolted the door carefully behind him, and then resuming his seat, leaned his head upon the table and pondered long and deeply.

What were his reflections the reader will be at no loss to divine, since hate, revenge, and love united to make up an awful tempest of passion, beneath which the young man's soul rocked to and fro. At times he would murmur "Louise," and then, with a curse, he muttered the name of his rival, Rivers. When he lifted his fair head once more, and shook back the clustering ringlets from his brow, there were deeper traces upon his features of the storm within. His eyes were yet more bloodshot, and a strange fierce expression burned in their blue depths. He shook his clenched hand above his head, and hissed from his set teeth:

"To-morrow, Rivers dies, and his proud wife shall yet be mine."

As he spoke these words another double knock sounded at the door of the small apartment. Atree opened it, and admitted a stranger, who, although the night was oppressively warm, was enveloped in a heavy horseman's cloak.

"My lord, you are welcome," said the young man, as the visitor, throwing off his mantle, discovered the gorgeous uniform of a British officer.

CHAPTER V.

GEOFFREY OF WARMOUNT.

My daughter, once the solace of my life,
Lured by a villain from her native home.

BEGGAR'S PETITION.

We will now return to Charleston, and to the stranger whom we left in the apartment of Robert Atree.

"My lord, you are welcome!" had been the young man's exclamation, as he recognized the striking figure of his visitor. Then, carefully re-bolting the door of the chamber, he approached the arm-chair in which the new-comer had carelessly thrown himself, after a scrutinizing survey of every object in the room.

The bright scarlet-uniform which this individual wore, was thrown out in brilliant relief by the dark cloak that he had cast back from his shoulders, and as he sat erect in the chair, it could not but be noticed that he was evidently person of distinction. His form was majestic, his limbs strong and well-formed, and the tout ensemble of his figure was that of a man accustomed to command. His countenance, though not pleasing, was one calculated to inspire respect. A high, mossy-looking brow, a perfectly Grecian nose, and small mouth, with thin lips, between which gleamed a set of teeth white as pearls, were its striking features, if we except the eyes, which were remarkable for a singular filmy look, as if they were continually clouded with tears. His age might be about fifty, but there were grey hairs sprinkled among his thick locks, which even the powder that was plentifully used in that day, could not entirely conceal from view.

"Well, Master Atree," said the visitor, as that individual drew nigh, and stood with folded arms beside the table, "what have we to talk about?"

"Will your lordship do me the favor to glance over these?" said Atree, taking a small packet of papers from beneath a pile of various articles that concealed it.

The British officer hastily broke the string which secured the packet, and as rapidly examined the papers. They consisted of an exact plan of the American camp of Gen. Lee, as well as a draft of the city of Charleston, together with a list of the firmest whigs of the rebellious colony of South Carolina.

"You have not been idle, I perceive," remarked the Englishman. "These papers will doubtless be of immediate service to us, as we shall attack the real position at day-break. When we have possession to-morrow evening, we will examine the list of traitors you have drawn up, somewhere more at our leisure."

Atree returned the confident smile of the Briton, and then drawing another packet from his vest, he handed it to his visitor. "Will your lordship glance likewise at that?" said he.

"Ha! this is indeed valuable," cried the Englishman. "You are, in truth, Master Atree, a most trusty and loyal agent. These are surely the genuine dispatches of the rebel Sumpter."

"Your lordship can see for yourself," answered Atree. "Sumpter is now in the interior, making himself the terror of all the king's adherents. Your lordship will perceive by these letters how seriously His Majesty's interests are compromised in that quarter."

"Ay, he must be looked to," answered the nobleman. "But how did you obtain possession of these important documents, Master Atree?"

"By intercepting the rebel messenger, replied the young tory agent. "Your lordship can understand how, by means of these various disguises, I gained access to many points without suspicion." As he said this, Robert Atree directed the stranger's attention to the motley collection of habiliments which were heaped together upon the table.

"But you run great risks, I fear."

"For the king's service, no risks are too great," answered Atree modestly.

"You are a loyal subject," said the Englishman, warmly grasping the tory's hand. "And such devotion as yours shall not go unrewarded. Trust me, Master Atree, when his Majesty's authority is once more recognized in these rebellious provinces, your services will receive the attention which they merit."

"Thanks, my lord," said the tory, with a low bow. "I shall even be grateful for your lordship's distinguished notice." A peculiar smile of exultation wreathed the young man's lip, as he said this, which, however, was unobserved by his guest.

"But, your lordship spoke of another matter, at our last interview," continued Atree. "A commission was confided to me at that time, which —"

"Ah!" exclaimed the nobleman, while a sudden flash lit up the film of his eye for a moment. "Have you learned aught in relation to —"

"I have ascertained that the man whom your lordship wished to gain tidings of, is alive."

"Thank God!" involuntarily murmured the stranger. "But his whereabouts!—speak!"

"At present I know not exactly," answered the tory. "But, I have ascertained sufficient to satisfy me that I have discovered the man you seek. He passes now under the name of Matthew Orrall."

"It must be he," remarked the stranger, half to himself. "Yes, surely—he has borne that name before. Stay!" he continued, hastily unbuttoning his military coat, and drawing a pocket-book from his breast. "This will remove all doubt."

And while Atree watched him with a curious earnestness, the English nobleman took from the pocket-book a letter, which he glanced rapidly over. The young tory could see that it was written in a female hand, and as he caught a glance of the paper he fancied that it was smaller and blotched as if with tears.

"It is he," exclaimed the stranger, re-folding the letter, and depositing it again in the pocket-book. "Orrall was his name years ago, which he suppressed under many aliases. But, tell me—what have you learned concerning the man?"

"That he is living, and in the colony at present," answered Atree.

"Ha! But his pursuits—his companions—his family! have you learned aught of them?"

"Your lordship gave me no instructions concerning others but the man himself," replied the tory.

"True—true," said the stranger, evidently violently agitated. "But, you are sure—you are sure this is the man?"

"From your lordship's description, and from other circumstances which I have traced, I have not the least doubt, and the name, your lordship has remarked, corroborates the fact."

"Yes, yes! there can be no doubt. He must be found!"

"Can I be of further assistance in the matter?" asked Robert Atree, deferentially.

"Of much—of invaluable assistance, my friend," cried the nobleman, again pressing the tory's hand. "You are worthy of all confidence, and can be of the greatest service to me. I need not tell you that it is a secret which I am about to confide to you—a secret of great importance to me, which must be kept inviolable —"

"I have already sworn, my lord —"

"Enough—I trust you, Master Atree. Listen to me."

The tory bowed in acknowledgment to his guest, and remained in respectful attention while the Englishman proceeded:

"I shall be brief in what I am about to say, my friend," commenced the stranger, "for this night is valuable, and I must reach the fleet before midnight. Years ago the man whom we seek, this Matthew Orrall, was an officer in the service of the king, whose commission I have now the honor of bearing. He was a lieutenant at that time on board her majesty's ship the Dragon, and distinguished himself at an early age in many serious engagements. I think he sprung from a good family, though at the period of which I speak, he possessed no fortune but his commission and his personal abilities. He was ambitious and of a violent temperament, which, frequently, as I have understood, involved him in disputes with brother-officers, several of whom he killed in duels. But, I am wandering."

"Well, sir, in a foreign port this man saved an English nobleman from assassination, though beset by a half-dozen armed desperadoes. The rescued lord was enthusiastic in his gratitude, and exerted himself to the extent of his power for his preserver's interest. He succeeded in obtaining the lieutenant's promotion to a captaincy in the royal navy. The commission was made out and dispatched from the admiralty, and, sir, on the very day that it reached him, this Orrall deserted from the king's service."

The speaker uttered a low groan as he pronounced the last words, and paused for an instant, as if overcome with some harrowing memory. Robert Atree hastily drew a wine-glass from the closet, and knocked the neck off a bottle of wine which he likewise produced. But the stranger made a motion of tacit refusal to drink, and collecting himself, resumed his recital.

"On the very day of the lieutenant's desertion of his ship, the daughter of the nobleman whose life he had saved, eloped from her father's protection; fled with this Matthew Orrall, and became, like him, an outcast on the face of the earth."

The stranger covered his features with his hands, and a heavy sigh shook his manly bosom. Robert Atree echoed it.

"You feel for me," said the stranger quickly. "Ay, me; for I, indeed, was that unhappy father. It was my only child, who then, scarce in her sixteenth year, left her sire's protection for the arms of the villain Matthew Orrall. Since then, and it is now fifteen years, I have unceasingly tracked this man, and till I behold him again I cannot die."

"But, sir," asked Atree, as if extremely agitated, "but, my lord, have you gained no tidings of your child? Does she yet live?"

"I know not," murmured the nobleman. "Once only have I heard from her, and that was shortly after her elopement. It was this letter," continued he, "which you saw me consult in regard to Orrall's name. I had forgotten the man's Christian appellation, and it was to strengthen my memory that I referred to the letter of my wretched child."

"But your lordship has tracked this man."

"I have; but never have I gained intelligence of my lost child. And yet—and yet—"

Again the strong man bowed his forehead upon the palms of his hands.

"She must have borne a child," he murmured, "for in this letter she speaks soon of becoming a mother. Read it—read it, Master Atree."

The stranger again drew the letter from the pocket-book and handed it to the young tory. It was, indeed, as Atree had fancied, stained and blistered with tears that had rained upon it years and years before. It was as might have been expected from an erring daughter to her sire, now praying for forgiveness, now casting herself on his indulgence, and now appealing to his affection, and asserting the violence of her love for him with whom she had fled. It was evident from every line that the noble's daughter had loved the man Orrall most devotedly, for she alluded constantly to his faithfulness and nobleness of soul. Robert Atree read the letter through to the signature, where it appeared the daughter's tears had fallen fastest. When he had finished he glanced once more at the father.

The nobleman still remained with his face hidden by his hands, while his breast quivered with the violence of his awakened recollections. The young man gazed at him unobserved, and a dark smile curled his lip, as the thought of what Matthew Orrall was now, and what he had and might have been, rose on his mind.

"Ha," he muttered to himself, "Robert Atree will plot deeper and surer than that miserable tool."

The stranger looked up at Atree's countenance, but instead of a sneer he beheld an expression of the strongest sympathy.

"I was right in confiding this to you, my friend," he murmured. "You will now assist me in my quest of this man."

"And if his wife still survives, my lord?"

"I dare not hope for that," answered the stranger.

"But a child may still be left."

"Perhaps steeped in his father's guilt; perhaps an outlaw even in infancy," groaned the nobleman.

"But he must surely be too young for that," said Robert Atree. "Let us hope my lord—"

"Hope!" interrupted the stranger. "Would that I could hope. Would that my daughter's child might escape the awful ignominy which hangs about his false father's mysterious life. For rumor says that this Orrall has been a pirate and bravo of the worst kind. Yet for the sake of my wronged and betrayed daughter, I will hope that the villain has not dared to lead her child in his own vile path."

"That may indeed be the case," said Atree. "Perhaps the mother and her child yet live estranged from the wretched Orrall."

"You inspire me with a new hope," cried the noble, his eye brightening at the thought. "O heaven grant that I may find it thus—that the child of my poor Alice may be worthy of the name which, otherwise when I die, will pass away from the list of English nobility."

"Is it indeed so?" asked Atree, while a sudden idea shot like lightning through his mind.

"Are you the last of your lordship's proud line?"

The stranger bowed his lofty head.

"If my daughter dies childless, then, indeed, the name and title of Geoffrey, of Marmount, fades away with his last breath for ever."

A thrill, as if of fire, ran through Robert Atree's veins as he heard these words, and the shadow of a mighty and ambitious thought brooded over his scheming mind. But no one might notice upon the young tory's brow the revelation of what throbbed within his brain.

He smiled with the same apparent sympathy as the nobleman's look met his; and as the haughty stranger rose to depart, returned with a warm grasp the pressure of his hand.

"Keep watch, Master Atree, and lose no opportunity of advancing the interests of our royal master. You will be well remembered when this unnatural conflict of kin with kin is happily ended. And to your friendship and discretion I confide the object nearest to my heart."

"I will do all that a loyal friend can," said Atree.

"Enough. Farewell, now, till we meet again to-morrow, when I think that there will be little need of precaution like this," said the stranger, wrapping his heavy horseman's cloak about him to conceal his glittering uniform.

"I will attend your lordship to the door," said Atree. "Your lordship doubtless took all needful precautions in regard to the concealment of the boat."

"It awaits me in a cove below the island," answered the stranger. "I apprehend not the least danger."

"I will attend your lordship thither, and then proceed to the camp of Gen. Lee."

"Ah—yes," said Geoffrey of Marmount, musingly. "Lee, a brave man he is, though sometimes wrong-headed. I served with him in Spain years ago. Well, well; doubtless we shall meet to-morrow when he and his rebels become our prisoners. And now, Master Atree, I am ready. Farewell."

"Shall I not accompany your lordship to the beach?"

"It is of no consequence. I shall not be molested; and, doubtless, you have the password, which will be as well as your presence, in case I am challenged by the rebel sentries."

"It is here," answered Atree, handing his visitor the countersign of Lee's troops for that day. "Fortunately I procured it this morning when at the camp. With it your lordship need fear nothing."

"Thanks, Master Atree," said Marmount. "Adieu till to-morrow."

And wrapping his form closely in the folds of his cloak, the Englishman bowed to the young tory and departed.

Robert Atree remained some moments in profound meditation. A wild throng of thought was rushing through his brain.

"Ha!" he cried, "this is a bright gleam of fortune! Matthew Orrall, the pirate, the bravo, the hired instrument of Robert Atree, is the son-in-law of the proud noble, Geoffrey of Marmount. He has a child, too; I know that much—a blind girl. I will stake my life this is the grand-daughter of Marmount—the heiress of his name and broad possessions. If it be so—ha! if it be so, I will play a new game with Madam Fortune. There is nothing difficult to a quick brain and a bold hand, and Robert Atree has never yet known the want of either."

And, with these words, the tory agent proceeded to invest himself with a suit of American regimentals, such as were then worn by the regiments raised and accoutered by the colony of South Carolina. Then, arming himself with sword and pistols, Robert Atree sallied out, not, however, by the door at which his visitor had been admitted, but by another opening on the interior of the house, and which he locked carefully after him on the outside.

ELLEN GRAY.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

"Twas May-day morn, nor had a lovelier day
From out the eastern chambers e'er been given;
The lark had left the heath, and flown away.
Singing, into the clear blue vault of Heaven;
The bee went round to tell the flowers 'twas May,
The breeze and sunshine o'er the brook had driven,
Earth laughed with joy, the solemn wood looked gay,
As if its echoes yet might answer, "Ellen Gray."

Slow moving from a woodbined cottage door,
A mournful group in tear-bathed silence came;
Six white-robed village maids a coffin bore,
Their pallid cheeks did their deep grief proclaim;
Each on her bosom a pale lily wore,
An emblem of that virgin's spotless fame;
A white pet-lamb followed a little way,
And by its bleatings seemed to call for Ellen Gray.

But there was one who loved—Oh! where was he?
That night she died from home he frantic fled,
And in the wood, beneath the well-known tree,
On the old moss he laid his aching head,
And thus he answered to the bird or bee:
"Ye need not come here now, for she is dead!
Her hands were cold! she never spoke all day!"
Then would he pluck a flower, and call it "Ellen Gray."

They passed the May-pole—but not thoughtless by,—

The last year's garlands hung all withered there;
They had no colors then to catch the eye,
Yet many an eye gazed on them through a tear;
Blossom, and bud, and bell, and leaf were dry,
Time's crumbling hand had left them brown and sere:

Twelve months ago they decked the Queen of May,
And who?—oh! who was she? They answered,
"Ellen Gray!"

Twelve months ago, and they were blooming there
Lovely as she—then oaken bowers were seen,
And laugh, and shout, and song, rose loud and clear,
And light feet danced adown the daisied green,
And soft cloud-sounding music soothed the ear;
And smiles were showered upon their beauteous queen,

And young and old did willing homage pay
Before the flowery throne, graced by fair Ellen Gray.

They reached the church: the aisle looked dim and cold,

The columns' dreary shadows longer grew;
The old gray roof had never seemed so old;
The full-cheeked angels stood as if they blew
Their stony trumpets, and the dull bell tolled
In sadder tones; the deep-stained window threw
A dying splendor round; the echoes lay
Silent and mute as death, listening for Ellen Gray.

The earth fell hollow on her coffin-lid:

Who hath not felt that fall? The funeral bell
Brought not such wailing woe as that sound did;
It was indeed the eternal long farewell,—
The grave's long darkness. Age and name were hid,
And on the mould the tears in silence fell.
Just then a blackbird's song rose loud and gay,
And to our ears brought back the voice of Ellen Gray.

A hoary elm arose above her grave,
Whose boughs oft bore the silvery-footed showers;

On these the gaudy garlands drooping wave,
Though destined to be worn in happier hours;
But Death the loveliest trophies still doth crave:
They decked her lowly tomb with choicest flowers,

And in that still church-yard till night did stay,
And watered with tears the grave of Ellen Gray.

THE HUSBANDS AND THE WIVES.

A TALE OF THIS CENTURY.

ONE evening early, in the year 18—, two young men were seated in a pleasant-looking bachelor apartment, before a table covered with books and papers. The elder of the two was taller and stouter than his companion; his age was thirty-one, but he looked somewhat older, from the severe and slightly supercilious expression of a cold, greenish grey eye, and the occasionally drawn corners of a handsome mouth; his face was pale, and rather dark, but it was lighted by a warm smile as, shutting a large folio, he looked up at his companion, and said, "Well, Edward, we may venture." His friend, looking up also, disclosed one of those truly radiant faces so delightful to behold, fair and frank, with a profusion of short, light, wavy hair, and smiling, feeling, deep blue eyes, and said, "Oh! that we may, Sidney; but little thanks to me; for the future I promise greater, the greatest attention to our affairs, and I know I shall have an encourager in Helen; my mother thinks so also, and she must be right."

"I will trust you, Ned, without the help of either. Women have their own small affairs to manage, sufficient for them. I shall never trouble my little Mary with what she does not understand."

"Ah, well! Sidney, I know we differ on this subject, but we shall see who makes the best husband; I declare I will not be surpassed. Oh! how happy I am—we are—for I know, Sidney, how you love Mary—that our single selfish lives are so soon to terminate, and wisely, too, thanks to your careful management."

"No thanks, Edward; you have but little to reproach yourself with. I have had the advantage of a few more years to sober me; and now that we are going to take equal responsibilities on us, I do not doubt your energy and activity equaling mine."

Sidney Beaumont and Edward Harley were only sons of partners, two wealthy London merchants; both lost their fathers at an early age, and Sidney's birth had cost his mother her life. Guardians appointed by their fathers had conducted the firm during the minority of the future partners; but as all, even slightly hazardous, speculation was avoided, they found, on its passing into their hands, great activity would be necessary to bring it to its former flourishing condition. For ten years Sidney had toiled early and late, and the effects were visible in his pale and somewhat melancholy countenance. Edward, too, had scarcely taken a less share since attaining his majority, but the fewer years—he was five years younger than Sidney—and a heart made of lighter material, had suffered him to bear his load without adding a wrinkle to his brow. They were both now, as Sidney observed, about to take equal responsibilities on them by marrying; both had chosen wisely, and as their hearts directed them, without that disgraceful searching after wealth in their future wives which contaminates the present generation. Neither would have despised it, had it accompanied the qualities that had won their hearts; neither would have married without a degree of wealth on his own side; but neither would have bartered himself—for what else is it but a barter?—for that worldly ease he was too idle to exert himself to procure.

Mary Graham was ten years younger than Sidney, the only child of a widower; brought up with the greatest care and delicacy, partly owing to a naturally delicate frame, partly to a timidity of disposition, she had scarcely left her own home, where the love of a doating father had surrounded her with every comfort; her life had passed, or rather glided, away untouched by sorrow, her memory not extending back to the loss of her mother; educated at home by a sensible, well meaning governess, she had become singularly gifted in what the world calls accomplishments. Not knowing her own superior proficiency, gentle, calm, and good, she appeared to Sidney, the first time he saw her, as she leaned over the chair of her invalid father, a being of the angel-world; and as she turned her soft, blue, liquid eyes upon him, and smoothed her auburn hair across her blushing brow, requesting him, if possible, to defer his conference with her father until his recovery from a sudden attack of illness.

Sidney felt he had seen a vision that was never to depart from his memory; excuses were easily made to call again and again on Mr. Graham. Mary was always there on his entrance, and on Mr. Graham's recovery Sidney was requested to continue and lengthen his visit as a friend. What wonder that in time Mary gave him that never sufficiently valued, indeed, inestimable treasure, a woman's first, entire, true affection! It is something; to take the hand no other has touched, before; it is some- thing to press the lips no other has breathed upon; but what is it to possessing that miracle of unsullied purity, delicacy, and virtue—her heart; that shrine of noble, generous, and most holy gifts—her mind! Earth boasts no holier thing than a pure and gentle woman, whose only confidant has been her God, whose most earnest wishes have been breathed in prayer. Oh, woman woman! who so generously gives what she herself never receives, for the best of God's masculine creation who receive her love, return her but the impure dregs of their wasted affection; and no woman can give this love to man, unless through him it soars to heaven. God must be beyond and above her love, or this unequal confluence cannot last.

Helen Maitland, unlike Mary Graham, was the fourth of a family that extended to five beyond herself, one of those happy families not rich enough to allow one member selfishly to provide for his own comfort, regardless of the general benefit. Good breeding, as defined by the great Lord Chatham, "the preference of others over ourselves in the trifling daily occurrences of life," was their practical rule of conduct. Helen was but two years younger than Edward Harley, and had long seemed to him the most amiable, where all were so. Accustomed to direct and rule those younger than herself, Helen's judgment was truer and the tone of her mind firmer than Mary Graham's; in beauty, gentleness, and pureness, they were equals. Helen was well known and beloved by Edward's mother, a guarantee to him that in wedding her he was following the everlasting law of God, and taking "an help meet for him." Wisely had he chosen, and nobly and truly was his trust returned. He led his bride to the altar, feeling he was taking strength to his mind, purity to his feelings, virtue to his heart, wisdom to his counsels, fortitude to his trials, and, more than this—sanctification to his unbelief.

Great and glorious mission! Woman is the ascent by which man reaches heaven; she shows to him the faith to enter there, she is the temple of her God! Degrade her, place her lower, man himself deteriorates, and a nation disappears.

Sidney, too, was wedded to the pure and gentle Mary, but did he think, as Edward did, that here he had a moral strength greater than the physical strength of Samson? Oh, no! and to the early misfortune of losing his mother might be traced, in a great degree, the prevailing weakness of Sidney's character, an inferior appreciation of woman's nature. As he had grown up, he had known none intimately of "the best and loftiest of God's feminine creation;" conscious of considerable powers of mind, he fancied he held them in common with mankind only; women were only to amuse his hours of ease. His Maker had said, "It was not good for man to be alone. Sidney thought otherwise, at least he chose to limit its significance in his sole dependence on his mental resources.

Seven years passed away, and the wives had become mothers. Mary had only two children, sons; Helen, six; but Helen was still the Helen of other days, full of life, sense, and feeling seeming scarcely older, but more beautiful. Their homes were apart, as Mary's father had retired to the country, leaving all his affairs in Sidney's hands, and Mary wished to be near her father. Sidney, too, loved the country, but the distance often kept him from his wife, when Helen and Edward were together. Helen was still the friend to whom Edward referred on all occasions of doubt or difficulty, and in spite of energy and activity these had lately increased. The partners had suffered many severe losses; Edward never failed immediately to acquaint Helen with these, and also his dread of more impending; and in doing so, Edward lost half the burden of his anxiety, and Helen, faithful and true, helped him to many a right conclusion. Besides, Helen stopped many outlays in her family which can only be accomplished by female management, for here woman reigns supreme.

Happy would it have been for Sidney, had he followed in the same track; but now, when clouds were gathering over him, he could scarcely have sought the shelter he had refused in sunshine, had he even now seen the error of his ways—and made a friend of the wife he had never done before. And yet Sidney was a good and thoughtful husband. Mary had no desire thwarted. Sidney was no tyrant; but well might she have addressed to him the plaint of Brutus' wife, the gentle Portia, for Mary saw gloom and sadness on her husband's brow, and if she asked the cause, was told it was nothing in which she could assist him. And, perhaps she could not now; her gentleness had turned to apathy, her mind had lost all vigor. She became vaguely impressed, and by slow degrees, that she was never necessary to her husband—the husband who had never uttered a harsh word! And Mary's beauty had sadly faded for want of the life within; yet Mary did her best to retain it, as if she felt a wife was a being only to be looked at. Mary's children, too, were dull and heavy; how could it be otherwise? Young children almost invariably follow in the mother's track; and worse than this, Mary knew of no embarrassments, and retained servants and expenses she could have well done without—all that useless luxury the unsatisfied heart and mind of woman heaps around herself, to stifle the cravings where there is no community of soul.

The worst had still to come; and when, by the failure of some, and the roguery of others, Edward and Sidney found they were ruined men, Edward was cast down, Sidney was crushed. Edward had nothing to disclose to Helen; she could divine it all—his second self!—and two hours after seeing her, he could smile again, for hope and peace had visited his heart; he had not a debt; and with such a woman, and the children of such a woman it was easy to descend to a lowlier state. Edward had many friends, and after some weeks of severe trial he was again in comparative prosperity, managing for the invalid partner of another firm; and in the passing of a year, Edward and Helen had nearly forgotten their misfortunes, and their former wealth and luxury.

Not so, Sidney; he had to inflict a dreadful, sudden blow on Mary, and to learn himself that he was personally involved to a great extent; Mary now, for the first time, learned the cause of her usual supplies being withheld. Sidney struggled for a time against his misfortunes, but his overburdened mind weakened his frame, a fever attacked him, and after weeks of suffering, he escaped with his life, only to be reduced to that saddest state of suffering humanity, one of partial imbecility. Mary was overwhelmed, bewildered by her woes; but she looked upon her children, their father; she saw the weakness of him who had been so strong in his own conceit, and recovered strength herself; she appealed for advice to Helen, and followed it, by removing to London, and assisted by Edward and Helen, and their many friends, Mary found the use of those accomplishments she had until now scarcely valued. Once engaged to impart them, she was sure to be recommended to others, her perfection was so rare, and once again the comforts of home grew around them. Sidney's mind was still unrestored, but Mary was another Mary! Required to exert the powers of her mind, meeting the sympathy of her pupils, the companionship of congenial minds, in Edward and Helen, and more than all, the consciousness of the duty she so ably fulfilled for father, husband, and children, here supported by her sole exertions, she felt the quivering of her increasing intelligence, she became again the noblest work of God—a woman of sense and sensibility, beautiful and blest! for Sidney at last improved, although never entirely regaining his health, and now he could not fail to mark the change in Mary, and Edward ventured to point out to him the error of his life, and show him that he also might have regained his position (for Edward was again becoming a wealthy man, a partner where he had served), had he not in his early days elevated himself on a pedestal of supposed mental superiority, from which he now humbly owned he had been justly hurled, and made to bow in conscious inferiority to that womanly nature that claims, by the laws of God and nature, equality though diversity, of mental gifts.

The Family Circle.

A REQUIEM.

BREATHE low, thou gentle wind,
Breathe soft and low;
The beautiful lies dead!
The joy of life is fled!
And my lone heart is wed
Henceforth to wo!

That thou should'st droop and die
At early morn!
While yet thy graceful dew,
A joyous fragrance drew
From every flower that grew
Life's path along!

The green earth mourns for thee,
Thou dearest one;
A plaintive tone is heard,
And flower and leaflet stirred,
And ev'ry fav'rite bird
Sings sad and lone.

Pale is thy brow, and dimm'd
Thy sparkling eye!
Affection's sweetest token
Is lost for'er and broken!
The last kind word is spoken—
Why did'st thou die?

Breathe low, thou gentle wind,
Breathe soft and low;
The beautiful lies dead!
The joy of life is fled!
And my lone heart is wed
Henceforth to wo!

THE RICH OPPRESSOR.

On the first of July, 1845, along a dusty road, and underneath a broiling sun, a man about fifty, dressed in a shabby parsonic black, might have been seen threading his way. Mr. Simpson—such was the name of the pedestrian—passed under the denomination of a mathematical tutor, though it was now some years since he had been known to have any pupil. He was now bent from the village of Q—to the country seat of Sir John Stevenson, which lay in its neighborhood. He had received the unusual honor of an invitation to dinner at the great man's house.

Notwithstanding the heat of the sun, our mathematician contrived to deliver himself in a tolerable state of preservation at the mansion of St. John. We pass over the ceremony of dinner, and draw up the curtain when Sir John Stevenson had contrived to withdraw Mr. Simpson from the drawing-room, without observation, to a little study adjoining. Our readers will naturally conclude that there existed some peculiar reason for the invitation passed on our hero, who was not, in many respects, altogether the person, under ordinary circumstances, to find himself a guest at rich men's tables. The following conversation will explain this departure from the usual course of things.

"You were some years," said Sir John, "a tutor in the family of the late Mr. Scott?"

"I was," responded Mr. Simpson, "and prepared his son for Cambridge. Had the young man lived—"

"He would I am sure," politely interrupted Sir John, "have borne testimony to the value of your instruction. I am, as you may be aware, the executor of Mr. Scott. That gentleman was so well satisfied with the exertions you made, and the interest you took in his son, that, on your quitting him, he presented you, I believe, with an annuity of fifty pounds, to be enjoyed during your life. This is, if I may be allowed to say so, the chief source of your income."

"The only one," answered Mr. Simpson. "For, although I proclaim myself teacher of mathematics, yet, if I may venture to say so, my life is, indeed, devoted to the science for the love of science itself, and with the hope of enrolling my name—although the very last and humblest—among those who have perfected our knowledge of mathematics, and extend their application. I have already conceived, and in part executed a work."

Mr. Simpson was launching on a full tide of his favorite subject.

"Very good," quickly interrupted Sir John; "very good; but with regard to the annuity. I have not yet looked over the papers relating to it; and I hope for your sake, I shall find it properly secured."

"I have a deed formally drawn up."

"True, true; and I hope all will be found straightforward in this, and in other affairs of the testator, and that nothing will compel me to call in the assistance or sanction of the Court of Chancery in administering the estate. In that case, although your claim might be ultimately substantiated, yet the payment of your annuity might for some years be suspended."

"I pray God not!" exclaimed our man of science, with some trepidation. "I have lived so much alone, so entirely among my figures and diagrams, that I have not a friend in the world of whom I could borrow sixpence."

"Well, I trust," resumed Sir John, after a short pause, "there will be no occasion for applying to the Court of Chancery. There ought to be none. There is but one child, Mrs. Vincent, who is now in the drawing room. The great essential is to keep prying and meddling attorneys from thrusting themselves into the business. You acted as confidential secretary as well as tutor, while you were domiciled with Mr. Scott?"

"I did."

"There was a pecuniary transaction between myself and Mr. Scott, to which, I think, you were privy."

"A loan of ten thousand pounds, for which you gave your bond."

"Exactly. I see that you are informed of that circumstance. You are not, perhaps, equally well informed that that bond was cancelled; that the debt, in short, was paid. This happened after you had left Mr. Scott. But although, as I tell you, this debt no longer exists, yet it might create a great embarrassment to me, and to every person interested in the estate of the testator, if it were known that such a debt ever existed. Mrs. Vincent has just returned from India, expecting a very considerable fortune from her late father. To her, in general, the whole property is left. She will be disappointed; there is much less than she anticipates. However, not to make a long story of this matter, all I have to request of you is this: if any one should question you as to the property of your late patron, and especially as to this transaction, be you silent—know nothing. As you have ever been a man of books, busied in abstractions, the answer will appear quite natural. This will save you, be assured, from much vexation, disquietude, and grievous interruption to your studies, and I shall rest your debtor for your considerate behavior. A contrary course will create embarrassment to all parties, and put in jeopardy your own annuity, on which, as you say, you depend entirely for subsistence."

During this speech Mr. Simpson had sat perfectly silent. When satisfied that he fully comprehended Sir John, he rose from his seat, and briefly intimating that he should not leave him long in doubt as to the manner in which he should act, turned, and abruptly left the room. Sir John had no time to arrest him, and could only follow and be a witness to his movements. He entered the drawing-room.

In the center of that apartment, throned, as it were, upon a sofa, were seated two ladies; the one was Lady Stevenson, the other Mrs. Vincent. Mr. Simpson drew a chair to the vacant spot beside Mrs. Vincent, and immediately entered into conversation upon the subject that at that moment engrossed all his thoughts; he reminded her of the confidential intimacy which had subsisted between himself and her late father; proffered his assistance to aid her in the arrangement of her affairs; and, in particular, gave a succinct account of the transaction which Sir John had manifested so great anxiety to conceal.

The manner in which all this was said so entirely took Sir John Stevenson by surprise, that he was unable to interfere with a single word. Mrs. Vincent, to whom the information was evidently quite new, concealed the embarrassment she felt in some general expressions of thanks to Mr. Simpson. He, when he had fulfilled his object, rose, and making a bow to his host and hostess, quitted the house.

A year rolled round, and Mrs. Vincent became established in all her rights. Sir John Stevenson had been disappointed in the fraudulent scheme he had devised; not disappointed, however, as he deemed, in the revenge he had taken on the man who had frustrated it. Payment of Mr. Simpson's annuity was resisted, and the poor mathematician was in great straits for even the bare necessities of life. Ask not, reader, on what legal pretences Sir John had been successful in inflicting this revenge. Such pretences are "thick as blackberries." No rich suitor ever sought long for admission into the Court of Chancery, however difficult even he may have found the escape from it.

Poor Simpson knew not where to look for a pupil, nor for a friend who would recommend him. When a man has ceased to cultivate his relationship with society, and wishes, after a time, to return to them, he finds that a blank wall has been built up between him and the world. Some unavailing attempts the man of science made to obtain his rights through litigation; but he soon found that, to the loss of his money, he was adding the loss of all tranquillity of mind. The lawyer he employed neglected (and very naturally) a suit which would have required on his part great advances, the repayment of which was very precarious. In this predicament he bethought himself of making an appeal to Mrs. Vincent, the lady whom he had so greatly benefited by his honorable conduct. He therefore betook himself to London, where Mrs. Vincent had established herself.

Our readers must now imagine themselves introduced into an elegantly furnished drawing-room, in one of the most fashionable quarters of the metropolis. Nothing could exceed the graceful and kind manner in which Mrs. Vincent received poor Simpson, who was completely overpowered with his reception. The object of his visit seemed already accomplished. Hardly did it appear necessary to proceed with any verbal statement; surely she knew his position, and this was enough. She had been restored to her rights; she would not, she could not, allow him to suffer by an act which led to this restoration; still less would she consent to reap herself the benefit of an injustice perpetrated upon him.

Some explanation, however, of the object of his visit he found it necessary to make. When he had concluded the brief statement which he thought sufficient, the lady answered in the softest voice in the world—that she was sorry she could not enter upon that subject, as she had promised Sir John Stevenson not to interfere between him and Mr. Simpson—that Sir John had exacted this promise, and she had given it, as necessary to facilitate the arrangement of her affairs. She was bound, therefore, she regretted to say, not to intermeddle in the business. But then Mr. Simpson could proceed with his legal remedies. She did not presume to pass an opinion upon the justice of his claim, nor to advise him not to prosecute it. In brief, she had given up the brave and honorable man, who had befriended her at the peril of his fortune, to the revenge of the wealthy, unscrupulous baronet, who had intended to defraud her. It was so agreeable to be on amicable terms with her father's executor!

It was not in the disposition of Mr. Simpson to play the petitioner, and still less to give vent to feelings of indignation and anger, which would be thought to have their origin only in his own personal injuries. He permitted himself only to say,—"But surely, madam, you do not understand this matter. This annuity was honestly won by long services rendered to your father, and to his son. Instead of receiving other payments, I had preferred to be finally remunerated in this form; it was my desire to obtain what, in my humble ideas, was an independence, that I might devote my life to science. Well, this annuity, it is my all; it stands between me and absolute penury—it is the plank on which I sail over the waters of life. I have, too, an object for my existence, which this alone renders possible. I have studies to pursue, discoveries to make. This sum of money is more than my life, it is my license to study and to think."

"Oh, but, Mr. Simpson," interrupted the lady with a smile, "I understand nothing of mathematics."

Mr. Simpson checked himself. No, she did not understand him. What was his love of science, or his hope of fame to her? What to her was any one of the pains and pleasures that constituted his existence?

"Besides," added the lady, "you are a bachelor, Mr. Simpson. You have no children. It can matter little—"

A grim smile played upon the features of the mathematician. He was probably about to tell her that, as children are destined to become men, the interests of a man may not be an unworthy subject of anxiety. But at this moment a servant entered, and announced Sir John Stevenson.

On perceiving Mr. Simpson, that gentleman was about to retreat; and, with a look of something like distrust at Mrs. Vincent, he said that he would call again.

"Nay, come in!" exclaimed the mathematician with a clear voice. "Come in! The lady has not broken her word, nor by me shall she be petitioned to do so. It is I who will quit this place. You have succeeded, Sir John, in your cruel revenge—you have succeeded, and yet, perhaps, it is an imperfect success. You shall not rack the heart, though you should starve the body. You think, perhaps, that I shall pursue you with oburgation or entreaty. You are mistaken. I leave you to the enjoyment of your triumph, and to the peace which a blunted conscience will, I know, bestow upon you."

Sir John muttered, in reply, that he could not debate matters of business, but must refer him to his solicitor.

"Neither personally," continued Mr. Simpson, "nor by your solicitor, will you hear more of me. I shall forget you, Sir John. Whatever sufferings you may inflict, you shall not fill my heart with bitterness; your memory shall not call forth a single curse from me."

He strode out of the room. His parting word was no idle boast. Sir John heard of him and of his just claims no more; and the brave-hearted man swept the memory of the villain from his soul.

As we have already said, Mr. Simpson had lived too long out of the world to find either friends or pupils; and the more manifest his poverty the more hopeless became his applications. At last utter destitution stood face to face before him. Did he spend his last coin in the purchase of the mortal dose? Did he leap at night from any of the bridges of the metropolis? He was built of stouter stuff.

He collected together his manuscripts, a book or two, his ink-bottle, and an iron pen, and marched straight—to the parish work house. There was no refusing his claim there. Poverty and famine were legible in every garment and on every feature. In that asylum he ended his days, unknown, unsought for.

DAUGHTERS.—When a young woman behaves to her parents in a manner particularly tender and respectful—I mean from principle as well as nature—there is nothing good and gentle that may not be expected from her, in whatever condition she is placed. Of this I am so thoroughly persuaded, that, were I to advise any friend of mine as to his choice of a wife, I know not whether my very first counsel would not be, "Look out for one distinguished by her attention and sweetness to her parents." The fund of worth and affection indicated by such a behavior, joined to the habits of duty and consideration thereby contracted, being transferred to the married state, will not fail to render her a mild and obliging companion.—[Fordyce.]

How to Look Young.—How is it that some men, thought to be so old, still look so young; whilst others, know to be so young, must still look old? The cause lies frequently within themselves. One who led an incorrupt life, on being asked the secret, gave this answer: "I never ride when I can walk; I never eat but one dish at dinner; and never get intoxicated. My walking keeps my blood in circulation; my simple diet prevents indigestion; and never touching ardent spirits, my liver never fears being eaten up alive."

WAITING AND WATCHING.

Be waiting and watching
The signs of the times,
And daily keep thundering
At prevailing crimes.

The evils will lessen
With every stout blow;
The brighter the weapon,
The weaker the foe.

Till totter and crumble
The pillars of wrong;
'Tis Justice that maketh
Weak instruments strong.

The Right! it must prosper,
Whatever oppose;
However malignant
Or stout be her foes.

Like the steps of the morning,
Majestic and free,
She'll onward and triumph,
How gloriously!

IMPROVEMENT NECESSARY TO HAPPINESS.

REFLECTION is necessary to the enjoyment of all; therefore to acquire a habit of it is a point of the utmost importance to happiness, in every situation in life; yet it is a point too little attended to in most systems of education. According to the usual method, instruction consists in exercising the memory, while the other powers of the mind are neglected, and either become totally inactive, or else run wild into a thousand extravagances, and prove the most fatal enemies to that happiness which they were intended to promote. In order to do this it is necessary that they should be cultivated and improved, and directed to proper objects; not lost for want of exertion, or suppressed from a fear of the mischiefs they may occasion. The best book, or the most instructive conversation, will afford little pleasure or advantage by being merely remembered, in comparison of what it might afford by exciting new reflections in the mind; for these lead to new trains of thought, and make the riches of others become in some sort its own. Without this every kind of study will be dull and uninteresting, because it will only fill the memory, without improving the mind or affecting the heart. A new language will only furnish a new set of words; yet by comparing it with those already known, we may find means of explaining our sentiments and ideas more distinctly, and perhaps of setting things in a clearer light, even to ourselves. The study of any branch of philosophy, instead of being merely an employment for the memory, may tend to new observations and discoveries, and raise the mind by degrees to contemplations of a far higher kind. History, instead of supplying us only with a knowledge of facts, may give us a further insight into the human heart, and furnish many useful observations in regard to our conduct in life, if we accustom ourselves to seek the remote causes of great events, and trace to their source the secret springs of action, which will often be found far different from what at first sight they appeared to have been.

Poetry, from a trifling amusement, may be raised to a pleasure of the highest kind, if it makes us feel more strongly the exalted sentiments which it expresses, and elevates the mind to a contemplation of its native dignity, and a consciousness of powers for enjoyment beyond what anything in this world can satisfy. By such methods as these some kind of improvement may be found in almost every study, besides that which is its immediate object; and a consciousness of improvement is a never-failing source of pleasure.

The same method may also be applied to the common occurrences of private life. Whenever improvement is really the object of pursuit, numberless opportunities for attaining it—too generally overlooked—will be continually presenting themselves, and it is astonishing to observe how often such opportunities are lost from mere inattention, and from want of being accustomed to look within ourselves. Those who are continually employed in endeavoring to display their talents to others, will scarcely ever do this to any purpose. Their attention is engaged by what they wish to appear to be, not by what they really are. This is often carried so far that they often impose upon themselves as well as others. And while this deception continues, the evil is without a remedy; all hope of improvement must be entirely at a stand still. There is, indeed, hardly anything in the world so fatal to improvement of every kind as the practice, which too generally prevails, of substituting appearances in the place of realities. Those instructions which teach the art of doing this, however plausible they may appear in many instances, will be found to be far more pernicious than at first sight would be imagined, not only by setting up another object of pursuit in the place of real improvement, and teaching a continual habit of deceit, but also by bringing true merit into discredit. Those who are conscious that they are acting a part themselves, will always be apt to suspect others of doing the same. Those who can find means of acquiring the reputation of merit of any kind, which they do not possess, will hardly be at the trouble afterwards of endeavoring to acquire the reality.

In solitude there is much less danger of self-deceit. Our thoughts are not dissipated by a variety of objects, nor employed in gaining the good opinion of others. The judgment we form of ourselves is not made dependent on that opinion, as it sometimes happens in society, especially when we have any reason to believe that it inclines to the side most favorable to our vanity. We must then feel and improve those powers which we possess, in order to enjoy them. For this reason, as well as for many others, it may be useful to all to be sometimes accustomed to solitude, especially in the early part of life, while the mind enjoys its full vigor, and the spirits are not broken by sickness and affliction. They will then find the resources which they possess, and learn that it is possible to amuse and improve themselves. Probably a time will come when solitude will be unavoidable, or when, from distaste to society, or from other causes, it may appear desirable. But to those who have never been accustomed to enjoy the pleasures and advantages it might afford, it will then, in all probability, be a painful and dangerous situation. Unconscious of those resources which they might have found within themselves, and unaccustomed to intellectual pleasures, they will hardly be able to acquire a relish for them at a time when the spirits, and perhaps the temper, are impaired by the disappointments and mortifications of society. They will be apt to dwell on discontented thoughts, and fancy themselves better than the rest of the world, merely because they are weary of it, till their benevolence is weakened by their continually viewing everything in the worst light, and they grow proud of the faults of others, not of their own good qualities. In such a state of mind, no advantage will be gained by being obliged to take a nearer view of their own character and conduct; for, instead of comparing themselves with that degree of excellence which they might have attained, they will form their judgment by a comparison of themselves with the unfavorable opinion they have formed of others. Their ill-humor, as well as their vanity, will secure to themselves the preference, yet will deprive them, at the same time, of any satisfaction this preference might afford; for their ill-humor will make them a burden to themselves, and their vanity will make them eager to gain the applause of others, and be continually mortified and disappointed at finding they do not succeed. Thus the gloom of solitude will be added to the disgust of society. The pleasures of the one will be lost, those of the other unknown or unenjoyed.

A GOOD ARRANGEMENT.—In France, all ladies who do not possess a decided ample fortune make it a point to learn some practical art of business, which, in case of reverses of fortune, they may use it to obtain living. There are doubtless many thousand females among the easy classes in this city who are destitute of any acquirement that could be made available in case of necessity.

SPURN NOT THE POOR MAN.

BY JOHN PARKER.

SPURN not the poor man, spurn him not,
Though horny be his hands;
Nor gold nor silver has he got,
Nor houses, no nor lands.
Yet cast not thou that scornful glance
Upon his sunburnt face;
For though he's poor, his poverty
Can never thee disgrace.

His coat may of the coarsest be,
Made out of hoddin gray,
And thine be of the best broad cloth,
And trimm'd so fine and gay.
Thy polish'd boots may brightly shine,
In fashion fitting neat;
And his poor clogs be dingy brown,
And shapeless on his feet.

Yes, his exterior may be rude,
And no attractions show;
And his connections be among
The lowest of the low;
But in that casket rough to view
A gem may be concealed,—
As bright a gem as ever yet
Was to the world revealed.

Full many a mine of priceless worth
Is hid within the breast
Of many a poor neglected one,
Cast down and sore oppress'd;
Among the poorest of the poor
Earth's noblest sons abound;
The best, the purest, greatest, still
The cottage hearth surround.

THE ATMOSPHERE.—The atmosphere rises above us with its cathedral dome arching towards the heaven, of which it is the most familiar synonym and symbol. It floats around us like that grand object which the apostle John saw in his vision—"a sea of glass like unto crystal." So massive is it, that, when it begins to stir, it tosses about great ships like playthings, and sweeps cities and forests like snow-flakes to destruction before it. And yet it is so mobile that we have lived years in it before we can be persuaded it exists at all, and the great bulk of mankind never realize the truth that they are bathed in an ocean of air. Its weight is so enormous that iron shivers before it like glass, yet a soap-ball sails through it with impunity, and the tiniest insect waves it with its wings. It ministers lavishly to all the senses. We touch it not, but it touches us; its warm south wind brings back color to the pale face of the invalid; its cool west winds refresh the fevered brow and make the blood mantle in our cheeks; even its north blasts brace into new vigor the hardened children of our rugged clime. The eye is indebted to it for all the magnificence of sunrise, the full brightness of mid-day, the chastened radiance of the gloaming, and the clouds that cradle near the setting sun. But for it the rainbow would want its triumphal arch, and the winds would not send their fleecy messengers on errands round the heavens. The cold ether would not shed its snowfeathers on the earth, nor would drops of dew gather on the flowers. The kindly rain would never fall—hail, storm, nor fog diversify the face of this sky. Our naked globe would turn its tanned unshadowed forehead to the sun, and one dreary monotonous blaze of light and heat dazzle and burn up all things. Were there no atmosphere, the evening sun would in a moment set, and, without warning, plunge the earth in darkness. But the air keeps in her hand a sheaf of his rays, and lets them slip but slowly through her fingers; so that the shadows of evening gather by degrees, and the flowers have time to bow their heads, and each creature space to find a place of rest and nestle to repose. In the morning the garish sun would at one bound forth from the bosom of night and blaze above the horizon; but the air watches for his coming, and sends at first but one little ray to announce his approach, and then another, and by and by a handful; and so gently draws aside the curtain of night, and slowly lets the light fall on the face of the sleeping earth, till her eyelids open, and, like man, she goeth forth again to her labor until the evening.—[Quarterly Review.

How SOME PEOPLE GET INTO SOCIETY.—Society means a certain set of people who bow to each other in the street, indulge in morning calls upon each other, and attend each other's parties. People who do no such things are said not to go into society.

Good society is made up of people who live in good houses, in good parts of the city, who have good furniture; wear good clothes, and are in some respectable business, or rich enough to live without any.

Fashionable society supposes a little more than this; a little more wealth, pretension and display. People in fashionable society must figure at the Opera and go to Saratoga. They must wear extensive shawls and diamonds, keep a carriage, and make themselves especially elegant and recherche.

There is a class of ultra fashionables, made up of what are called parvenues, or people grown rich by speculation, who, having lived all their lives in a vulgar manner, are very anxious to make up for lost time. They live extravagantly, keep servants in livery, make a great dash and display, and give themselves airs which to all sensible and well bred people are very ridiculous. Conscious that they have nothing but their wealth to recommend them, they make the greatest contempt for all that are destitute of their only claim upon public attention.

There is above all these a small class of an unobtrusive, pure and gentle aristocracy, dependent upon education, taste and refinement, which, without any display, is every where observed, and is the especial envy of the parvenues and fashionables. As the rank of this society does not depend on riches, the poor, to a certain extent, as well as the rich, belong to it; and it is by its qualities and constitution, the most exclusive of all societies, since it is impossible for any one to belong to it without possessing the proper qualifications. Besides, the ambition of aspirants is generally directed to the more showy sets of fashion and flash.

It is curious to observe the efforts which people make to get into the society of their ambition. The ladies are especially anxious. There is nothing they will not do to get introduced to certain people, and to obtain the recognition of certain coteries.

For this, they will break up housekeeping, and board at fashionable hotels. For this, they move from street to street, and square to square; paying rent beyond their incomes, and running their husbands in debt for carpets and upholstery. For this, they run up heavy bills at the dry goods stores, and ride about in a carriage, when their husbands are running their legs off, shinning to pay their notes in Wall street. For this, they struggle to get the best pew in the most fashionable churches where they go on Sunday, greatly against their inclinations, the only consolation being that some person of acknowledged position saw their new bonnet or shawl.

AN AUSTRALIAN NIGHT.—It is difficult for a writer to give a good description of the amazing beauty of an Australian sky. The transparency of its colors, various as those of the rainbow, could only be conveyed by a first-rate painter; if, indeed, it be in the power of any one to do justice to such a subject. But if the heavens are grand during the day, the night also, in its more subdued colors and tranquil loveliness, fully equals the daylight scene; then, indeed, the expansive vault claims all our admiration; and every star, shining out with wonderful distinctness, seems to court the attention of the silver moon as she majestically glides upon her allotted path. I have frequently been out on a journey on such a night, and while allowing the horse his own time to walk along the road, have solaced myself by reading in the still moonlight. In the bush, at a time like this, the birds having gone to roost (save a species of owl, and one or two other high-birds), all nature seems at rest, and the peace of the scene is unbroken, except by the watch-dogs at the stations challenging the lonely howl of the wild dogs by their deep bark, which is echoed and re-echoed from hill to hill, until lost in the distance.—[Wilkinson's Australia.

VULGAR ERRORS.—That in order to disinherit an heir-at-law it is necessary to give him a shilling by the will, for that otherwise he would be entitled to the whole property. That a funeral passing over any place makes it a public highway. That the body of a debtor may be taken in execution after his death. That a man marrying a woman who is in debt, if he takes her from the hands of the priest clothed only in her shift, will not be liable for her engagements. That persons who are born at sea belong to Stepney parish. That second cousins may not marry, though first cousins may. That a husband has the power of divorcing his wife, by selling her in open market with a halter round her neck, first taking her through a tool-bar. That a woman's marrying a man under the gallows will save him from execution. That if a criminal has been hanged and revives, he cannot afterwards be executed. [English paper.

WAR.—Voltaire thus expresses himself on the subject of war: "A hundred thousand mad animals, whose heads are covered with hats, advance to kill or to be killed by their fellow-mortals covered with turbans. By this strange procedure, they want to know whether a tract of land, to which none of them has any claim, should belong to a certain man whom they call Sultan, or another whom they call Czar—neither of whom ever saw, or ever will see, the spot so furiously contended for; and very few of those creatures who thus mutually butcher each other ever beheld the animal for whom they cut each other's throats! From time immemorial this has been the way of mankind almost all over the earth. What an excess of madness is this! and how deservedly might a superior Being crush to atoms this earthly ball—the bloody nest of such ridiculous murderers!"

SAGACITY OF A MONKEY.—The servant of a medical gentleman, who was sometime in India, caught a young monkey, and brought it to his tent, where every care was taken of it; but the mother was so greatly distressed with the loss of her progeny, that she never ceased uttering the most piteous tones, night or day, in the immediate vicinity of the tent. The doctor at length tired out with the incessant howling, desired the servant to restore the young one back to its mother, which he did, when the poor animal cheerfully retired, and sped its way to the community to which it had belonged. Here, however, she found she could not be received. She and her progeny had lost caste, and, like the hunted deer, were beaten and rejected by the flock. A few days after, our medical friend was greatly surprised to see the monkey return to his tent, bringing the young one along with it. It entered his tent of its own accord, apparently very much exhausted; and having deposited its young one, it then retired a few yards from the tent, and there laid itself down and died. On examining the carcass of the poor animal, it was found in a most emaciated state, starved, wounded, and scratched all over, so that there can be no doubt that it had been dreadfully maltreated by its comrades; and, finding no safety for itself or its offspring, returned the little one into the hands of those who were the cause of its misfortunes.

WHAT a mistake to suppose that the passions are strongest in youth! The passions are not stronger, but the control over them is weaker. They are more easily excited—they are more violent and apparent; but they have less energy, less durability, less intense and concentrated power than in maturer life. In youth passion succeeds to passion, and one breaks upon the other, as waves upon a rock, till the heart frets itself to repose. In manhood, the great deep flows on more calmly, but more profound; its serenity is the proof of the might and terror of its course, were the wind to blow and the storm to rise. A young man's ambition is but vanity—it has no definite aim—it plays with a thousand toys. As with one passion, so with the rest.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1849.

POPULAR EDUCATION.

LONG ago we published a series of letters addressed by James L. Ridgely, Esq., of Baltimore, to the Hon. Wiley Williams, of Georgia, on the subject of education in connection with Odd-Fellowship, and more recently we have given our readers another letter of the same import from the last named gentleman.

These letters, it will be remembered, proposed a plan for the establishment of an extensive school for the education of the orphans of our Order. A most magnificent and benevolent plan all good Odd-Fellows must allow, although to some of its details we objected, and expressed our objections at the time.

This idea of a great national college, for the education of the indigent orphans of our deceased brothers, we most cordially approve; and under proper management it could not but be eminently successful. That the Order of Odd-Fellows has the means to establish such an institution, none can doubt, who knows anything of its present position, and of the number and character of its members. Its revenue now reaches to nearly a million of dollars annually, and not one half of this has ever been required to meet the various expenditures—including benefits, charity, &c. Three hundred thousand dollars may therefore be devoted annually to this cause of education. With such a revenue this Odd-Fellows' College would be the most efficient, the most extensive, and the most richly endowed of any university in the land. That such an institution will be founded, sooner or later, we have not a doubt. Indeed, we know of no other disposition that can be made of the immense funds of our association.

We would hope, however, that this great national school of charity, might differ in some respects from most existing schools. Our meaning will be easily gathered from the following brief exposition of our views on the education of the young:

1. Education should be practical, and ever have reference to the aptitude of the pupils. In most colleges education is little more than a barren routine of exercises, entirely mechanical, and which leaves the mind as poor as it found it. Consequently we find that the great majority of liberally educated men, are more ignorant than the same number of intelligent men, whose education has been obtained at the common schools. Of the graduates of our colleges there is not more than one in three hundred who is a respectable scholar, or who comes forth into the world with any ideas. Ideas are not taught, but exercises are imposed. One great cause of this serious error is, that science is regarded as an end, rather than a means. But the sciences themselves are dry, cold and dead, of no worth only as a means of communion with the eternal verities of the universe. True, science in its highest sense—or knowledge—is the end of all study. But the sciences of the schools have not this extensive import. The science of chemistry, for example, is the means of ascertaining the character and quality of substances. The science of language is the means of discovering the thought of a people, which is thus expressed. But the systems of education in vogue do not recognise this fact. A man dreams of the treasures hid in the California gold mines, and purchases a pick-axe, and one of Leavenworth's gold-washers, and learns the use of it, and then stays at home, imagining that he holds in possession the pure ore of the Rio del Plumas, when he has only the means of possessing it. "Such a man would be a fool," one exclaims. We admit it, most readily; and yet he is the true type of a scholar fashioned by our present systems of education. He has his pick-axe and gold-washer, but no gold. So the graduate has his education, but no ideas. He knows how to read a little Latin, and a little Greek, knows that psuchē is a Greek noun of the first declension, and that logos is ditto of the second; and he has learned a few other things. But he never read a page of Cicero, Seneca, or Plato, for the purpose of getting at the thoughts of those sages, and probably never will. We are not among those who rail against the study of what are termed the dead languages, nor do we condemn the science of the olden time. On the contrary, we reverence the sages of antiquity, and have profited much by an earnest study of the literature and philosophy of the past. A classical education we consider highly important; but then, in our opinion, it implies something more than a knowledge of nouns and verbs.

The evil of which we complain arises chiefly from the fact that, in all our schools the same routine of instruction is prescribed for all, without reference to the capacity or aptitude of the pupil, or to his prospective occupation. In other words, education is not practical.

In the proposed university of our Order, we should desire a different system of instruction, which would be more thorough, and could accommodate itself to the idiosyncracies of each pupil. The London University is an institution of this description. The American University of Vermont is another. The latter is still in its infancy, but is rapidly increasing in strength, and rising in the estimation of the public. Captain Partridge, the president, has for the third of a century been an instructor, and has seized on the true idea of education. We have already suggested the idea of adopting this university as the basis of our great National Orphan Institute. This subject will be continued in our next.

"KEEP COOL."

WE are sorry to see an article like the following in the Boston Odd-Fellow, a journal for which, and for whose editor, we have ever had a high regard. But this article is so full of misrepresentation, that we fear we shall be obliged to charge Bro. Cochrane with at least a most remarkable ignorance of the whole subject. He would have it that Dr. Wallace and ourself are pecking at each other like two fighting cocks, for the amusement of the public. This is all wrong. With the Mirror of the Times we have never had any controversy; nor can we. We have never alluded to the Mirror in the spirit of controversy. Ever has our journal pursued the even tenor of its way, abusing nobody, but advocating earnestly, and we hope with charity, the principles of Odd-Fellowship, and the supremacy of law and order.

KEEP COOL.—Every thing in this region, in relation to Odd-Fellowship, is so quiet, that we find it difficult to catch a subject for a paragraph. We almost envy our brothers of the Gazette of the Union, and the Mirror of the Times, in New York. They are holding quite an animated discussion on the Constitution question, the former advocating the old, and the latter the new. The Odd-Fellows of New York feel a deep interest in the discussion, and editors Arnold and Wallace, like two well-fed lawyers, are willing to keep the strife up as long as there is a single argument left which will bear the fiftieth repetition, and not show a break in its thread-bare fabric. It seems as though everything had been said and done on both sides which could be, without resorting to measures that would compromise the harmony and welfare of the Order forever. The New England Lodges, as a general thing, sympathize with the New Constitution party, and they regret that the Grand Lodge of the United States has not done what it ought to conciliate the aggrieved brethren. Whether or not a minority is as modest as it should be in its claims for redress or reform, it affords no excuse for the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the majority. The spirit of the age is opposed to the usurpations of might. This country, of all, is the last for any institution to attempt to sustain itself by arbitrary enactments. It would soon be a throne without subjects, and its edicts, for their pompous emptiness, would only provoke a smile of contempt. The next session of the Grand Lodge, we confidently anticipate, will adopt some plan by which the difficulties in New York will be amicably adjusted. Till then, it should be the aim of all parties interested, to keep as cool and patient as possible.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN MISSISSIPPI.

LETTER FROM THE GRAND SECRETARY.

NATCHEZ, Feb. 12, 1849.

EDITOR GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE—Sir and Bro.: Having a little time that may be charged to account of leisure, I embrace it to advise you of the steady progression of Odd-Fellowship within the jurisdiction of the State of Mississippi. The Order here for the past eighteen months has done well. Within that period there has been instituted thirteen new Lodges, and we have had an accession of six hundred new members. In the Subordinate branch of the Order, there are now thirty-five working Lodges. In the Patriarchal branch, a Grand Encampment, located in this city, and some eight or nine Subordinate Camps, the oldest of which, Wildey No. 1, is located here. Our Grand Lodge held a Semi-Annual Session in this city on the 22d, 23d and 24th days of last month. The meeting was not so well attended as usual, on account of a rumor that the cholera was prevailing here, which deterred many from coming to the city; consequently a number of the interior Lodges failed to have Representatives present. A portion of the business before the G. L., and laid over from the July session, was therefore postponed; the most important of which is an amendment to the Constitution, contemplating a removal of the seat of the Grand Lodge, either to Vicksburg, or to the city of Jackson, the capital of the State. This, with us, is rather a vexed question. It has been in agitation for three or four years, and as no substantial reason can be urged for a change, the G. Lodge has, heretofore, repeatedly decided against such amendment to its Constitution. As the number of Lodges increase in the interior of the State, there would seem, at first sight, to be some injustice in keeping the G. Lodge at Natchez, the extreme of the jurisdiction; but this injustice is only apparent. The facilities for reaching this city by water, from the Northern part of the State, are such as to make it no more expensive to the Lodges to send Representatives to Natchez, than it would be to send them to the center of the State. Therefore, Natchez should have the preference, (no pecuniary difference existing that would prove detrimental to the Order,) from the fact that this place is the cradle of Odd-Fellowship in Mississippi, and now has four Subordinate Lodges in a flourishing condition, with a very respectable number of members to each, and it being the seat of the G. Encampment of the State, which holds its Semi-Annual Communications at the same time with the G. Lodge.

The revenue of the Lodges, so far as reported, for the past term, amounted to near $8000; amount of relief afforded, same period, $2,232; expulsions, only 4; whole number in membership, near 1,400.

Bro. Welton, of Baltimore, visited our city not many weeks since, in behalf of the "Gazette of the Union and Golden Rule." He spent a few days with us. During his stay he visited the Lodges, and made himself very agreeable. His very polite and persuasive manner, or the combined excellence of the rule by which he worked, or the Rule itself, with a golden influence, made a very respectable addition to the number of patrons here. He obtained some thirty or forty new subscribers, of which, no doubt, you are advised. He left this place for Baton Rouge.

In the bonds of the Order, truly yours,
Jno. B. Dicks, G. Sec.

NEW-HAMPSHIRE.

A NEW Lodge has recently been instituted at Bristol, N. H., under the title of Pennigewasset Lodge No. 27. The following list of officers was elected and duly installed by the M. G. Grand Master J. C. Lyford, assisted by Grand Rep. Stephen Brown, of Concord, P. Gs. Nath'l. Smith, of Mechanic's Lodge No. 13, C. W. Farker, C. W. Russell, and S. J. Osgood, of Winnipissioogee Lodge No. 7. J. C. Blaisdell, N. G.; Geo. B. Burns, V. G.; H. R. Fuller, Secretary; O. B. Davis, Treasurer.

The officers of Winnipissioogee Lodge No. 7, for the current term, are—S. J. Osgood, N. G.; B. F. Palmer, V. G.; E. S. Lawrence, Secretary; C. W. Cook, Treasurer. This Lodge numbered, at the commencement of the present year, one hundred and twenty-three members, since which time twelve have been added. We congratulate the Brethren of the Granite State upon the flourishing state of the Order among them.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN MISSOURI.

THE PRESENT STATE, AND FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE ORDER IN MISSOURI.—The best evidence which can be adduced of the prosperity of our Order in this State, may be found in that harmony and union which every where prevails within its limits, not that harmony which results from, and is the legitimate offspring of apathy and lukewarmness, but the result of a fond and devoted attachment to the present and prospective interests of our beloved Order, and no where, within the territorial limits of the jurisdiction of an Order, does a more unqualified union exist among its members than in Missouri. The warm pressure of the hand, and the kindly kindling of the eye as brother meets brother, proclaims that the fountain of good feeling is no longer a "sealed one," and as the stranger-brother ever and anon, to assuage the pangs of absence from his family circle, loves to linger around the heart's next dearest tie, his mystic home in the love and affection which there is portrayed before him, seems himself almost at home while entwined by the endeared links of Friendship, Love and Truth. With grand and subordinate officers of no common merit, a brotherhood composed of noble and generous-hearted men, our Order is daily gaining favor. The world without, at first suspicious and cold, have looked on, with at best, only a semi-favoring eye. Every act entrusted to its argus-eyes has been closely canvassed in its various bearings—the character of every brother has been probed to the very core, and yet at last, being compelled to judge of the tree by its fruit, the world has been forced to admit that in our upward and onward path, we have given bright and glorious evidences that whenever and wherever the cheering principles of our beloved Order have been promulgated and lived up to, the human heart has yearned with a deeper and holier love to its fellow: and as the mists of prejudice have been gradually, yet surely dispelled from the minds of honest cavilers, by the soul-cheering evidence of alleviated widowhood and orphanage. Our Order has gathered into its fold many who in former years deemed associated christian organization the best medium of alleviating those ever-recurring wants which crowd our pathway, from the cradle to the grave. Our course, like the eagle in his airy flight, is upward, and every tendency of the tenets of our Order, prompts the heart to a firm and undeviating reliance on the Powers divine, "whom giving doth not impoverish, nor withholding make rich." And here, along the margin of the Father of Waters, where the foot of the poor and otherwise friendless stranger, so often rests, Providence has opened a field of benevolence, where the kindlier feelings of our nature, warmed into active benevolence, by the purifying precepts of our widely extended brotherhood, must ever teach man, as they have taught him, that as a component part of one universal whole, as offspring springing from one common source, his highest earthward duty is to protect the innocent, relieve unmerited distress, and minister consolation around the couch of the sick and dying. We would not derogate from the claims of christianity, we revere its author, we bow with solemn admiration and deep devotion at the christian shrine, and recognizing in its broadest extent its mercy-clad mission, we claim only to be its hand-maid in its mission of love, a link in the same chain, weaker and of earthly frame, but yet bright and polished, We could not claim to be less, and pardonless assumption would it be in any mere earth-constituted agency to arrogate more; let us then, blended in sweet and beneficent union, prosecute our journey together, wherever human hearts are to be relieved and human sorrows ameliorated.

"—Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
"But yet a union in partition."

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

WE publish with pleasure the letter and resolutions below, and thank the brothers of Atlantic Lodge for making public their praiseworthy acts. Our Order, at best, makes but poor provision for widows and orphans. Atlantic Lodge has given an excellent example, and we hope it will be followed by every lodge in the country. Odd Fellowship will never be perfect until it makes a generous provision for all the widows and orphans of the Order:

LEWES, Del., Feb. 19th, 1849.

Dear Brother:

By a resolution of Atlantic Lodge, No. 15, of I. O. of O. F., I am instructed to send you a copy of the resolutions passed at our Lodge, towards the raising of a fund, called the "Widow and Orphan's Fund," and to request you to publish the same.

Resolutions passed at Atlantic Lodge, No. 15, towards the raising of a fund, called the "Widow and Orphan's Fund."

Resolved, That each member of Atlantic Lodge, No. 15, of I. O. of O. F. be, and he is hereby required to pay to the proper officers twenty-five cents, during this present and every succeeding term of six months, hereafter, towards the raising and maintaining of a fund, to be called the "Widow and Orphan's Fund," of this Lodge; and that every unappropriated dollar of this fund that may be in the hands of any officer or member of this Lodge, at the end of each succeeding term of six months, shall be loaned out or otherwise invested, and made payable both debt and interest at the end of each term, for which it was loaned, in time for said principle and interest to be reinvested perpetually and continually hereafter; and that all fines and forfeitures of the members of this Lodge, with such gifts and bequests that may be received, shall be added to this fund, and in like manner invested.

Resolved, That this said Widow and Orphan's Fund shall be separate and distinct from all other fund of the Lodge, and be applied or kept for the special benefit of the widows and orphans of the Order, under the direction of this Lodge.

Resolved, That these resolutions be carefully copied and filed: to be regarded as the fundamental rules of our faith, and practice on the subject hereafter.

Yours, in F. L. & T.,

LEMUEL W. WAPLES, Secretary.

GRAND MASTER ANDREWS' REPORT.

WE give below this able and interesting report, which our brethren, we know, will peruse with pleasure. It is concise, well written, and, taken altogether, is an official paper of distinguished merit:

OFFICE OF THE GRAND MASTER,
Grand Lodge of the I. O. O. F.
of the State of New York.

In presenting this, the first semi-annual report made to a body assembled in conformity with the provisions of the revised Constitution, some allusion to the history of that instrument may not be out of place. At the session of February, 1848, a large committee was appointed, with instructions to report at the ensuing May session, such amendments to the Constitution then in force, as the condition of the Order in this jurisdiction seemed to render necessary. At the May session, that committee reported a series of amendments which were adopted; and, on being submitted to the R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States at its last Annual Communication, the Constitution thus amended was, after the usual examination by the proper committee, by whom some alterations were made, approved by that R. W. Body. See Journal of proceedings G. L. U. S. Vol. III, p. 206.

This Constitution, which has now been in force for several months, has by the harmonious working of its provisions, proved that the amendments adopted were both wise and expedient. Embracing all the advantages of the once proposed District Committees, without the cumbersome and expensive machinery with which they were disfigured, the provisions, vesting in Subordinates the power to adjudicate matters of grievance, by calling upon sister Lodges in their immediate vicinity to sit in judgment, have proved eminently satisfactory.

In October last, the means resorted to by certain individuals to destroy the harmony of the Order, seemed to render some prompt and decisive measure necessary. The following proclamation was accordingly issued on the 30th of that month.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD-FELLOWS.

FRIENDSHIP, LOVE AND TRUTH:

WHEREAS, The R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States did, at the Annual Communication held in September last, after carefully, thoroughly and impartially hearing all the testimony offered by both the parties claiming to represent the Grand Lodge of the State of New York, adopt the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That John W. Hale and John J. Davies are the legal Representatives from the Grand Lodge of New York, and William W. Diblee and Joseph D. Stewart are the legal Representatives from the Grand Encampment of New York; and that they be hereby admitted to seats in this Grand Lodge."

"Resolved, That the Grand Bodies by whom the foregoing Representatives are elected or appointed, are hereby recognized as having a legal existence under the authority of the Grand Lodge of the United States."

AND, WHEREAS, By said decision, which is in itself complete and final, embracing all the questions at issue, the Grand Lodge of the State of New York is declared to be in possession of all the powers and privileges exercised or enjoyed by other State Grand Lodges, among which the exclusive jurisdiction over the Lodges within the limits of their respective States is the chief:

AND, WHEREAS, The Grand Lodge of the State of New York has, since said decision, adopted a course, at once kind, conciliatory and forbearing toward suspended Lodges, a number of which have, upon applying, been reinstated under the following form of resolutions:

"Resolved, That ——— Lodge, No. —, be and is hereby reinstated in the Order."

"Resolved, That the proceedings of the brethren of ——— Lodge, No. —, during its suspension, be and the same are hereby confirmed so far as they relate to the initiation of members, the conferring of degrees, and the payment of benefits."

"Resolved, That the officers who were incumbents at the time of the suspension of the Lodge, be and are hereby allowed the honors of the term; and that, on the restoration of the Charter to the Lodge, Officers shall be elected to serve the residue of this current term, with full honors."

AND WHEREAS, Said State Grand Lodge has further expressed sentiments extremely liberal, by the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That applications for reinstatement, by Subordinate Lodges under suspension, will be cheerfully received and favorably considered by this R. W. Grand Body."

"Resolved, That the M. W. Grand Master be requested to call Special Sessions to take into consideration applications from suspended Lodges for reinstatement, whenever, in his opinion, the good of the Order may require."

AND, WHEREAS, In defiance of said decision of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States, and notwithstanding the liberal and conciliatory course of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York, certain evil-disposed persons, residents of this State, have extensively circulated both in and out of this jurisdiction, a pamphlet containing a paper or papers, purporting to be signed by several Odd-Fellows, now or late members of the Grand Lodge of the United States; the tendency of which is to subvert the authority of the Grand Lodge of the United States, and substitute therefor the mandate of a small minority of the members of that Body, in their individual capacity; thereby creating confusion in the Order, throughout the Union; the whole being a direct assault on the peace and dignity of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York, and of the R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States:

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE H. ANDREWS, GRAND MASTER of the I. O. of O. F. of the State of

New York, do issue this PROCLAMATION: admonishing all members of the Independent Order of Odd-Fellows of their duty, implicitly to obey the R. W. Grand Lodge of the United States:—avowing the disposition of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York to treat as brethren all who manifest any inclination to acknowledge the authority of the Supreme tribunal of Odd-Fellowship; and informing the Order at large, that no Visiting or Withdrawal Card, from any Lodge in this jurisdiction, bearing date subsequent to the 5th day of October, 1848, is valid unless countersigned by Benjamin J. Pentz, Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York. Whereof take due notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the R. L. S. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York, this 30th day of October, 1848.

Attest: GEO. H. ANDREWS, G. Master.

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, G. Secretary.

In the frequent opportunities afforded for observation, I have noticed with very great pleasure the truly fraternal feeling with which the members of reinstated Lodges regard their brethren with whom they have differed. The course pursued by this Grand Lodge has done much to promote those cordial feelings. That course has been mild, yet firm—liberal, but legal—conciliatory, still without a compromise of dignity. Revilers have not been reviled again. Detractors have not been abused. In a word, the course has been such as to afford enemies (if such there be,) no satisfaction, and to cause friends—and of such there are many—no mortification; affording evidence to which an Odd-Fellow can ever point with pride, that the gentle influences of fraternal love continue to operate with undiminished purity and vigor. The happy effects resulting from this line of conduct, should commend it to continued favor; and I hope still to see the same praiseworthy moderation exercised.

The Grand Lodge of the U. S. having impressed upon Representatives the necessity of requiring rigid uniformity in the work of the Order; pursuant to notice, the elective officers of eighty-one Lodges met in the Grand Lodge Room on the 4th November, and were duly instructed. I have also visited and instructed in the Districts of Albany, Dutchess, Orange, Kings and Westchester—and in addition the following Subordinate Lodges:

United Brothers No. 52, Mercantile, 47, Covenant 85, Decatur 350, Alleghania 183, Ocean 321, Sincere, 233, Hospitalier 235, New York Degree 1, Stirling 190, Grenada 288, Independence 158, Fitz Ray 326, Templar 235, Mechanics' 113, Beacon 228.

Some excitement has been created among suspended Lodges, by the issuing of a Circular announcing that parties other than the legal authorities of this State, had been so far recognized by the officers of the Grand Lodge of the U. S., as to place them in possession of the A. T. P. W. Certain members of those suspended bodies, however, too honorable to use what they had any reason to suspect had been surreptitiously obtained, applied to the M. W. Grand Sire to ascertain the truth of the allegation. That officer promptly addressed me a letter, in which he declares the assertion contained in said Circular to be entirely groundless.

The finances of the Grand Lodge are rapidly assuming a most gratifying aspect, as by the report of the Finance Committee will more fully appear.

Since the close of the August Session, this jurisdiction has been threatened with a visit from that Scourge of Nations, which, after devastating Europe, gave the alarm at our very portals. But there the merciful hand of Hrm "in whom we live, move and have our being," stayed its progress, and saved us from a trial which, although it must have been a fearful one, would, I trust, have demonstrated our faithfulness to each other.

An influence however, is now at work, which, if permitted to pass unnoticed and unguarded against, may bring about results as deplorable as the fatal visitation of an epidemic. I allude to that insatiable thirst for gold which has allured hundreds of the vigorous and robust members of our Lodges from their peaceful and healthful avocations. These are abandoned. Some undertake a long, debilitating and dangerous voyage. Others hazard a tedious and perilous journey through an inhospitable country, peopled by hostile savages—while still others, risk the pestilential miasma of the lowlands of the Isthmus. All seek as their desired haven, a climate which makes fearful inroads on the constitution; while many expect to pursue a business which, more than almost any other, is detrimental to health. Indeed, a sacrifice of health, for a longer or shorter time, is a part of the price which every man expects to pay for his suddenly acquired wealth. When it is known that in some Lodges so many as eight or ten per cent. of the members have resorted to these death-fraught avenues to wealth, it is enough to arouse the attention of serious and reflecting men.

The late war with Mexico made heavy drafts upon the treasures of some Lodges; but considerations of patriotism forbade that any obstacle should be interposed to that self-sacrificing spirit, which should and does ever animate us in the hour of our Country's need. The migration to the Pacific coast, however, having solely for its object the aggrandizement of the adventurer, cannot be viewed in the same light. The experience of years has enabled Lodges to ascertain very nearly the maximum weekly benefits which can be paid from a minimum amount of dues; and the desire not to tax members unnecessarily, together with the wholesome result of competition, has induced most Lodges to adopt such a scale. But that system may prove inadequate to the demands likely to be made by the class of members now alluded to.

Taking these circumstances into consideration, together with the fact that nearly or quite every emigrant is a member of a company which is in effect a beneficial society, guaranteeing to each other mutual protection and care in the perils and diseases they may encounter together, several Lodges have it in contemplation to reduce their benefits to such members, to correspond in some degree with the augmented risks those members voluntarily incur.

This matter is not alluded to here, in the expectation that the Grand Lodge will legislate thereon, but merely for the purpose of suggesting to Subordinates the risks they are incurring; and of giving a general answer to many inquiries which have been made of me officially on the subject. That Lodges in acting on this matter, will have in view their obligations to the whole of their membership, is not doubted.

In this connection it is perhaps proper to mention, that within a few days the M. W. Grand Sire has, upon a proper application, issued a Charter for California Lodge, to be located at San Francisco.

The duties which, for some months past, have devolved upon the several Grand Officers, have been onerous, and it affords me pleasure to bear testimony to the readiness with which the exacting demands of official business have in all cases been responded to. The R. W. Grand Secretary especially, has been called upon to discharge duties more extensive in amount and more varied in character than were performed by any previous incumbent of that office.

In addition to those appointed at the August session, the following D. D. Grand Masters have been appointed during the recess:

DAVID B. LOOMIS,	District of Rockland.
THEODORE CALDWELL,	" Jefferson.
JOHN S. CROCKER,	" Washington.
LEVI GANO,	" Chemung.
D. P. CRUMPTON,	" Steuben.
JAMES M. WILSON,	" Greene.
F. W. BARROW,	" Putnam.
H. HUBBARD,	" Chenango.
JOHN S. GRAHAM,	" Ontario.
P. L. ELY,	" Niagara.
JAMES A. TIMPSON,	" Westchester.
JOHN T. MCCARTY,	" Dutchess.
R. A. LESLY,	" Otsego.
J. G. BARBER,	" Genesee.
R. O. REYNOLDS,	" Cortland.
E. C. TERRY,	" Columbia.
N. S. ELDERKIN,	" St. Lawrence.
ARCHD. BAMBER,	" Oneida.

The reports from the various District Deputy Grand Masters, bear concurrent testimony to the healthy condition of the Order in their respective Districts. That the Order in this jurisdiction is rapidly emerging from under the cloud which for some months has overshadowed it, is manifest from the fact, that thus early in the session very nearly twenty-five thousand members are reported in the returns already received.

Respectfully submitted, in F. L. & T.

GEO. H. ANDREWS, Grand Master.

YANKEE BLADE IN THE FIELD.—The Odd Fellow says:

"William Matthew, Esq., Editor of the Yankee Blade, of this city, addressed the Odd Fellows of Skowhegan, Me., a few evenings since, at the Methodist chapel. The People's Press says: 'The address was marked by a tone of religious feeling and sentiment too rarely met with in public speakers, at the present day. Bro. Mathews did himself great credit.'"

Good, Bro. Mathews, we would have traveled a hundred miles to have heard that same lecture. The Editor of the Blade is a gentleman of distinguished talent, and no doubt did the subject justice.

YANKEE ENTERPRISE AND ODD-FELLOWSHIP.

—Wherever the Yankees go, they carry their excellent institutions with them. Much as they love money, and much as they will hazard to obtain it, they know how to use it, and instead of appropriating their gains to sensual indulgence, they set about improving the condition of man by stimulating enterprise, extending the area of civilization, and aiming at an elevated standard of intellectual, social and religious refinement. If the Yankees can get money enough, towns and cities spring up, and the wilderness is made to blossom like the rose. Schools are founded, churches erected, religious ordinances established, railroads projected, manufactures and commerce nurtured, and the traces of their untiring enterprise are deeply impressed on the surface of the earth, and recognized in the oft eddying wave of the ocean. "The almighty dollar," of which the Yankee is stigmatized as the worshipper, is only an agency in his hands to lead to very mighty results. Among the many encouraging features of Yankee emigration to California, we are pleased to notice that of an early introduction of the Institution of Odd-Fellowship. Measures have been promptly taken by the Grand Lodge of the United States to send out a suitable commission for its legal establishment, under the jurisdiction of that Right Worthy body. Captain Alexander V. Fraser, of the Revenue Service, has been appointed Deputy Grand Sire for California, Oregon, Sandwich Islands, and ports in the Pacific, and, we presume, is invested with full power to grant charters, institute Lodges, and perform every duty which may be essential in the interval of the formation of a Territory or State Grand Lodge. Success to our noble brothers who are on their way to the San Francisco region. A large number of those adventurers from New England are Odd-Fellows. We hope they will not forget their obligations, to remain such during their absence. Live up to the principles, brothers, and all will be well with you, and yours may be a mission of vast importance to the world.—[Boston Odd-Fellow.

APOSTROPHE TO THE PRESS.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY JAMES W. COFFROTH.

ENGINE of thought! whose vast, mysterious might Controls the subtle universe of mind—
Thy magic influence, like the electric light,
Pervades and quickens all with radiance bright;
The highest talent that has blessed mankind—
Though gifted with an all immortal fire—
Denied the blessings of thy kindly aid,
Would but a moment flicker, and then fade,
Or like a meteor, dubiously expire!
Thou canst incarnate man's divinest thought,
And unto unborn centuries assign—
Sharing immortality with the skies,
And upon man conferring gifts divine!

Ye guardians of the Press! how great your sway
Of good or evil! What an awful trust!
The minds of nations do your power obey,
You fashion them as potters would their clay,
Which porcelain may be, or worthless dust,
As you may will. In virtue's cause
Be all your efforts spent—opposed to lust—
Support your country's dignity and laws—
Avenge the wronged and succor the oppressed,
And blessing others, be yourselves most blessed.
Yours is the voice of freedom! Let it swell,
Till all the kingdoms hear the glad strains
That sweep resistless over hill and dell,—
And from the fettered limbs of serfs the chains
That eat into their souls, shall loose and fall
As the Apostles at the angel's call!

THE "GALLANT COLONEL'S" ADVENTURE.
A N-ICE TALE OF AN ICY TIME.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE
BY CHAS. P. DARE.

A FEW weeks since, on the promenading side of Chesnut street, among the many of the genus homo styled fops, might frequently be seen a tall, rather spare individual, dressed in "the rage," his suit of the most recent cut, and distributed over his person with extreme nicety, and though an occasional gray hair was visible (despite Roussel,) in the drapery on his lip, yept moustache, his lordly bearing and shambling gait, announced (to himself at least,) a youth, the "pink of fashion." If there is any one point of character Col. M. prides himself in being more fully developed than another, it is his attention to the ladies; and though perhaps never recognised in the gaudy trappings of military uniform, at the head of a regiment, he is more generally known in the fashionable circles in which he moves, by the soubriquet of "the gallant Colonel," than by any other designation; and to establish fully his claim to a portion of this flattering title, is our present intention.

During the present winter our pavements, (in common with those of other cities, we presume,) have been occasionally so glibly coated with ice, as to endanger the heads of pedestrians, and during the existence of such a state of affairs, (or pavements, rather,) the Col. sallied forth to take his customary stroll in the vicinity of Chesnut and — streets. There was but little sign of life upon the sidewalks, as their usual occupants preferred the middle of the street, rather than risk their limbs upon the glassy covering which presented its smooth surface upon the former.

The "gallant Colonel" was bitterly opposed to aught that seemed like innovation, and as the pavements were created for the particular benefit of those who walked, he for one was determined to use them. A few steps in advance of him, and of equally aristocratic feelings with regard to street walking, was a lady, whose dress announced her respectability, and who appeared perfectly at home, notwithstanding her portliness, for it is necessary that the reader should know that she had amassed more of the "wealth of flesh" than man is generally heir to. At any other time she would, perhaps, have passed almost unnoticed, but under existing circumstances the Col. felt no little anxiety for her safety. Nor were his fears without foundation, as the object of his solicitude presently slipped and fell, and the Col., with his usual gallantry, flew to the rescue. As we have before said, he was a tall man, and we now add, he was a man of muscle, possessing considerable strength; but it required every effort to raise two hundred weight from the icy pave, with no other purchase than that afforded by clasping so great a bulk beneath the arms; but an old adage has it, "where there is a will, there is a way," and so it appeared likely to prove in the present instance, for the Col., with a vigorous effort, raised his charge to nearly a perpendicular, when, unfortunately, his feet glancing from under him, he fell beneath a mass of living humanity, which threatened to annihilate him. Nor was this the least misfortune in store, for doors were filled with the lords of creation, and windows lined with a bevy of spectators of the fairer sex, (who were acquainted with our hero, and wreaths of smiles, if not of laurel, were showered on him; while a group of boys greeted him with, "Once more"—"Steady, Colonel." Another desperate effort and they were up; but the bitter fates had doomed them to farther disappointment. The lady's feet, disdaining earth, flew airwards, bringing the devoted Colonel again in contact with the ice. A loud guffaw from the outsiders fell upon his astonished ear, while a more melodious titter came echoing faintly from the windows, and dozens of open mouths around re-echoed the merriment. Partially aroused to the ludicrousness of the scene, the "gallant Colonel" braced every nerve, and with a more vigorous struggle the pair secured their footing.

The lady commenced a revolution (for as yet their faces had not met,) to return her thanks, while the Col., (with his body slightly inclined forward, and his hat elevated a few inches from his head,) stood waiting, intending to disavow anything farther than duty. With one glance at her countenance, the thunderstruck Colonel, pulling his hat down over his eyes, exclaimed:

"Black as the ace of spades, by Jupiter!" And turning on his heel, made rapid strides up Chesnut street, amid peal after peal of laughter. He still promenades, but has, since the occurrence, voted Chesnut a nuisance, and exhibits himself, accordingly, in Arch street, where no dread locality can bring to mind his adventure.

AN OBJECTION TO AERIAL NAVIGATION.

THE Hall where Messrs. Porter and Hannegan are exhibiting their invention, is occupied as a place of worship by a congregation of fanatics known as "Second Adventists." They belong to that ignorant class of men who materialize all spiritual ideas, and think of Heaven as a place above the clouds, into which, when one enters, he must of course be happy. One day our friend Hannegan was accosted by one of these disciples of Miller, and charged with being engaged in an impious enterprise. "You are an ungodly man," said the Millerite; "you are serving the devil; you annihilate all distinctions between saints and sinners." Mr. Hannegan was stupefied. He thought he was engaged in a very innocent enterprise, and, although he had heard all sorts of objections to aerial steam navigation, he was not prepared for this objection theological, nor could he comprehend it. "Will you explain yourself?" said he to the Millerite. "You know," resumed the latter, "that at the last day, which is near at hand, all the saints shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and go with Him to Heaven, while the wicked are to be left on the earth to be consumed in the final conflagration. Now, by your infernal machine, the wicked may also go up, defy the thunders of eternal justice, and laugh at hell and damnation!" This new view of the case appalled our friend, and not being an irreligious man, he hastened to consult his minister.

RHINEBECK GAZETTE.—This journal, we perceive, has passed into the hands of our worthy friend and Brother, William Huff, Esq., late of Poughkeepsie, and presents a very neat appearance. The No. before us is full of excellent matter. We are glad to see in its columns an Odd-Fellowship department.

PHRENOLOGICAL MAGAZINE.—This popular journal is still in the ascendant. The Fowlers are the chiefs of the Phrenological School in this country, and their journal is the ablest exposition of the science now published.

THE PHILOZATHRANS.—We see that the ladies throughout the country are becoming quite interested in this new association of benevolence. It is composed entirely of ladies. We are requested to say to those ladies who have applied to Miss Gardiner, P. P. S., for information regarding the Order, that copies of the constitution and by-laws will be forwarded to them directly. Meanwhile we refer them to the advertisement.

DENTISTRY.

We publish the following letter with pleasure. We have ourselves experienced the skill of Dr. Crane:

MY DEAR GAZETTE.—Your columns having lately contained several articles in relation to Dentistry, you will perhaps spare me a short space to mention a portion of my own experience, which may be instructing to some of your readers. Some short time since I was under the disagreeable necessity of having a large back tooth extracted; the operation was performed by a well known and deservedly popular practitioner of this city; and owing to the tooth being locked into the jaw, occupied upwards of fifteen minutes; nor was this all, for more than a week afterwards I suffered the most excruciating agony. You may imagine my feelings, when I, this morning, found it necessary to submit again to a similar operation; and my astonishment when, in less than two seconds, the tooth was placed in my hand—I having suffered no pain whatever—and not even knowing that the extracting instrument had been put into my mouth. The tooth was hooked into the jaw, yet there was no jerking or jarring, nor have I suffered the slightest inconvenience since. The operation was not performed under the influence of ether or mesmerism, but the freedom from pain was owing entirely to the wonderful skill of the operator, Dr. J. W. CRANE, of No. 11 Le Roy Place, and to the excellence of the instruments used him, which are his own inventions, and differ essentially from those in common use.

If any of your readers should have occasion to have a tooth extracted, and will call on Dr. Crane, I am sure they will thank me for writing, and you for inserting this notice; which, I need hardly say to you, who know me so well, is sent to you without the knowledge of Dr. C.; but simply from a sincere wish to be of service to my fellow Gothamites.

Very truly yours,
THOMAS TOBIAS TODD.

"WANTED A GOVERNESS."

The following singular production is now going about in lithograph, in private circles; the writer being, we entirely believe, a respectable man, and quite in earnest in his inquiries:

"Residence Rent Free, for two Ladies, with Engagement of one of them as Governess."

"Wanted, a lady, to undertake, without the help of a maid, the nurture, admonition, and rudimental instruction of two affectionate little girls, aged seven and three years, who are bereaved of maternal care, but are the objects of tender and anxious solicitude. She should be a pious and moral member of the Church of England, good-tempered, benevolent, ingenuous, sincere, true, faithful, sensible, well-educated, industrious, orderly, careful, and economical; of meek, affectionate, and cheerful disposition, gentle and unassuming manners, staid and motherly deportment, mild, open, and intelligent countenance, soft and harmonious enunciation, simple and refined tastes, settled notions, healthy constitution, and possessing general appearance; fond and accustomed to little children, educational employment, and domestic and rural avocations; and disposed from inclination as well as principle, to employ the 'talents' committed to her in acting as a mother towards her unfortunate little charges. Her home would be a cottage and gardens of a single gentleman, near a dull and secluded village, in a north-western English county. Subject to arrangements for the board of the children and the domestic accommodation of the gentleman (who generally dines at a distant town), the house would be available for the use of the lady and an accompanying daughter, niece, mother, aunt or sister, much attached to each other, and certain to afford the children an example of happy and affectionate intercourse. Having regard to conventional propriety, it may be fitting that the lady should be from fifty to fifty-five years old—perhaps to the age of twenty-eight to thirty-eight there would not be a conventionable objection if the lady were accompanied by a mother, or elderly sister, or aunt; but as between that age and the age of the gentleman there is no undue disparity, and it is shown by a recent parliamentary report that even in the case of persons within the prohibited degrees of affinity the charge of children, involving intimate domestic relations between the father and a lady of suitable age, frequently induces mutual attachment, the gentleman, whose income, though considerable, arises mainly from professional exertions, dependent on the continuance of life and health, desires to engage a governess of advanced age, rather than run the risk (if risk there be) of increasing the responsibilities of his position, and prejudicing the prospects of the little girls, by a marriage, resulting perhaps in a large family of children deriving no provision, present or prospective, from their mother. If he cannot meet with an elderly lady of unimpaired health and faculties, and the requisite qualifications, he would engage a gentlewoman of from twenty-eight to thirty-eight years of age, as she, without being more amenable to conventionable remark, or more unsettled in notions than a lady some eight or ten years older, might be more agreeable to him than a lady not old enough to belong to the generation preceding him, and too old, possibly, to be altogether regarded as a contemporary. No lady, between thirty-eight and forty-eight, or under twenty-eight, is invited to apply; and it is hoped that no lady not possessing all the desired qualifications will apply, as the imitative and observant disposition of the children, and other circumstances, render all such qualifications essential. A widow, with an accompanying grand-daughter or daughter, of about eleven years of age, might not be deemed ineligible; and a widow who has had children, or even one who has not, would be preferred to a maiden lady. Letters, stating age, whether single or a widow, number and ages of the children, if any, former and present position in society, whether wholly dependent on own exertions or not; accomplishments, if any; the required domestic accommodation, and for whom; amount of salary expected; and full information in reference to the desired qualifications, or stating such of these particulars as have not been stated in reply to the advertisement, may be addressed to 'Box—, Post-office, Liverpool.'

"No references need be given before an interview mutually satisfactory has taken place, and no interview will, in any case, be requested if the communications of the lady [with regard to appearance, manners, deportment, and other apparent qualifications, are not sufficiently candid and explicit to enable the gentleman to judge whether it is worth his while to take a journey, perhaps long and expensive, for the purpose of seeing the lady. To prevent fruitless trouble to both parties, he may be permitted to say, as to the word 'prepossessing,' which he has used, that though in his opinion, a lady may be of prepossessing appearance without being or having been strictly beautiful, he would consider as detracting characteristics, an over-corpulent or very big, or very diminutive figure, large red hands or ears, immense feet and ankles, bearded chin, long bony face, thin white lips, red or pimpled nose or complexion, bad teeth, small eyes and narrow flat chest."

CHARACTER OF THE AMERICANS.—Among the number of my fellow passengers from New York to Boston, there were neither old nor young, at least there were no venerable grey heads or cheerful boyish faces. In no part of the United States do the people seem to arrive at the average length of life of the Old World. The great and sudden changes of temperature, while, perhaps, they stimulate the energies of those who are exposed to them, wear out the stamina of the body, and exhaust its vitality. The cares of manhood, and the infirmities of second childhood, are equally premature, denying the population the two loveliest but most dependent stages of existence—the idle, but fresh and generous morning of youth—the feeble, but soft and soothing evening of old age. In this country we find even the climate in league with the practical, in its influence on the powers of man, a goad to material prosperity. The child is pushed, with a forcing power, into the duties and pursuits of maturer years; the man, when he ceases to be of active use, is hurried out of the busy scene, his part played. The cumberers of the ground are few—all work, none play. They go more awkwardly about their amusements than any people I have ever seen; theirs is a dark and sombre path through life, though every step were on gold. Sarcastic wit will win from them a sarcastic grin; the happy conclusion of some hard-driven bargain may raise a smile of satisfaction; but the joyful burst of cheerful laughter, the glee and hilarity of a happy heart, you must go elsewhere to seek. They are not a healthy-looking race; the countenance is sallow and marked early in life with lines of thought. The fresh, pure glow of the Saxon cheek is never seen here. The men are tall, but not robust or athletic; they have no idea of the sports of the field, and rarely or ever join in any more active game than bowls or billiards. They do not walk if they can ride; ride if they can drive; or drive if they can go by railway. Mind and body, day and night, youth and age, are given up for the one pursuit of gain. But this inordinate appetite for acquiring is, in their character, deprived of some of its most odious features; it is rarely accompanied by parsimony or want of charity. I believe no people on earth can be more hospitable to their equals in worldly wealth, or more open-handed to the poor. Their establishments for the relief of the distressed, are most unrivaled in liberality and excellence of arrangement; and many among them are as lavish in their expenditure as energetic in possessing themselves of the means to supply it.—[Hochelega.

A NORFOLK FARMER'S TALE.—The Norfolk News has been favored by a "respectable correspondent" with the following story: Among the many visitors to the late cattle show in London was a Norfolk farmer, who, on his return home by train, entered into conversation with a fellow-traveler, and gave him the following account of what had befallen him, and of the unexpected company into which he had been most extraordinarily introduced.

"After," said he, "I had been to the show, and carefully examined the different animals, and given my meed of praise to their breeders and their feeders, I thought I would devote a spare hour to another exhibition in the same neighborhood, Madame Tussaud's celebrated Wax Work. Accordingly I presented myself at the door, and paid my money. On entering I was surprised to find myself the only spectator. Undisturbed for some time, I wandered about, looking with astonishment at the waxen effigies, habited in their gorgeous apparel. In a few minutes some ladies and children arrived; and standing near to one of the former, I observed, 'What ugly, grim-looking people some of those kings and queens are.' The lady smiled, and answered, 'I perfectly agree with you; they are.' My attention was soon arrested by hearing one of the party, pointing to a figure, mention Lord Nelson; when, proud of having been born in the same county with the illustrious sailor, I could not help exclaiming, 'Ah! he was from my neighborhood' upon which one of the ladies, advancing, said to me, 'Then you are from Norfolk; pray, can you tell me anything about poor Mrs. Jermy, in whose melancholy fate I so deeply sympathize? Have you any information different from that which has appeared in the public papers?' To which I replied, 'No, madam, for I have been some days from home.' Scarcely had this conversation ended, when Madame Tussaud entered, and seeing me there, asked me how I got in, and if I did not know she had forbidden the entrance of any one. I replied, 'I did not; but having paid my money, had walked in as a matter of course.' Judge of my surprise, when she informed me I had the honor of speaking to none other than our good and gracious queen, and that the lady whose tender anxiety had been so warmly expressed for the injured widow of Stanfield Hall, was the same illustrious person, whose exalted rank does not, however, so elevate her, but that the misfortunes and afflictions of others can reach her heart and excite her generous commiseration. The party who accompanied her majesty were the royal children and their attendants."

LAW OF MARRIAGE.—The Bishop of Exeter has given the following opinion on this matter, in a reply to a memorial addressed to him, by several of his clergy: "The judgment of the Church Catholic, in all ages, and of our own Church, in the 99th canon, has pronounced those marriages which it is now sought to legalize, to be prohibited by the law of God, to be incestuous and unlawful." He rejoices to think that it is also "the declared fundamental, constitutional law of England." His lordship further observes: "While, however, we assert this great principle, we shall always be ready to acknowledge the full right of the temporal Legislature, to release those subjects of her majesty who are not members of the Church, from all obedience to its decision. For such parties the State has already provided a mode of contracting marriages, without any of the sanctions of the Church. If it shall further be thought proper to release them from any or all of the existing restraints of affinity and consanguinity, Churchmen, as such, will have no right to consider themselves at all aggrieved."

THE BEGGING "PROFESSION."—At a recent meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, the Rev. Mr. Branch said, that a short time since he visited a room in Westminster, where he saw a woman with a dying child in her arms. Commiserating the wretched creature's condition, he inquired into her history and her means of livelihood; and in answer to his questions, she replied:

"Oh, sir, my sufferings are great, and so are those of my child; but when my child is gone I know not what to do!"

"But," observed Mr. Branch, "it will be a happy release for you and your child, as you can make no exertions while you are burdened with her!"

"Oh dear, sir," ejaculated the mother, "when she is gone, I'll have to pay ninepence a day for another child, while she costs me nothing. Unless I do so I'll earn nothing by begging, for it is the children that excite compassion!"

In another room in the house, Mr. Branch found forty beggars, vagabonds, and rogues, male and female, young, old, lame, and blind, gathered round a fire, all relating their exploits, and planning their next attacks upon the public. In a regular ware-room in Westminster he saw exhibited for hire and sale every variety of dresses, including widow's weeds and tattered rags, shabby-genteel costumes, clerical suits, &c., adapted to the different plans of mendicant operations, pursued by the several parties who patronised this extraordinary bazaar, and who made begging a "profession."—[Standard.

A CURIOUS COMPARISON.—Matrimony is like rum-punch. Man is the rum, sharp and violent; woman, the sugar, sweet and dissolving; love, the boiling water, which grows in time quite cold. The wedding day is, therefore a most important epoch in human life for both parties. With closed eyes they choose a brewed bumper, filled with happiness or misery, and must drink it to the bottom. Man, standing at the altar, gives up a great deal of his liberty and privileges, and the woman gains them; and such restriction of the rights of the former expands that of the latter. The destiny of all mankind is to be wedded—happy are those who wed in proper season and time.—[Heaven upon Earth, by a Polish Exile.

It was one of the laws of Lycurgus, that no portions should be given with young women in marriage. When this great law-giver was called upon to justify this enactment, he observed, "That in the choice of a wife merit only should be considered; and that the law was made to prevent young women being chosen for their riches or neglected for their poverty."

Extracts from New Works.

HURRY AND HASTE.—'Never do anything in a hurry,' is the advice given to attorneys and solicitors by Mr Warren. 'No one in a hurry can possibly have his wits about him; and remember, that in the law there is ever an apponent watching to find you off your guard. You may occasionally be in haste, but you need never be in a hurry; take care—resolve—never to be so. Remember always that others' interests are occupying your attention, and suffer by your inadvertence,—by that negligence which generally occasions hurry. A man of first rate business talents—one who always looks so calm and tranquil, that it makes one's self feel cool on a hot summer's day to look at him—once told me that he had never been in a hurry but once, and that was for an entire fortnight, at the commencement of his career. It nearly killed him: he spoiled everything he touched; he was always breathless, and harassed, and miserable; but it did him good for life: he resolved never again to be in a hurry—and never was, no, not once, that he could remember, during twenty-five years' practice! Observe, I speak of being hurried and flustered—not of being in haste, for that is often inevitable; but then is always seen the superiority and inferiority of different men. You may indeed almost define hurry as the condition to which an inferior man is reduced by haste. I one day observed, in a committee of the House of Commons, sitting on a railway bill, the chief secretary of the company, during several hours, while great interests were in jeopardy, preserve a truly admirable coolness, tranquillity, and temper, conferring on him immense advantages. His suggestions to counsel where masterly, and exquisitely well-timed; and by the close of the day he had triumphed. "How is it that one never sees you in a hurry?" said I, as we were pacing the long corridor, on our way from the committee-room. "Because it's so expensive," he replied with a significant smile. I shall never forget that observation, and don't you."—[Warren on Attorneys and Solicitors.]

GOETHE AND CATALANI.—Almost entirely void of education, and, strange to relate, even in her own art, Catalani compensated for its want by the display of perhaps one of the most lovely voices with which Nature ever gifted any one. Her want of literary attainments, and her consequent ignorance of all that occurred in the republique des belles lettres, allied to her vivacity in conversation and well-known proneness to join in, at once produced a scene which I think I may venture to call serio-comic. When invited to the Count of Weimar, she was, at a dinner party, placed by the side of Goethe as a mark of honor paid on the part of her royal entertainer. Catalani knew nothing of the great poet philosopher, nor had, it is more than probable, ever heard his name; but, as she could not fail to be struck by his noble countenance and majestic appearance, independently of the respectful attention which was paid to him, she inquired of the gentleman who sat at her other side who he was. "The famous Goethe, madame," was the reply. "Pray, sir, on what instrument does he perform?" she next asked. "He is no musician, madame; he is the author of 'Werter.'" "Oh! yes, I remember now," returned Catalani, bowing her thanks, at the same time turning to the venerable poet and addressing him, "Oh, monsieur! what an admirer I am of 'Werter!'" A low bow expressed the acknowledgment of so flattering a compliment. "I never," continued Catalani, quite innocently, "I never read any thing half so laughable in all my life! What an admirable farce it is, monsieur!" "Madame!" exclaimed the thunderstruck poet, looking aghast, "the 'Sorrows of Werter' a farce?" "Oh, yes! ha! ha! ha! never was any thing so exquisitely ridiculous," added Catalani, laughing immoderately, as she enjoyed the mere remembrance. It subsequently appeared that she had been conversing the whole time about Werter, which had been performed at one of the minor theatres of Paris, and in which all the ultra-sentimentality (so opposite to French national character) of Goethe's work had been unmercifully turned into ridicule. But her illustrious neighbor did not get over his mortification and chagrin the whole evening, and the fair singer's reputation at the court of Weimar was terribly impaired by this unfortunate display of her ignorance of the "Sorrows of Werter!"—[Memoranda of a Musician.]

A SHIP AMONG ICEBERGS.—It is impossible to convey a correct idea of the beauty, the magnificence of some of the scenes through which we passed. Thousands of the most grotesque, fanciful, and beautiful icebergs and icefields surrounded us on all sides, intersected by numerous serpentine canals, which glittered in the sun (for the weather was fine all the time we were in the straits) like threads of silver twining round ruined palaces of crystal. The masses assumed every variety of form and size, and many of them bore such a resemblance to cathedrals, churches, columns, and spires, that I could almost fancy we had been transported to one of the floating cities of Fairyland. The rapid motion, too, of our ship, in what appeared to be a dead calm, added much to the magical effect of the scene. A light but steady breeze urged her along with considerable velocity, through a maze of ponds and canals, which, from the immense quantity of ice that surrounded them, were calm and unruffled as the surface of a mill-pond. Not a sound disturbed the delightful stillness of nature, save the gentle rippling of the vessel's bow as she sped on her way, or the occasional puffing of a lazy whale, awakened from a nap by our unceremonious intrusion on his domains. Now and then, however, my reveries were disagreeably interrupted by the ship coming into sudden contact with huge lumps of ice. This happened occasionally when we arrived at the termination of one of those natural canals through which we passed, and found it necessary to force our way into the next. These concussions were sometimes very severe, and even made the ship's bell ring; but we heeded this little, as the vessel was provided with huge blocks of timber on her bows, called ice pieces, and was besides built expressly for sailing in the northern seas. It only became annoying at meal times, when a spoonful of soup would sometimes make a little private excursion of its own, over the shoulder of the owner instead of into his mouth. As we proceeded, the ice became more closely packed, and at last compelled us to bore through it. The ship, however, was never altogether detained, though much retarded. I recollect, while thus surrounded, filling a bucket with water from a pool on the ice, to see whether it was fresh or not, as I had been rather skeptical upon this point. It was excellent, and might almost compete with the water from the famous spring of Crawley. —[Ballantyne's Hudson's Bay.]

OLD PSALM TUNES.—To forward the favorable reception of such tunes, two facts as to their original intention must be practically borne in mind. They were sung faster than we usually sing them, and, what is better, by a far greater number of voices. It is a great mistake to suppose that old tunes should be sung in a heavy drawing style. Our forefathers in the church were cheerful Christians. A psalm of a dozen verses was but short to them. Hence, as well as from other circumstances, it is clear that they sang in a quicker and livelier manner than is commonly conjectured. The Old Hundredth tune is made a dirge in our days, but in theirs it was a joyous and animating canticle. "All people that on earth do dwell, sing to the Lord with cheerful voice!" In like manner, York tune, which is shelved among the dull and obsolete, was little more than a century ago the liveliest and most popular tune of the entire kingdom. But to hear old tunes to advantage, they must be sung in old style. Not only must they be sung with decent gravity and sanctity, but by masses of people, by a multitude of voices, "by all the people together, as the original directions state. Six thousand voices were wont to be heard at St. Paul's Cross; three or four thousand singing at a time in a church in this city is but a trifle," said the excellent Roger Ascham, in a letter from Augsburg, dated the 14th of May, 1551.—[Hackett's National Psalmist.]

Lays of Many Lands.

THE WIDOWED YEW.

From the Norwegian of Erik Barolf.

- I.
Nigh the churchyard of Neild
Abode Wilberic Troll,
The lonest lone soul!
His own hands had buried his wife and only child.
- II.
Oft under the stars
Would he rest by their graves,
And up from their caves
His thoughts would arise and pierce him like cimeters!
- III.
"Time I, too, were dead!"
He would sigh to the Night.
"Dim grows mine eyes light;
The snows of seventy Winters lie on my head!"
- IV.
In the churchyard grwe
A sad, strange tree.
Death-sable to see!
The villagers called it always The Widowed Yew!
- V.
It mourned atween
The infant and spouse;
And under its boughs
Old Wilberic hoped to repose from this weary scene.
- VI.
Ten long, long years
He lingered still,
Awaiting God's will
With nightly vigils, and prayers, and pious tears.
- VII.
When hark! one morn,
In the dawn so hoar,
A voice at his door!
"Up, up, old man, who liest there so forlorn!"
- VIII.
"Up! Thou, ere the sun
Be born of the wave,
Shalt delve me a grave
For an old, old man, a lone, oh! so lone a one!"—
- IX.
—"And where shall it be?
Where wouldst thou it, friend?"
—"Where the black boughs bend
Of the Widowed Yew, in the shade of that woful tree!"
- X.
Old Wilberic Troll
Arises with tears,
And, arisen, hears
Through the stilly air of the dawn the death-bell knoll.
- XI.
With a light and a spade
He hies to the ground,
Soon to show a new mound
For, alas! a stranger, under the Widowed Yew's shade.
- XII.
"O, woe!" doth he sigh,
"That my bones may not rest
In the spot I love best,
Atween the graves where my Minna and Dietrie lie!"
- XIII.
And he delves and he delves,
And his task is done
Ere the round red sun
Has chased from their fairy-rings Titian's elves.
- XIV.
But the stranger? Is gone.
Gone whither? None know!
He returneth no mo,
But Wilberic's heart feels faint, and his lips wax wan.
- XV.
And the Widowed Yew,
Ere three days had rolled,
O'ershadowed his mold!
This tale the villagers tell; and their tale is true.

LEAVES that strew the wintry chase,
Still the seeds ye mourn and nourish;
And in their succeeding race
Ye anew will greenly flourish.

Scientific and Useful.

A PARACHUTE FOR COAL-PITS.—To descend into mines and coal-pits, and to ascend by means of vertical ladders, are operations so fatiguing, that the pitmen prefer, in spite of the regulations which forbid it, to expose their lives to the risk of the strength of a rope, which unfortunately, often breaks, and precipitates them to the bottom. We attended, last Wednesday, an experiment on a large scale, which demonstrated, in the most efficient manner, that henceforth this danger no longer exists for pitmen. By means of an extremely simple apparatus, the cuff remains suspended in the middle of the shaft when the rope breaks. This trial was not made by means of a working model, but in a pit of some depth; the apparatus was worked by men who remained suspended in the well when the rope broke short off. For the future, the parachute for coal pits is no longer a theory; its efficacy is now established by practical facts. The effect of this apparatus was shown before a numerous company, comprised of men of information, the greater part familiar with the working of mines. Their satisfaction was so great, that they spontaneously offered to the inventor to make affidavit on the spot of the facts to which they had been witness. Among the party was a gentleman who wished the experiment tried upon himself; the rope having snapped, he and the workman accompanying him were spontaneously stayed without feeling the slightest shock. We shall not fail to acquaint our readers of the new applications which will be made of this invention, doubly interesting, whether looked upon in a humane point of view, or as a matter of economy in the working of mines.—[Brussels Herald.]

GAS FROM WATER.—This new discovery, which is being adopted very generally in some of the Lancashire towns, is exciting much attention in this neighborhood; and as many of our readers may not be enabled to view the apparatus at the Basford Iron Works, we give a short description of it. That now supplying Mr. Wakefield's works only occupies about five feet square, without the gasometer, but including the fire, and consists of two retorts, one occupied by charcoal and a hollow piece of perforated iron, and the other by a mass of chains. Two pipes and a small iron box act as purifiers. For lace-gassing, &c., water, and water only, need be used; but where a brilliant light is required, as for factories, &c., a small quantity of oily matter (which Mr. Wakefield finds superior to rosin or tar) is added, and the result is, a gas more brilliant than that obtained from coal, and perfectly free from smell or dirt. The apparatus we have alluded to, will produce 1000 feet in ten hours, at an expense of less than 2s., and would cost from 40l. to 50l.; but one calculated for a private family would be put up for 10l., including the license.—[Nottinghamshire Guardian.]

ANCIENT MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—The Egyptian flute was only a cow's horn, with three or four holes in it; and their harp or lyre had only three strings. The Jewish trumpets, that made the walls of Jericho fall down, were only ram's horns; the psaltery was a small triangular harp or lyre, with wire strings, and struck with an iron needle or stick; their sacbut resembled the zagg used at Malta, in the present day, a species of bagpipe; the timbrel was a tambourine, and the dulcimer a horizontal harp, with wire strings, and struck with a stick like the psaltery—such as are seen about the streets of London, in the present day. Imagine the discord produced by 200,000 of such instruments, while playing at the dedication of Solomon's temple.

ECONOMICAL HAIR-WASH.—Take one ounce of borax, half an ounce of camphor; powder these ingredients fine, and dissolve them in one quart of boiling water; when cool, the solution will be ready for use; damp the hair frequently. This wash not only effectually cleanses and beautifies, but strengthens the hair, preserves the color, and prevents early baldness. This, we conceive, cannot be too generally made known.

The pontoon used by Sir Harry Smith in crossing the Orange river, was of American invention, consisting of six cylindrical India rubber tubes, about five feet in circumference, and twenty feet in length. They were inflated on the same principle as life-preservers. From thirty-six to forty men were taken across on this pontoon at each trip, without accident.

According to Professor Adelung, there are 3664 known languages and dialects in the world, of which 987 are Asiatic, 587 European, 276 African, and 1824 American.

SPAR.—In England ornamental masonry appears to have been carried on longest in Derbyshire, which country is singularly rich in mineral productions. The objects originally made of spars were urns, vases, columns, and obelisks; but generally they were solid lumps of stone, and from their great weight most inconvenient to move about. But later works, besides being copies of the most approved forms of the antique, are manufactured very thin and light, so that a taper placed within displays the most extraordinary and richest colors in the mineral world. Apart from its splendid veins and hues, this substance is valuable from its being peculiar to this country. A prodigal waste of this stone was once carried on when abundance could be obtained from the mine; but now it is extremely scarce and expensive, the price having risen from 40l. to 60l. per ton, and even larger sums have been given for very fine specimens.—[Builder.]

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S

COMPOUND EXTRACT OF

SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!!

This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, pleasanter, and warranted superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the grand secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

SPRING AND SUMMER MEDICINES

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any

Invigorating Cordial,

as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.

Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrh, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Hectic Flush, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c., have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.

New-York, April 25, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant, WM. RUSSELL, 65 Gatherine st.

Dyspepsia.

No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst form, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been.

Yours, &c. W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.

It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Despondency, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hemorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.

This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.

Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores; have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation. Yours, respectfully, ISAAC W. ORAIN, 106 Wooster st.

Opinions of Physicians.

Dr. S. P. Townsend is almost daily receiving orders from Physicians in different parts of the Union.

This is to certify, that we, the undersigned, Physicians of the city of Albany, have, in numerous cases, prescribed Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla, and believe it to be one of the most valuable preparations in the market.

THE WIFE'S LAMENT.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY HESTER S. DE GROVE.

He has gone to repose and I may not awake him,
Lost to the earth is the bravest and best;
No longer his voice is heard among mortals,
But deep are its echoes in love's widowed breast.

Henry, my loved one, awake from thy sleeping,
The night-wind blows chill o'er our blighted hearth-stone;

Awake! for the bride of thy bosom is weeping,
The time is adrear, and my spirit is lone.

Cold are the lips that e'er met with love's greeting,
The arms that oft pressed to a bosom of truth,
And still is the heart whose once passionate beating
Woke passion in mine, in our earlier youth.

Why wears now the sun-light a mantle of sadness?
Why pales the fair moon in the dark arch of night?

Why changed to sad moans are earth's voices of gladness?
My life-star has set, death extinguished its light.

List to the tempest, love! wildly 'tis wailing;
So sighs my sad heart to be with thee in rest;
Thy Anna's lone grief has a fountain unfailling—
Are its moans ever heard in the land of the blest?

No longer around me is gentle love beaming,
Still turns my sad heart to its earliest shrine,
Where bright burns thy image, o'er memory gleaming,

My guide thro' this world, 'till my life I resign.
DEC. 9, 1848.

MONODY UPON THE DEATH OF A BROTHER.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY A. WIGHT.

GONE from our hearts is a dearly prized treasure,
And low'ring and dark is the star of our fates,
For the love that we bore thee was full beyond measure,

And deep is the void which thy absence creates.
As the mariner's bark 'mid wild dangers is driven,
When storm-clouds obscure the beacon afar,
So thy loveful radiance, glowing only for Heaven,
Leaves us here to roam without compass or star.

Yet, while thou wert with us, the depth of pure feeling

Within thy fond breast I hardly then knew,—
But now my cleft heart all its grief is revealing,
And shows that each throb and pulsation beat true.

Before me now fondly comes each cherish'd token,
Tho' feelings of sadness these thoughts do beget,
When I know that the cistern for aye now is broken,
And the tide of the fountain for ever hath set.

Tears, deep and regretful, o'erwhelm me with blindness,

When I think of thy goodness and love unto me;
And feel that perchance thy feelings of kindness
Were not met in the spirit they deserved most to be.

But tears and regrets now nought me availeth,
For far thou'rt removed from neglect and from pain;

Yet this lesson my spirit now timely inhaleteth,
To love those the better that still do remain.

CONSTANCE LEE.

A SKETCH OF THE REVOLUTION.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE, BY HENRY MAY.

It was the eve before the battle of ———; the sun had just sank behind a long range of blue hills, in the distance, yet leaving bright gleams on their summits, which brightened up the horizon with a warm, rich glow. A long, low, irregular farm-house, of goodly dimensions and quaint architecture, was bathed in a flood of mellow radiance; while the out-houses and appurtenances were now dim and undiscernible in the approaching twilight.

The farm-house was the domicile of good Stephen Lee, as firm and staunch a patriot as ever breathed in America, and the possessor of many a broad and fertile acre, which stretched away on either hand. Three children had blessed the union of Stephen Lee with the fair daughter of his neighbor—Anne Carleton. Two as sturdy sons, with bold, yet kindly hearts, as could cheer the old age of the parents; and a fair, fragile creature, just entering womanhood—Constance. Well might the old man, and the wife of his bosom, dote on the sweet daughter given them, and the noble brothers regard with undying affection the fair girl whom they held so dear; for the young girl returned their love with a sincerity and ardor which well became the "lamb of the flock." Constance was young—but sixteen—fair and beautiful as the pure, unstained lily, and with an innocent expression in the finely traced features. There was a touching air of quiet hope and enduring, trusting affection in those exquisite eyes of violet blue, and an expression of utter love in the delicate lineaments of the countenance.

But now the trying war of the Revolution had broken out, and sore and troublous times waxed hard on the country. Rumors of bloodshed, of cruel rapine, and open depredations on the part of the invaders, often reached the ears of the hitherto quiet family. But the high souls of the young men could not ill brook this bearing of the enemy; and were indignant at the wrongs of their sister colonies; and ere the spring came they had received the blessings of their parent, taken arms in the defense of their country, and followed a brave commander to the Northern States.

It is useless to recount the succession of skirmishes and open battles which ensued; suffice it to say that ere many months had flown, the whole body of both armies had advanced southward, and were now on the eve of the eventful battle of ———.

Slowly faded the daylight, and the pale moon had just cast a few silver beams over the earth, as fair Constance Lee wandered forth from her father's home, towards a grove which skirted the home-field. The heart of Constance was overflowing with happiness, for William and James Lee were again beneath the paternal roof; and in their joyous bursts of glee the young girl forgot all her fears of the morrow. The eyes were liquid and soft in their heavenly expression, and the mouth was fixed in a sweet smile, as she took her way, almost mechanically, toward the grove. Unconsciously, as it seemed, she approached an old oak tree, on the borders of the wood, and threw her graceful form into a rude seat which had been constructed beneath it.

The sweet girl had been seated here but a few moments, ere the sound of a quick step approaching, aroused her from a deep revery into which she had fallen. She started—a faint blush mantled her cheek—and she assumed an irresolute attitude, as if wishing to fly, yet fearing to.

"Constance! my own Constance!" said a rich, manly voice by her side, and the next moment she was locked in the embrace of a young man, dressed in the British uniform. Yet, notwithstanding this, his face bore ample testimony to a noble soul and an honorable spirit; for it was manly, open, and prepossessing.

"Hubert! Hubert!" murmured Constance, faintly, half struggling to free herself from his arms, "did you not say you would leave me alone—that you would spare me the pain of again parting with you?"

"True, dearest, I did!" replied the young man, somewhat bitterly; "but why did you seek the old trysting-place, if you did not wish to see me?"

A deep blush sprang to the features of the young girl, as her lover uttered these reproachful words; and she turned away, saying, in a faint voice:

"You will forgive me, Hubert, it was so natural. Yet it befits not well," she added, in a firmer tone, "the daughter of a true American patriot to hold such converse with an open enemy!"

"Constance Lee! is it you that say this? Then you do not love me!" and the young officer turned away with an expression of despair on his handsome face.

"Love you, Hubert Delmaine?" shrieked poor Constance, wildly. "Oh! God! if you knew but half the strength of my passion—but a moiety of my wild affection, you would not ask! Why is it that I, a true American girl, wishing and attempting destruction on our direct enemies, should have met you here, time after time, you a bitter, implacable foe to my beloved country; and vowed those vows which only love can prompt? Answer me, Hubert!" moaned the poor girl, in touching accents. "For what have I braved the fury of my father, the anger of my brothers, and the mild, yet fearful chidings of my mother, were it not for love to you?" and Constance lifted her sad, pale face to that of the young Briton.

The heart of young Delmaine was touched, yet his emotion choked his utterance.

"You do not answer me," continued Constance. "I may well ask if you love me? When you sought and obtained shelter under my father's roof, and stole my heart from me, had you no qualm of conscience, no thought for the many bitter moments which would ensue?"

"Forgive me, Constance! forgive me!" at length gasped forth the young man. And then changing his tone to one of playful badinage, he added: "but I do love you with all the strength of which my heart is capable, and ere long I trust to call you my pretty, charming wife!" and he threw his arms around her, fondly.

Constance shook her head mournfully.

"You are a foe to America—it can never be!" she said, at last.

"But suppose that I should turn rebel, and take up arms on the American side?" persisted Delmaine.

The fair girl's face brightened perceptibly.

"Say that you will, Hubert, and I will be what you wish—your own devoted wife!" she murmured.

"I will! I will! were it only for your sake, my dear Constance; but I feel that your countrymen are in the right; and were it not for my proud father and haughty brothers in old England, I should long ago have sided with them, even against my own kinsmen. After the morrow's encounter I shall be an American in heart, if not in blood; and then, Constance—and then—" and he finished the sentence by imprinting a warm kiss on the flushed cheek of his companion.

Constance placed her snowy hand confidently in that of her noble companion, and a deep, blissful silence ensued. At length it was broke by Hubert, who said in low tones:

"The moon is waxing high in the heavens, and the night wind sweeps chillingly by; I must go, Constance!"

The young girl clung to his arm, as if to detain him, and then relaxed her hold, half ashamed of her movements:

"Go then, Hubert; and if you must take part in the morrow's strife, oh! think of your Constance—think that she prays for your safety—fervently, unceasingly."

"Bless you, Constance! those words are cheering, indeed!" and Hubert Delmaine bent over the bright face, now pale, sad, and tearful in its impression, and snatched a hurried kiss from the blanched lips. "Adieu, Constance! Oh! God! this is agony!" and he turned away irresolutely.

Another moment, and he was gone.

Long before "the orient morn" had appeared poor Constance had arisen from her sleepless couch, thrown open the sash, and seated herself with a sinking heart, to gaze intently in the direction that the two armies were drawn up in hostile array. It was perhaps a mile from the home of Stephen Lee that the engagement was expected to take place; yet the fields were level and the air delightfully clear, and each movement of the armies could be witnessed distinctly. There sat poor Constance, pale, and haggard, hoping everything, fearing everything—a father's life and property, the welfare of two brothers, and the country's liberty were at stake, on one side; and on the other, the life, honor, everything of her lover. Was it strange that her heart was filled with contending emotions?

At length, a single gun from the encampment, aroused her from her meditations. She looked out. Morning had come, and William and James, with their aged parent, were departing for the scene of battle. Constance extended her hands wildly, and called upon her father to return. It was of no avail; and heart-stricken, she sank back into her former position, to weep and pray. Another gun boomed upon her ear like a thunderbolt—another—another—and then a rapid volley followed. She looked forth fearfully into the "field of blood." The two armies were enveloped in a blue smoke, which hung in voluminous folds around them; yet, though she could see nought, the constant, unceasing roar of the artillery, the wild neighing of the affrighted chargers, the noisy din of battle; and the loud commands of the undaunted officers, met her ears, and betokened the bloody affray which was going on. Thus the day wore away, the combat still raged in unmitigated fierceness, and neither army had conquered. "Onward rolled the tide of battle," leaving behind their vast surges, scores of the dead and dying, mangled corpses and bleeding bodies, until, at last, the British retreated in shame and confusion—they were defeated by the rebel continentals!

Stephen Lee and his two brave sons had escaped the fate of many of their companions; they returned again to their home, unharmed by the ministers of death who had pressed sore around them, and thankful for the vanquishing of their enemies. There was the sound of subdued rejoicing, mingled with low tones of prayer, in the humble dwelling of Stephen Lee; yet there was one sad, mournful face among them, which often glanced from the low window with an expression of fearful anxiety upon it; or buried itself convulsively in the lily white hands raised to it. Poor Constance! her quiet sadness was unaccountable to the other members of the family, and they attempted to soothe her; but it was impossible, for there was a chill foreboding, an undefined, nameless fear, weighing down her heart, and she moved about, pallid and listless.

"Ho! good Stephen Lee! throw open thy doors to admit us, for we bear a heavy burden!" cried a sturdy neighbor, without, just as the sun was sinking in the west.

"Right willingly," answered the good man, coming to the door; "but what bear you in your arms? A British officer, as I live!" ejaculated the old man, partially lifting the cloak which covered the corpse. "But bear him in—though he was an enemy, he is so no longer!"

They bore the dead officer reverently into the best room of Stephen Lee's house, and laid him quietly on the plain table.

"We found him on the field," said one, in a low, scarce audible voice; "and deemed it a pity that one so young and comely should be food for wolves; and therefore brought him hither, our own houses being filled with the wounded British!"

"You did well," replied benevolent Stephen Lee, "for it seems not well that one nurtured in luxury and refinement, should meet with such a fate!"

Meanwhile, Constance Lee had followed them, with a vague and dreamy dread, into the apartment. There was a touching air of ineffable sadness in the face of the young girl, as she moved noiselessly around, executing those little affairs so befitting a woman in the solemn scenes of death; yet she involuntarily shrank from the corpse of the young Englishman, spread forth in the chilling attitude of the grave.

The military cloak of the young soldier was lifted reverently and slowly from the fair, pale face by Stephen Lee, and he brushed back softly the disheveled masses of hair from the broad, white brow.

"Constance, Constance," he whispered, in a voice, husky with emotion, "bring me a basin of water to bathe his bloody face!"

Constance sprang to do his bidding, but as her foot touched the threshold, and her eye rested on the face of the dead, she shrieked wildly, and fell prostrate on the body of the officer:

"Oh! Hubert! Hubert! is it thus we meet again?" moaned the poor girl, lifting her fair head for a moment. "Oh, God! this is more than I can bear!" and she sank forward on the face of the corpse, senseless.

They lifted her gently from the body of Hubert Delmaine; yet long, very long did she remain in that mournful state, hovering between life and death—at length, however, they restored her momentarily to consciousness—but the shattered intellect did not again resume its throne. There were prayers and supplications in the home of Stephen Lee that night; but they were of no avail; for ere the morning came, as Mrs. Lee hung almost distracted over her darling daughter, there was a low sigh, a faint struggle, and the brief life of Constance Lee was over!

PAUL AND THE HOSPODAR.

From the Servian of Iwan Tieslik.

I.

"HARK, Jeliska! hearest thou not a knock?
Go, good maiden, go and open the gate,
Though the moon shines bright the hour is late.
And the stormy wind, how loud it blows,
Blows as though 'twould shake the ocean rock!
Go! Some wandering pilgrim, well I guess,
Claims from us what every Christian owes Unto every Christian in distress!"

II.

So spake Bathski-Dor, the Hospodár,
And while yet the words were on his tongue,
One of a swart and bearded countenance,
Like a soldier-traveler from afar,
Stood before him. Stout he seemed and young,
And with fire and lightning in his glance.
Word he spake not till the Hospodár
Pointed toward the bench beside the hearth,
Saying, "Cousin, these are days of dearth;
Little cheer, save bread and fruit and oil,
All we have saved from Autumn's golden spoil,
Can we tempt thee with—but these are thine.
Seat thee on the bench beside the hearth.
Would that we could give thee meats and wine?"

III.

"Thy false hospitality I share not!
For thy bread and fruits and oil I care not!
By thy smooth words will I not be entreated!
By thy hearth-flag will I not be seated!"
Bathski-Dor! I am here to slay and spare not!
Bathski-Dor! I had a cherished brother.
Him thy saber wounded unto death.
In my arms he breathed his dying breath.
Oft have I tried, and tried in vain to smother
The fierce wrath I felt against his slayer—
Felt and feel—it haunts me even in prayer.
Bathski-Dor! We twain must measure swords—
Nay, man, sleep not! Mine are no child's words!"

IV.

Bathski-Dor upraised his hanging head,
Opened his shut eyes, and calmly said—
"Kinsman Paul! thou hadst a cherished brother,
And my saber wounded him to death—
Knowest thou not that I, too, had another,
Whom thy father slew at Vlokonnov,
On the hill he sleeps this night beneath?
Well! what therefore? Both men fairly fell,
Both men fell, my brother and thine own;
Not by treacherous guile or magic spell,
But in open field, with naked blades.
Still if thou seek vengeance upon me,
Take it, cousin! Only bide till dawn.
'Twere ill combating 'mid Night's dusky shades.
Meanwhile, watch or slumber. Thou art free
I rest—I, though thousand swords were drawn!"

v.
But, list! hark!—the deep roll of a drum,
And the summoning sound of many horns,
And the tramp of steeds that go and come!
And a cry—"Ho! Bathski-Dor! there waits
Zervi-van* one of her bloodiest morns!
Bathski-Dor! the foe besets our gates!
Up and arm, thou noble Hospodár!
Up and arm for battle, thou and thine!"

vi.
Bathski-Dor hath donned his warrior-garb.
This is Servia's—this his country's call;
Yet before he mounts his coal-black barb,
With drawn sword he speaks his kinsman Paul:
"Paul! thou shouldst have been a Servian, thou,
Though thy father fled to far Croatia.
Wilt thou clasp my hand, Paul? Wilt thou now
Turn, with me, thy saber against Asia?
Or shall thou and I, like madmen, struggle
Here unto the death with one another?
Shall we shed each other's blood because
Thou hadst once, as I had once, a brother?
Perish such a pride-born, hell-born juggle!
Kinsman! thou shalt live to win applause
From thyself, thy country, and thy God!
Clasp my hand! Thy gallant fathers trod
That green soil I have not loved in vain—
And thou wilt not shame them, though thou drain Thy last life-drop in fair Freedom's cause!"—

vii.
—"Kinsman! cousin! thou hast spoken well!"—
So in answer spake the warrior Paul—
"Be all feuds forgot at Servia's call!
Side by side we fight, knee-deep in gore!
Side by side we fight, and if we fall,
Servia's minstrels yet and oft shall tell
How Paul stood till death by Bathski-Dor,
And how he till death, too, stood by Paul!"

Sixteen hundred fifty, tenth of March—
Such the time and night these words were spoken;
And to-day a tomb, defaced and broken,
Yet still standing, and a broken arch,
Both with one half-worn engraven date,
"Sixteen hundred fifty, twelfth of March,"
Rise beside the slope of Dvina-vár
In White Servia. Two, so near to hate,
Mutual hate a few brief hours before,
Sleep in friendship there for evermore,
Paul and Bathski-Dor, the Hospodár.

THE TIME ERE THE ROSES WERE BLOWING

From the Persian of Kásem Zerbayer,* in Reply to Mescehi's "Time of the Roses."

i.
BRILLIANTLY sparkle, Mescehi, thy flowing
Numbers, like streams amid lilies upgrowing,
Yet, wouldst thou mingle the sad and sublime,
Sing, too, the Time,
Sing the young Time ere the Roses were blowing!

ii.
Then was the Season when Hope was yet glowing,
Then the blithe year of the Spring and the Sowing;
Then the Soul dwelt in her own fairy clime;
Then was the Time,
Then the gay Time ere the Roses were blowing!

iii.
Soon, ah! too soon, came the Summer, bestowing
Glory and Light, but a Light ever showing
In the chill nearness the Autumn's gray rime.
Gone was the Time,
Gone the fresh Time ere the Roses were blowing!

iv.
Life is at best but a Coming and Going,
Now flitting past us on swift, now on slow wing;
Here fair with Goodness, there gloomy with Crime.
O, for the Time,
O, for the Time ere the Roses were blowing!

v.
Coldly, oh, coldly, goes Truth overthrowing
Fancy's bright palaces, coldly goes mowing
Down the sweet blossoms of Boyhood's young prime.
Give us the Time,
Give us the Time ere the Roses were blowing!

vi.
I am ZERBA'YEH, the Least of the Knowing;
Thou art Mescehi, the Golden and Glowing!
O, when again thou wouldst dazzle in rhyme
Sing of the Time,
Sing of the Time ere the Roses were blowing!

Eastern Scenes and Customs.

GIPSEY SORCERIES IN THE DECCAN.

From their first appearance in Europe, about the middle of the fifteenth century, to the present day, the gipsies have been objects of wonder, curiosity, or interest, from the mystery in which their origin is enveloped, and from the singular manner in which they have kept apart from the nations among whom they wander. They were originally believed to be Egyptians, but the researches of late years establish the probability, if not the certainty, of India being their mother country. Their language is found to have no affinity with the Coptic; but it bears a strong resemblance to that of Hindoostan; and their arrival in Christendom followed at no great interval of time the period when Timour ravaged and desolated the East, practicing cruelties on the wretched natives of India, which might have very probably induced them to emigrate in vast numbers.

Whether this latter supposition be correct or not, it is difficult to determine; it is, however, a fact that the gipsies exist as a distinct and numerous caste in Asia; and during a recent visit to the Deccan, I chanced to have an opportunity of seeing a large tribe of these singular outcasts, who came down from the mountains to pay a rude homage to the governor, by exhibiting before him the magic arts which, from far-off ages, have been the heritage of their race.

For this purpose they were assembled outside the governor's bungalow at Dahpore, in a large open space, bounded on one side by the broad stream running through the garden in which the residence is built, and on the other by a hedge of giant jessamine, the post of a Hindoo sentinel. The whole population of the neighboring little village was assembled, and covered every part of the ground, sitting, after their own strange fashion, on their heels, and all gaping with intense eagerness on the space left near the verandah for the performance of their admired sorceries. Of the simple faith with which they were prepared to witness the spectacle, we had no doubt, both from the expression of their countenances and our knowledge of their extreme superstition; for near our seats stood a young Hindoo mother, carrying an infant whose tiny ankles were rapped up in rage, to preserve it from the effects of the "evil eye," which is peculiarly baneful when blue—and we had unhappily admired the little creature on the previous day.

It was about three in the afternoon, and the sun, still glorious in the cloudless, glowing sky, poured a flood of light upon the whole scene, which was highly picturesque. In a few seconds the circle by the verandah was occupied by an aged wizard, and an assistant beating a tom-tom, or drum. He placed a small pan of lighted charcoal on one side, and cast into it a few grains of incense, muttering at the same time an incantation. A wicker basket, of about the size used to hold a baby's wardrobe, was then brought forward, and our gipsy informed us that it was his intention to put a baba (youth) into it; afterwards to change him into a pigeon or dove, and make him fly off whithersoever we chose. The trick did not promise to be very difficult; but we thought differently when we saw the candidate for the metamorphosis. He was a tall, fine-looking lad of sixteen or seventeen, apparently much too big to occupy the place assigned him; but the wizard approaching, threw him on the ground, tied his feet to his hands, and literally doubling him together, dropped him into a sort of cabbage net, which he fastened over his head. He then brought him round for us to examine the strange prison; and certainly it appeared a clear case of "I can't get out." He was consigned to the basket, and a cloth thrown over him, both, of course, being raised and distended by the captive they covered. The wizard now began a solemn promenade round the basket to the sound of the tom-tom, muttering mysteriously the while. By degrees the cloth and basket shrank down, growing smaller and smaller, till the latter appeared empty; then the lid was gently raised, and the net and ligatures thrown out: a second circuit made by the old gipsy effected the promised translation, and a white pigeon fluttered from the basket, and directed its flight (as we desired) to Poonah. The enchantment now affected great amazement, called on the boy to come forth, raised and shook the basket, and finally producing a long naked sword, thrust it with loud cries apparently into every crevice of the wicker-work. He then turned, and calling in the direction of Poonah, which was only seven miles off, was answered from a distance by the best ventriloquism I ever heard. This was a summons for the lad to return. He, or rather the pigeon, obeyed. The basket began to swell again, the cloth rose, and the young gipsy sprang forth, leaving us in admiration of his wonderful power of self-compression; as how he could have folded himself into so small a space, we were unable to conceive, nor how he avoided the sharp point of the sword.

The second exhibition was far more extraordinary, and more difficult; indeed I could not have believed it, had I not witnessed it myself. A young man stepped forward, and by the assistance of one of the Parsees, who acted as interpreter, informed us, "that though it was not usual for the eyes to work as the hands did, he would for once, and to show his respect, &c., for the burra saib (great man,) use them in a similar manner." A huge piece of stone, two or three feet thick and square, was then placed before him, to which two short lines were strongly attached, having at the ends a small round piece of tin, the size and shape of a sixpence. Lifting his eyelids, and rolling the ball of the eye on one side in a most extraordinary manner, he stooped, inserting these coins inside the lid on the eyes, and closed the lid on them. His hands were then bound behind him, and raising himself slowly, he actually lifted the huge mass by the eyelids from the ground to the level of his waist. How long he would have continued to hold it I cannot tell, for the ladies present were so shocked at the really terrible exhibition, that they insisted on his being commanded to let it go. He was rewarded by a gift of ten rupees. We afterwards inquired if this power or art were common among the gipsy tribes, and were told it was not: being rather rare, and highly esteemed by them, the performer always expected an extra present from the spectators. Our Parsee servant added that the practice entailed early blindness on its possessor.

A man then seated himself before us, and ordered one of his companions to "light the fire," a command which was immediately obeyed; the fireplace being actually the speaker's head, on which they placed a piece of something that looked like black mud, and on it kindled a blaze of some height. The fire-king, as he called himself, then opened his mouth and received a lump of fire into it, from which he puffed volumes of smoke both from his mouth and nostrils; and certainly no one could look more like the "Zatanai" he personated, than he did, for his eyes were large, and glitteringly black and white, his features deformed, and his skin swarthy. Then followed the equally common snake-charmers, with their huge basket of civilized reptiles. It is perhaps less curious to see these creatures move to the monotonous music which is supposed to influence them, than to examine at leisure, and with impunity, their different appearances; from the frightful cobra di capello, to the deadly cobra manilla, the bite of which I once narrowly escaped by the presence of mind of a young child, who, without speaking, pulled me back at the moment my foot was descending on the step where it lay. This snake exhibition is common all over India, as well as that which followed it—the juggler and his golden balls. Some of the gipsy women then advanced to display their skill; but they were anything but interesting "magas." For the most part they were old, and very ugly, and their chief cleverness appeared to consist in making a fountain of their nose, from which they showered in a continuous stream the water they drew into their mouth from a small tube.

Swordsmen followed, and really displayed the most wonderful skill with their weapons. When their fencing was concluded, they made a huge pile of their swords, the points being upwards, and leaped over it with great agility and boldness. The entertainment concluded by several men breaking cocoa-nuts with their heads—a feat which they achieved by throwing the huge fruit high into the air, and catching it on their skulls, which were certainly of the thickest, as, though they sounded fearfully, they did not appear hurt by a blow which separated the shell of the cocoa-nut. By the time they had finished their employment of nut-cracking, the sun had nearly set, and the burra sahib, after gracious commendations, and a very liberal bucksheesh, dismissed her majesty's gipsy lieges, though they assured us they had many excellent tricks still in store. We were, however, weary, and believed the actors must be so too; therefore further proffers were declined, to their great surprise, as we were told; for the native princes or chiefs can never have enough of similar exhibitions, and tax the poor creatures' powers almost beyond endurance when they are thus brought before them. The exhibition had greatly amused us, both from the skill of the people and the picturesque effect of their wild appearance and costume. Their own apparent faith in the incantations they muttered, and the real credence bestowed on their powers by the native spectators, gave a reality to the scene which no English jugglery can ever possess. The sword exercise and cocoa-nut breaking were accompanied by shrill, animated, and exciting cries. Of their skill in palmistry we were unable to judge, as we did not understand their language; but we were told that their prophetic gifts are very similar to those of their European brethren.

About three or four days afterwards, as we were returning from a drive, we met the whole tribe on their return to the mountains. The road was narrow, and they were therefore obliged to move to one side, passing in a long-continued and most picturesque file, beneath the mimosa-trees that bordered the way. One might almost have fancied himself living in the age of the Patriarchs, and witnessed the journeyings of a people, as he gazed on them. The strong men came first, each armed with a tall staff; then the women, bearing their infants on their hips, or leading the young children by the hand; old crones and "ancient men" followed, with such cattle as they possessed, and bundles, containing, as we supposed, their property. They all saluted us with kindly smiles as they glided by; and we watched them with considerable interest for some time, the great plain they traversed permitting us to see them till they were lost in the dim though brief twilight. We never saw the gipsies of the Deccan more; but we have often thought and talked of them, and regretted that the energies they displayed, and the toil by which they must have brought many of their performances to perfection, had not been more worthily employed and better directed. They follow strictly the wise injunction, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might;" though unhappily their hand, through ignorance, finds little to do that is useful or becoming rational beings; and they are thus far examples to those who, living in the light of civilization, never exert their capabilities, whether mental or physical, which their Creator has bestowed. Many a sluggard of our enlightened Europe might thus derive a useful lesson from the wild gipsies of Hindoostan.—[Chamber's Journal.]

INDIAN BHANG.

No one who has lived in India, and is acquainted with Asiatic manners and customs, can fail to be struck, when he reads Stephen Barrow, and such writers, by the great similarity which exists between the Egyptian and the Hindoo. The hieroglyphics depicted in the tableaux of ancient lore—the pictures of implements of husbandry, household furniture, manner of irrigating the land, carrying water—all tell the same tale; and the conviction remains forcibly upon the mind, that the two nations must have had the same origin, or have been closely united perhaps by traffic, in days gone by. The use of hashish is common to both, and serves as another connecting link.

The hashish or bhang is used by the Hindoo because fermented and spirituous liquors are forbidden by his religion, although they are given to the gods as offerings, by placing them behind the idol, and out of human sight. Although even the Brahmin not unfrequently partakes of bhang, those who indulge in it are looked upon in the light of debauchees; and sober folk shake their heads at them, and bhangie and ganja khore are opprobrious terms.

Bhang is the leaf of the male plant of the hemp, dried in the sun; when fresh, the leaf has a pleasing odor; but I am not certain whether it retains it when dried. Ganja is the same leaf; but being rubbed down in the hand to powder; and smoked in a rariella (a kind of hookah), retains the name of the plant; and the epithet of churres is given to the dried flower and stamen, which must naturally be more delicate and scarce, and on that account dearer. Churres is frequently made into tablet and luddos, or balls of sugar-candy—a dainty sweetmeat for the Hindoo, who gets bemused as he sucks or nibbles the sweets; and I have heard the feeling they occasion described by a friend as that of being plunged into a pleasing reverie, which was, however, every now and then broken by a sensation of being hoisted up into the air, and let down again with a shock.

The preparing a lotah, or jug of bhang, is accompanied by as much joviality and gossip among the partakers as the mixing of a bowl of punch or negus is with us; and many a time have I noticed an old favorite servant as he sat over the orgies of the bhang. Wherever Peerun traveled, his bundle of bhang went with him, and at mid-day, after his ablution and poojah, and lunch of parched rice or peas, a stone mortar and a wooden thiel, made of hard baubel, or thornwood, were produced, at the sight of which a few favorite friends or fellow-servants speedily collected. The humblest of these would undertake the pulverising of the leaf, which was done by rapid friction in the stone mortar with the wooden pestle. This was accomplished in about ten minutes, and water being poured over it, the liquid was strained through a piece of muslin; to this was added some sugar, and sometimes ginger or pepper, to make it more palatable. The host generally took a draught himself first, taking care, as usual, not to touch the lotah, or brass goblet, with his lips; but sitting on his haunches, and putting back his head, allowing the favorite beverage to slide down his gullet. His humble friends generally got each a small brass cotarah, or cupful, and drank it with relish and applause. The party soon after dispersed, and Peerun was seldom fit for any work or business after this: his eyes became bloodshot, his speech thick, his mind confused; in a word, he became drunk, and retired to his hut, or, on a march, betook himself to the shade of a tree; and there he dozed or slumbered, and enjoyed his reveries till three or four hours sobered him again. He then bustled about, and began to think of a regular meal, which was always cooked by his own hands about the gloaming.

Although a daily bibber of bhang, Peerun was a faithful and trustworthy servant, and in good circumstances; and when known to me, the noxious weed had not impaired either his health or intellect. But this is not always the case; the bhangie and ganja khore must be able to live well and comfortably: he must have plenty of milk and ghee (clarified butter), and not be stinted in food, otherwise he grows lean and withered—his hands and feet become long and attenuated, his eyes dull, and the white of the eye yellow and bloodshot. Costiveness is also a consequence, and the poor debauchee at last falls a sacrifice to his favorite drug. Bhang is not a cheap luxury: it costs the Bengalee as much as our Souchong costs us; and considering the poor circumstances of the Indian, it occasions him a greater outlay than tea does here to a comfortable householder. A ganja khore and bhang bibber may frequently, therefore, be known by his rags and hungry look. Smoking does not produce so great a degree of intoxication as drinking, but the same evils follow in its train. However strange and incredible it may appear, I will not hesitate to relate a fact which I witnessed during a march; namely, the giving of a small portion of bhang to some working bullocks. The oxen were in beautiful condition; and upon remonstrating with the man under whose charge they were, as to the bad effects the drug might have, he only laughed at my fears, and maintained that the bullocks, after being shampooed and currycombed, looked to their dram to invigorate them, as a hungry man to his food, and that they could stand their work and fatigue all the better for it—with what truth I never had time to investigate thoroughly, as I lost sight of the man and his cattle after the march was finished. Giving bhang to cattle is however, not a common thing, and may therefore be known to few Europeans.

Native doctors occasionally use bhang externally as a medicament, as we do laudanum, to deaden the pain. It is tied in a bundle, warmed at the fire, and applied as a fomentation.

The datura or stramonium is a common weed in Hindoostan; and, like the foxglove, delights in a rich and moist soil. Who that saw it in all its beauty, clad with large white, trumpet-shaped sweet-smelling flowers, would think that death and insanity may be brought on by its thorny apple, or rather the seed contained in the apple of this beautiful plant. It is a well-known poison to the Bengalee, who mixes it in small quantities with the rum which he sells to the European soldier, and gives it in large doses to an enemy whose mental powers he wishes to destroy for ever; and certainly, when not counteracted in time, the derangement of the brain brought on by datura becomes lasting. I have seen raving madness, melancholy and merry madness, all produced by the use of this; according to the constitution, the poison acted differently.

In one gentleman's family I witnessed a case in point. A Hookaberdar, who had been concerned in robbing a female, had clandestinely brought the property home; not undetected, however, by some of his fellow-servants. The woman suspected him, took out a warrant, and his master's premises were searched; but the cunning thief had thrown the purloined jewels into a well, which, on account of its brackish water, was in disuse in the household, and consequently it had almost got dry, and choked up with weeds and bushes. The police were unsuccessful in their search; but two of the servants, who knew of the well, threatened to inform unless they received a douceur. The pipeman therefore mixed up a large dose of datura seed, ground to powder, with their curry; of which, being mess-fellows, they both partook.

In a short time the cook began to rave about roasts and puddings, and although it was night, began to sweep out the kitchen, and make noisy preparations for the mid-day meal. The other man, who was sort of a valet, and had charge of his master's wardrobe, came up stairs, pretended he heard the bugle, and insisted upon laying out the clothes and accoutrements for parade, and in his confusion of mind upset the boxes and toilet of his master. All this of course occasioned a great stir and disturbance in the household. The patients, however, were not allowed to go on in their mad career, but were separately shut up for the night by the master's direction, and medical aid was procured for them in the morning. Cooling salts, lime-juice and water, also vinegar and water, were prescribed, with the frequent use of the shower-bath; which measures were successful, restoring in a few days the patients to sanity. I may add that ample evidence being produced against him, the Hookaberdar was brought to condign punishment, set to work on the road, and disgraced for life.—[Chamber's Journal.]

CATS SUCKING THE BREATH OF INFANTS.—It is a very prevalent notion that cats are fond of sucking the breath of infants, and, consequently, of producing disease and death. Upon the slightest reflection, however, nothing can be more obvious than that it is impossible for a cat to suck an infant's breath—at least so as to do it any injury; for even on the supposition that it did so, the construction of its mouth must preclude it from interrupting the process of breathing by the mouth and the nose at the same time. This vulgar error must have arisen from cats nestling about infants in beds and cradles to procure warmth.

"IT IS THE SONG MY MOTHER SINGS."

BY ELIZA COOK.

It is the song my mother sings,
And gladly do I list the strain;
I never hear it but it brings
The wish to hear it sung again.

She breathed it to me long ago,
To lull me to my baby rest;
And as she murmur'd, soft and low,
I slept in peace upon her breast.

Oh, gentle song! though hast a throng
Of angel-tones within thy spell;
I feel that I shall love thee long,
And fear I love thee far too well.

For though I turn to hear thee now,
With doating glance of warm delight,
In after years I know not how Thy plaintive notes may dim my sight.

That mother's voice will then be still—
I hear it falter day by day;
It soundeth like a fountain rill,
That trembles ere it cease to play.

And then this heart, thou gentle song,
Will find an anguish in thy spell;
'Twill wish it could not love so long,
Or had not loved thee half so well.

EDUCATION OF THE DOMESTIC CIRCLE.

PARENTS, possessed of tolerable means, seldom neglect to send their children to school. They are often heard to say of their young people, 'Whatever advantage money can purchase for them in the way of education, we are willing to give them.' Having expended the money ungrudgingly, they are often surprised that their children do not turn out very well. The fact is, they expect too much from liberality in school fees—they are too apt to feel their consciences relieved as to their duty to the young by mere considerations of the cost in money. However well it may suit a busy father to depute the nurture of his children, and use his own time in money-making or in needful recreation, it is very certain that the children will be imperfectly educated if they have not been reared carefully and rationally in the domestic circle, and cost their parents, or some persons standing in the light of parents, a great deal of trouble over and above all that is purchaseable from the school-master.

The education of the domestic circle is moral education. The fresh human beings continually coming into the world might be regarded as a colony of savages coming in among a civilized people, and requiring to be adjusted to the tone of the society of which they are henceforth to form a part. Their impulses are in full activity: the provocations to the working of these impulses lie full before them. The business is to train the impulses to submit to those checks and those modified or regulated movements which society pronounces to be desirable. It will not be by reading of texts, or hearing of precepts and maxims, that this will be done. It only can be done by training to habits—a duty requiring much time, great patience, and no small skill and judgment.

It is, then, an onerous duty, and yet its weight may be much lessened if a good method be adopted, and adopted sufficiently early. Something can be done with a child from a very early period of existence. For instance, if he cries, we may avoid a great evil if we abstain from administering dainties for the purpose of soothing him; or, on the other hand, from using him harshly by way of punishment. The crying of a child on account of any little accident or disappointment is less an evil to him than an annoyance to us: we probably attach too much consequence to the idea of keeping children quiet, as if quietness were in him a virtue. If, however, it appear really desirable to stop the crying of an infant, the best way is to produce a diversion in his mind. Create some novelty about or before him, and if it be sufficient to give a new turn to his feelings, he will become what is called 'good' immediately. This is a cheap way of effecting the object, and it can be attended by no imaginable bad consequences. It must be remarked, however, that we—that is, grown-up people—are ourselves the causes of much avoidable squalling among the young. A child is looking at something, or is enjoying himself in some little sport with a companion: from fondness, or some other cause, we snatch him up of a sudden in our arms: he cries. Can we wonder? Should any of us like to be whipped up from a dinner-table in the midst of our soup, or from a concert-room when Jenny Lind is enchanting all ears? Undoubtedly it is injustice to a child to treat him thus, not to speak of the worse injustice of punishing him in such circumstances for crying. He is entitled to have his will consulted before we snatch him away merely for our own amusement. Should it be necessary to interfere with his amusements, or to put a stop to them, use diversion and kind words by way of softening matters, and we shall probably have nothing to complain of.

Even tolerably amiable children, when placed together, will be found to have frequent little quarrels, the consequence of disrespectful words, or, perhaps, interferences with each other's property. Some are much more liable both to give and take offense than others. Nothing is more troublesome to a parent; for it is scarcely possible entirely to ascertain the merits of any case. The liability to such collisions will at least be diminished if the parents never fail to observe towards each other, and towards their servants and children, the rules of good-breeding; and if they, moreover, take every opportunity of inculcating the beautiful and happy results of domestic peace. These means, however, will be in vain if children are allowed too much time to spend in idleness. If entirely occupied, in whatever way—with lessons, with work, with amusement, or with reading or drawing—they will be very little liable to fall into discord. It should, accordingly, be regarded as one of the first duties of those having a charge of young people to keep them incessantly engaged in something which may interest their faculties.

As soon as their understanding fits them for such intercommunion, children should be made the companions, friends, and confidants of their parents. The old rule was, that in their parents' presence they should be perfectly quiet. This might be a gratifying homage to the parent, but it was not education to the child. If a child is brought to a family table, he should be allowed to join in the family conversation, that he may learn to converse. It is both surprising and gratifying to observe how soon children work up to the standard of their parents' attainments, and how beautifully they repay the openness and confidence with which they are treated, by reposing the most unreserved confidence in return. They know the family position, the family prospects, objects, and wishes, and become deeply interested in them all. Affection proves a far more powerful check than severity: obedience is a word unknown in the family vocabulary, because the thing is never wanting. Co-operation, cheerful contribution by heart and hand to the family objects, is the principle of action. In such a family there is rarely anything entitled to the appellation of discord: there are no separations, no elopements, no acts of domestic rebellion. A smooth course of happy life flows on, and the old age of the parents, who have trained so much worth in their offspring, is soothed and cheered by the unremitting exercise of the very virtues which themselves have fostered and perfected.

This is no ideal picture. We could point to families where the scions of the house, and even the children of strangers, have been the subjects of a domestic education such as we describe, and where the results have been the realization of the desideratum we set out with, namely, the adjustment of the fresh generation to the civilization attained by the old.

BRINGING IN THE NEW YEAR IN GERMANY.—There is plenty of dancing going on in Germany. Glee-wine, a sort of negus and punch, is brought in after supper, and just before twelve o'clock. Every one is on the watch to win the New Year from the others—that is, to announce the New Year first. Accordingly, the instant the city bell is heard to commence tolling, 'Prost Neu Jahr!' starts from every one's lips; and happy is he who is acknowledged to have made the exclamation first, and to have won from all the others the New Year. In every house at that moment all over the country, is shouted 'Prost Neu Jahr!' prost being no German word, but a contraction of the Latin prosit. On one occasion, having retired to rest, our servants assembled at our room door and woke us, in order to cry 'Prost Neu Jahr!' On the following morning, every one that meets you salutes you with the exclamation. With the glee-wine are brought in, on a waiter, the New Year wishes of the family and its friends. These are written in verse, generally on very ornamented gilt note-paper, and sealed up. When the Prost Neu Jahr has passed, and all have drunk to one another a happy New Year, with a general touching of glasses, these are opened and read. For the most part they are without signatures, and occasion much guessing and joking. Under cover of these anonymous epistles, good hints and advice are often administered by parents and friends. Numbers of people, who never on any other occasion write a verse, now try their hands at one; and those who do not find themselves sufficiently inspired, present those ornamental cards of which I have spoken under Christmas, and which have all kinds of wishes, to suit all kinds of tastes and circumstances. These are to be purchased of all qualities and prices; and those sent by friends and lovers generally appear on New Year's day, and are signed or not, as suits the purpose of the sender. —[William Howitt's Rural and Domestic Life of Germany.

THE SUPPER.

BY HENRY FRANK LOTT.

ONE night, about Christmas, with snow on the ground

That the loveliest moon ever lightened,
My way to my Carry's snug cottage I found—
By the cheerfulest wood-fire brightened.
She had hinted, as soon as they slaughtered the swine,

And the sausage was dried and well flavor'd,
If I'd try it and taste of the new elder wine,
That she should conceive herself favor'd.

The warm greeting over, I kicked off the snow,
And retired to the warm chimney-corner,
Where links of brown sausages hung in a row,—
Oh! I thought of the little Jack Horner!

For you know a cold night gives a zest to a treat,
And Car, though I never beheld her
On any occasion more rosy or neat,
Still I thought on the sausage and elder.

Though Carry scarce knows what an epicure means,
I declared that the feast was delicious;
And who sups from a pig he has oft fed with beans,
Is fit to be ranked with Appicus.

As I told how Silenus got drunk on grape juice
That some shirtless young Cupids were squeezing,
She laughingly said—"Ah! this elder's more use
On a night that to zero is freezing!"

Those berries in autumn I with my own hands
In her duck of a basket had gathered;
And I thought the spiced draught beat the wines of all lands,

By bacchanal praises belather'd.
As jocund we sat by the hazel-root fire,
And let the last jorum boil over,
My Carry confessed she had all her desire,
And I was the happiest lover.

STORY OF AN APPARITION.

THE President d'Albi, a distinguished magistrate, possessed an estate a few leagues distant from Toulouse. Every year, during the vacation, he regularly went to pass some time at his estate, from the situation of which it was necessary to take a by-road. To avoid traveling by night, M. d'Albi always stopped at an auberge called L'Hotel de la Poste, sending his carriage and servants on before him, and the following morning proceeding on horseback, attended by his faithful companion, Castor, a fine bloodhound. On his return to Toulouse he acted in like manner, sending his carriage on before him to await him at the hotel.

On the first of March, 1758, M. d'Albi arrived on horseback, and being obliged to return in haste to Toulouse, he merely drew up at the hotel for the purpose of taking refreshment. But he was greatly surprised at finding the whole family in the utmost affliction: the master of the hotel had been missing for many days; and as yet all search to discover him had been in vain. The arrival of the president was a source of consolation to the afflicted family, and they looked with confidence to the measures which his counsel would suggest, and his authority enforce, in unraveling the mystery. Accordingly, he summoned the functionaries of the district around him, and gave orders that the most minute inquiries should be made in the environs. Foreseeing that this affair would detain him some time, he dispatched his servant with a letter to his lady, lest his delay might cause her uneasiness. These proceedings occupied the entire day; he was fatigued; but before retiring to rest he repaired to the stable, followed by his dog, lest in all this confusion they should have forgotten to feed his horse—an animal upon which he set a high value.

On returning to the house, which was at a little distance, he perceived that Castor had not followed him. He returned, and called him several times, but had the greatest difficulty in forcing him to return. The dog had buried himself in a sort of haggard, filled with fagots, which lay just behind the stable, and would not quit it. At length, his master having succeeded in forcing him out, shut the haggard-door, and proceeded to bed.

As it was yet early he disposed himself to read; but being overcome by fatigue, he fell into a sound sleep. He had scarcely slept a few hours when he was awakened by a frightful dream, in which he had seen Francois, the innkeeper, covered with blood. He was about to speak to him when a howling from his dog awoke him, and interrupted the dream. Being a man of strong mind, he attributed this nightmare to the agitation which the events of the day had produced, and considered it nothing more than nervous excitement. With this assurance he soon fell asleep again; but the same figure presented itself to his imagination, and this time with more distinctness. The innkeeper now addressed him:

"I have been assassinated," said he, "by the ostler whom I discharged last year, having had a quarrel with him, in which I charged him with dishonesty. He is a Catalan, and ever since retained a feeling of vengeance against me. It was he who committed the crime. My body will be found buried under the faggots, in the haggard, behind the stable. You must dig deep to verify the revelation I now make. Have my body buried with the rites of Christian burial. You shall be recompensed."

M. d'Albi awoke again, covered with a cold sweat. He reproached himself with pusillanimity; which, by allowing his sleep to be interrupted, betrayed his weakness. He endeavored to sleep, but twice more the same vision pursued him. No longer able to support his anxiety he lit a taper, and strove to captivate his attention with a book. Vain hope—he recommenced the same passage over and over again, without being able to understand a word of what he read.

At last, no longer able to resist the uneasiness which he felt, the president arose, dressed himself, and as soon as morning dawned he hastened to the stable, accompanied by his dog, which ran barking straight to the haggard. M. d'Albi felt influenced by a strange sentiment of terror, for he could not dissemble his belief that he was upon the point of seeing realized that which his good sense repudiated as an error inconsistent with the belief of any sound-minded person. How! bring himself to admit supernatural agencies in a matter of this description?

The inexplicable fact, however, was about to be established. Surprised by the singular motions of Castor, he called some peasants who were going to their work. After having removed the faggots, he made them dig up the earth at the precise spot where the dog was scraping with his paws. Judge of the fright of the work-people, and of the horror of the president, at discovering the remains of a corpse in a state of putrefaction. He came out of the haggard, had the door shut, and commanded the peasants to preserve the strictest secrecy, until they had discovered the assassin, and thus prevent him from escaping the hands of justice.

The formalities being accomplished, they succeeded in discovering the ostler in a neighboring village. All the details turned out to be exact, but the discovery was attributed to Castor, for M. d'Albi never spoke of the vision.

After the murderer had been conducted to prison, and the unfortunate Francois had been buried, the president departed for Toulouse, promising the family at the hotel to return when the trial came on.

As soon as the trial commenced, M. d'Albi repaired to the town to follow up the prosecution. The murderer was condemned, and the president made arrangements for his departure. During the trial, which lasted several days, he went to his estate every night, and returned to town in the morning; but as this was the eve of his departure for Toulouse, he remained at the Hotel de la Poste.

He had not his dog with him this night, Castor having followed the servant. M. d'Albi was alone in his chamber, when the apparition stood before him.

"You have had me honored," said the specter, "with Christian burial; through you I have obtained justice upon my assassin. What can I do to recompense you for this service?"

M. d'Albi, in his dream, asked him to inform him of the day on which he would die. The vision promised it, and disappeared.

The new episode caused a complete change in the president's manners; he became gloomy, pensive and absent; never hinting to his wife nor to his dearest friends the cause of this change. These habits continued for nearly twelve years, when M. d'Albi began to resume his wonted serenity. As further time elapsed his melancholy impression gradually disappeared; when on the night of the 25th of May, 1772, being in a profound sleep, one of his old dreams returned, and Francois, the innkeeper, stood before him. He approached him, covered with his shroud.

"You wished to know when your last hour should arrive," said he to him, in a sepulchral voice. The vision extended its bony arm to the clock, and placing its finger on the point of midnight, exclaimed: "In one month, and at this hour!"

The president violently pulled the bell which was at the head of his bed. His domestics found him in a state of great mental excitement, repeating incoherent words. His physician was sent for immediately, who, after having administered to him a narcotic draught, ordered him a warm bath. For several days the president was in a state of great dejection. At length, becoming gradually more calm, he requested his wife to leave him alone with his brother-in-law, a man of strong mind and sound judgement, whom he wished to consult. When every one had retired, he told him what we have just related.

The brother-in-law was not a little surprised at this strange revelation, and concluded that the president's mind was affected with a species of monomania. But every thing was narrated with the utmost precision, the circumstances minutely detailed, and the witnesses of the material fact were still living; besides, M. d'Albi was not a weak-minded man. Since that awful event had happened, he had, upon numerous occasions, manifested his excellent judgement in the capacity of a magistrate; but a fixed idea upon this point might have tormented his imagination, and his brother-in-law was at a loss what arguments to employ to convince a man so singularly infatuated.

"If you take my advice," said he, "you will consult our pastor upon the matter; he is your spiritual director; he is, besides, a man of merit, and an eminent guide."

M. d'Albi approved of this counsel, and sent to request the clergyman's attendance. He related to him all the circumstances of the apparition, and asked his advice upon the matter. The pastor was equally embarrassed as M. d'Albi's brother-in-law.

"The Divinity," said he at length, "may manifest himself to us in various ways; his miracles daily present themselves to our eyes. It seldom happens, notwithstanding, that the dead quit their graves to communicate with living men; but being impressed strongly with this idea, it would be prudent for you to approach the sacraments, and put your affairs in order. We must prevent this matter from making a noise; it might alarm the minds of the people, and give rise to a hundred ridiculous stories. You should not persist in concealing the circumstances from your wife, who is a woman of great fortitude and piety; but let it be kept a secret from your children."

The clergyman then, with M. d'Albi's consent, imparted the secret to the president's wife, who, in common with all those to whom it had been divulged, attributed it to a diseased mind.

The physician, though of the same opinion, as a professional man, thought that an imagination so violently excited might be attended with very serious consequences. He recommended, above all things, a variety of engaging pursuits—and that he should be constantly watched—never allowed to remain alone, or abandoned to his own thoughts.

As the appointed hour approached, the president became more pensive and gloomy. But, what was extraordinary, his health did not appear at all affected, which his friends often remarked to him. They even sometimes joked on the infallibility of the prediction.

The eve of the predicted day had now arrived; the president never enjoyed better health. His wife and friends began to reckon with confidence on his recovery. But, from a feeling of superstitious fear, they not only resolved to change the hour of all the watches and clocks in the house, but they easily obtained permission to make all the clocks within the hearing of the president's hotel strike twelve at the hour of eleven. The family gave, on that evening, a grand supper, to which all their intimate friends were invited. M. d'Albi was distressingly agitated—every moment he looked at the clock. They laughed at him; and endeavored to make him, as well as the guests, merry by a plentiful outpouring of wine. The clergyman himself wore an air of extraordinary gaiety to encourage him. In fine the hands of all the clocks and watches indicated "twelve."

By a singular chance the pendule, in the president's chamber, had not been advanced. The town clocks had all sounded the hour, the glasses were filled, and every one rose to drink the president's health. He joined in this compliment with excellent grace, having quite resumed his serenity. He sustained with great animation the pleasantries which were addressed to him, and even improvised a pretty quatrain upon the interest which he had excited. This led the company naturally to speak of M. d'Albi's poetical talent, which he had neglected for some years; and the president could not refrain from entertaining his guests with a short poem, which he had composed upon his mental malady, and which they importuned him to favor them with a sight of. M. d'Albi said, in reply, that he must go to his dressing room, as no one else but himself could find it. He took a light and proceeded towards his apartment. Suddenly a pistol-shot was heard! The president's valet-de-chambre had just forced open his master's secrétarie, for the purpose of robbing him. Surprised in the act, he seized a pistol which lay at his hand, and blew out his master's brains. Midnight sounded at that instant by the clock in the president's chamber.

THE CHANGE.

THINE eyes are blue as when we met;
Nor is thy hair yet tinged with gray;
Thy teeth like glittering pearls are set,
Nor e'en show symptoms of decay.

Thy voice hath still its silv'ry tone,
And smooth as marble is thy brow;
Thy blooming cheek no change hath known;
And yet, and yet how changed art thou!

Oh! while I gaze on thy fair face,
Why are mine eyes thus fill'd with tears?
And why do I so sadly trace
The memory of other years?

The world discerns no change, whose eyes
But view thee lovely as thou art;
For deeper, deeper still it lies—
Alas! the change is in thy heart!

THE FROZEN SHIP.

ONE serene evening in the middle of August, 1775, Captain Warrens, the master of the greenland, a whale ship, found himself becalmed among an immense number of icebergs, in about seventy-seven degs. of north latitude, on one side, and within a mile of his vessel. These were of immense height, and closely wedged together, and a succession of snow-covered peaks appeared behind each other as far as the eye could reach; showing that the ocean was completely blocked up in that quarter, and that it had probably been so for a long period of time. Captain Warrens did not feel altogether satisfied with his situation, but there being no wind, he could not move one way or the other, and he therefore kept a strict watch, knowing that he would be safe as long as the icebergs continued in their respective places. About midnight the wind rose to a gale, accompanied by thick showers of snow, while a succession of tremendous thundering, grinding, and crushing noises gave evidence that the ice was in motion. The vessel received violent shocks every second, for the haziness of the atmosphere prevented those on board from discovering in what direction the open water lay, or if there was actually any at all on each side of them. The night was spent in tacking as often as any cause of danger happened to present itself, and in the morning the storm abated, and Captain Warrens found, to his great joy, that the ship had not sustained any serious injury. He remarked that the accumulated icebergs which had on the preceding evening formed an impenetrable barrier had been separated by the wind, and that in one place a canal of open sea wound its course among them as far as the eye could discern. It was two miles beyond the entrance of this canal that a ship made its appearance about noon. The sun shone brightly, and a gentle breeze blew from the north. Captain Warrens was struck with the strange manner in which her sails were disposed, and with the dismantled aspect of her rigging. She continued to go before the wind for a few furlongs, and then grounding upon the low icebergs, remained motionless. Captain Warrens immediately leaped into his boat with several seamen, and rowed towards her. On approaching he observed that her hull was miserably weather-beaten, and not a soul appeared on deck, which was covered with snow to a considerable depth. He then hailed her crew, but no answer was returned. Previous to stepping on board, an open port-hole near the main-chains caught his eye; and on looking into it, he perceived a man reclining back in a chair, with writing materials on a table before him; but the feebleness of the light made every thing very indistinct before him. The party went upon deck, and having removed the hatch way, descended to the cabin. They first came to the apartment which Captain Warrens viewed through the port-hole. A terror seized him as he entered it; its inmate retained his former position, and seemed to be insensible to strangers. He was found to be a corpse, and a green damp mold had covered his cheeks and forehead, and veiled his open eye-balls. He had a pen in his hand, and a log-book lay before him. The last sentence in its unfinished page ran thus: "Nov. 14th, 1792. We have now been enclosed in the ice seventeen days. The fire went out yesterday, and our master has been trying ever since to kindle it again without success. His wife died this morning. There is no relief."

Captain Warrens and his seamen hurried from the spot without uttering a word. On entering the principal cabin, the first object that attracted their attention was the dead body of a female, reclining on a bed in an attitude of deep interest and attention. Her countenance retained the freshness of life; but a contraction of the limbs showed that her form was inanimate. Seated on the floor was the corpse of an apparently young man, holding a steel in one hand and a flint in the other, as if in the act of striking fire upon some tinder which lay beside him. In the fore-part of the vessel several sailors were found lying dead in their berths, and the body of a boy crouched at the bottom of the gangway stairs. Neither provisions nor fuel could be discovered any where; but Captain Warrens was prevented, by the superstitious prejudices of his seamen, from examining the vessel as minutely as he wished to have done. He therefore carried away the log-book, returned to his own ship, and immediately steered to the southward, impressed with the awful example he had just witnessed of the danger of navigating the Polar seas in high northern latitudes. On returning to England he made various inquiries respecting vessels that had disappeared in an unknown way; and, by comparing the results of those with the information which was afforded by the written documents in his possession, he ascertained the name and history of the imprisoned ship, and of her unfortunate master; and found that she had been frozen thirteen years previous to the time of his discovering her among the ice.

INTELLIGENCE IN A FISH.—At a recent meeting of the Liverpool Philosophical Society, Dr. Warwick related an extraordinary instance of intelligence in a fish. 'When he resided at Durham, the seat of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, he was walking one evening in the park, and came to a pond where fish intended for the table were temporarily kept. He took particular notice of a fine pike, of about six pounds weight, which, when it observed him, darted hastily away. In so doing, it struck its head against a tenterhook in a post (of which there were several in the pond, placed to prevent poaching), and, as it afterwards appeared, fractured its skull, and turned the optic nerve on one side. The agony evinced by the animal appeared most horrible. It rushed to the bottom, and boring its head into the mud, whirled itself round with such velocity that it was almost lost to the sight for a short interval. It then plunged about the pond, and at length threw itself completely out of the water on the bank. He (the doctor) went and examined it, found that a very small portion of the brain was protruding from the fracture in the skull. He carefully replaced this, and with a small silver tooth-pick, raised the indented portion of the skull. The fish remained still for a short time, and he then put it again into the pond. It appeared at first a good deal relieved; but in a few minutes it again darted and plunged about, until it threw itself out of the water a second time. A second time Dr. Warwick did what he could to relieve it, and again put it into the water. It continued for several times to throw itself out of the pond, and with the assistance of the keeper, the doctor at length made a kind of pillow for the fish, which was then left in the pond to its fate. Upon making his appearance at the pond on the following morning, the pike came towards him to the edge of the water, and actually laid its head upon his foot. The doctor thought this most extraordinary; but he examined the fish's skull, and found it going on all right. He then walked backwards and forwards along the edge of the pond for some time, and the fish continued to swim up and down, turning whenever he turned; but being blind on the wounded side of its skull, it always appeared agitated when it had that side towards the bank, as it could not then see its benefactor. On the next day he took some young friends down to see the fish, which came to him as usual; and at length he actually taught the pike to come to him at his whistle, and feed out of his hands. With other persons it continued as shy as fish usually are. He (Dr. Warwick) thought this a most remarkable instance of gratitude in a fish for a benefit received; and as it always came at his whistle, it proved also what he had previously, with other naturalists, disbelieved—that fishes are sensible to sound.'

THRILLING ANECDOTE.—Hon. Andrew H. Stephens, of Georgia, in a recent address at a meeting in Alexandria, for the benefit of the Orphan Asylum and Free School of that city, related the following thrilling anecdote: "A poor little boy, in a cold night in June, with no home or roof to shelter his head, no paternal or maternal guardian or guide to protect and direct him in his wanderings, reached, at nightfall, the house of a wealthy planter, who took him in, fed, lodged and sent him on his way with his blessing. Those little kind attentions cheered his heart and inspired him with fresh courage to battle with the ills and obstacles of life. Years rolled around: Providence led him along; he had reached the legal profession his hospitable host had died; the cormorants that prey on the substance of man had formed a conspiracy to get away from the widow her estates. She sent for the nearest counsel to commit her cause to him; and that counsel proved to be the orphan boy years before welcomed and entertained by her and her deceased husband. The stimulus of a warm and tenacious gratitude was now added to the ordinary motives connected with the profession. He undertook her cause with a will not easily to be resisted; he gained it; the widow's estates were secured to her in perpetuity; and," Mr. Stephens added, with an emphasis of emotion that sent its electric thrill throughout the house, "that orphan boy stands before you!"

THERE is a story current, that when the present Pope was a youth, and in the Guardia Nobile at Rome, he fell deeply in love with a beautiful English girl. She refused his suit, although he was handsome, young, and noble, on account of the difference of religion; and he took the matter so much to heart that he retired to a convent, became an ecclesiastic, and eventually pope.

SWEET LAVENDER.

Lavender is the emblem of "distant music" in the Language of Flowers.

'Tis the sound of distant music, and it comes from o'er the hills,
Sweeping upon the breezy air by fields and summer
rills;

Up, up the valley—homesteads fair and sheltering nooks are passed;

"Oh, Lavender—sweet Lavender!" is clearly heard at last.

And forth she comes, the cottage girl, with basket on her arm,
Singing loud that summer word, whose name breathes
many a charm:

"Twelve bunches for a single groat," she adds with plaintive cry:

"Oh, Lavender—sweet Lavender!"—these treasures who will buy?"

The village girls will seek the sweets—the faint perfume they prize;

By hoarded treasures, tokens dear, the annual gift-flower lies;

And mourners seek its pensive hue—it suits well with the dead—

To strew above that breathless form, now slumbering on the bed.

Oh, bear it to the lone churchyard, and find a nameless mound—

There, drooping mourner, cast these sweets upon the grassy ground;

And as the sound steals on the breeze, across the quiet vale,

That well-known music soothes thy heart, attuned to sorrow's tale.

Perfume the air above the dead, the faithful, happy dead!

Comfort and hope, sweet lavender, with healing influence shed;

This angel-music floateth past—on seraph's wings
'tis borne—

The mourner's heart can hear it oft, though tempest-awayed and torn.

MEANS OF ENHANCING BEAUTY.

MANY of the fair sex, especially in France, attribute immense importance to the art of dress. We hold even the sublimest secrets of costume but lightly in comparison with the all-powerful effect of the thoughts, feelings, and passions upon the features; or even that of the health upon the complexion and form. A good or happy thought can lend a brightness to the eye, a sweetness to the expression, a healthy glow to the cheek, and an elasticity to the limbs, which not all the dyes of Araby or corsets of Paris can imitate. Nevertheless, to despise or neglect the art of costume, or pass it over without some notice, would be an unpardonable omission.

We shall endeavor to lay down such general rules regarding the arrangement of the attire as may at all times apply, despite the rapid changes in the laws of fashion, which, unlike those of the "Medes and Persians," that "altered not," are revolutionized so often, that nothing could enable us to keep pace with the variations of that idolizedameleon, La mode.

A woman's dress should be governed by precisely the same principles of harmony and contrast as an artist's picture; and however tastes may differ, there are certain points on which few, we trust, will disagree with us, in what we are about to write.

FIRSTLY.—Under all circumstances, even in the most hasty morning deshabille, the most scrupulous neatness should be preserved. There is no beauty but must suffer materially from hair carelessly arranged, a crumpled frill or collar, or an ill-fastened dress with perhaps an ungracefully-disposed shawl, and even—for there are such things, ladies—a slipshod shoe and soiled stocking.

It is an observation we have heard made and felt the truth of hundreds of times, that the materials, even the color of a dress, are matters of small moment compared to the way in which it is made, and what is technically called the fit. Never should an ill-fitting dress be worn, however great the trouble of alteration. It destroys the contour of the most perfect figure, and gives an appearance of slovenliness to a costume otherwise unexceptionable.

Either a dress should fit closely to the shape, or be sufficiently loose to form graceful and natural folds. In the artistic treatment of drapery, this is a received axiom. For example, a sleeve should either display the arm as nearly as possible in its natural form, or hang quite loosely, becoming broader towards the bottom, as is the case in all historical pictures and on the stage, where costume is especially studied. Any thing between the two is deficient both in grace and dignity, and must form awkward, ill-looking folds.

With regard to the bust, the present simple following of the matchless proportions of nature on the one hand, and the flowing Greek robe on the other, are the two extremes in which beauty meets. Anything intermediate which interferes with, without concealing, the former, is a sacrifice both of the beauty of nature and of art. Both the Greeks and the modern Parisians agree on one point, that of ample flowing drapery from the waist to the feet; and we trust that so absurd an opposition to every rule of art will never again be attempted as short or scanty skirts, which detract fearfully from the graceful dignity that a lady should always observe however well they may suit the peasantry of the continent, or the figurantes at the Opera.

Any projection from the shoulders, of the nature of the tippet, spencer, frill, or trimming of any kind, is very unadvisable, inasmuch as it is at the shoulders that the most beautiful and important undulation in the whole figure begins to fall, and any loose projecting trimmings, &c., by forming a sort of angle or interruption to the line of beauty, cannot fail to displease the eye of taste. In fact, no curve in the form ought ever to be broken or converted into an angle: and on this ground we decidedly object to the Elizabethan frills, whatever excuse may be found for the hoops, which, however, on the ground of mere convenience, are well done away with.

With regard to the feet, we have but one rule to lay down; never let boots or shoes, on any consideration whatever, be worn one shade smaller than comfort requires; otherwise corns, and other worse enemies of the foot, will revenge themselves for the wrong done to nature; and, moreover, the shape of the ankle is by no means improved.

The chaussure should be very carefully attended to; for this reason, that, being less seen, the feet are the more observed. A tight shoe, and one too much covering the instep, are to be shunned; the latter gives the appearance of large feet.

OF HARMONY OF COLOR IN DRESS.—The reader will have observed, that in our remarks on Costume we have avoided all allusion to color. The reason is, that color and form are distinct things, and do not in the slightest degree depend upon each other. Through inferior in importance to form, still it is well known how much may be done by the harmonious arrangement of the hues in a dress to the advantage of a lady's personal appearance. All violent contrasts, such as red and blue, ought to be avoided. Where any primary color is introduced, it ought to be put next to secondaries. For example, a pink bonnet should be followed by a lilac scarf, which might be followed by either a pink or blue dress, or one in which those colors predominate. But black and white harmonize with every color, and it is desirable to introduce them in equal proportion with colors, in order to subdue the brilliancy of the latter, and avoid any approach to gaudiness. White and black suit most complexions, and are generally considered the most becoming. Otherwise red should be the dominant color for brunettes, and blue for blondes. Pale blue and pink, with white stripes, or arabesques, are to be preferred. Green will suit almost every complexion, and harmonizes with most other colors. Blue or yellow, however, must never be placed by the side of green, unless in flowers, were the smallness of the masses of color, and the necessity of brilliant contrast, is appreciable. The same rule applies to jewelry, of which, with other matters, we shall treat of next

JEWELRY.—In the use of jewelry great care and taste are required; and we should advise our young lady friends to dispense with ornaments altogether. Indeed, we doubt not but ear-rings will one day be regarded with as much ridicule as are now the nose-rings of the savages. Till those days of pure taste and enlightenment arrive, it behoves us to use all our judgment in the selection of these ornaments, which are far more apt to detract from than add to beauty.

To brooches or pins, used either really or apparently to confine a dress, riband, or scarf, the above remarks scarcely apply. But in the choice of ear-rings, bracelets, or necklaces, worn obviously without any useful purpose beyond personal adornment, they are to be borne constantly in mind. The ear-rings should be light in appearance as well as weight, as they produce absolute deformity by dragging down the ear. The necklace or chain should be either of pearls, diamonds, or emeralds, in very plain settings. Pearls are specially adapted for fair complexions, as are also turquoises; sapphires, emeralds, or rubies, are more favourable to dark skins. A thin finely wrought gold chain may be worn by either. Ladies of refined taste really wear many jewels, well aware that gold and precious stones, while ineffectual to enhance beauty, only serve to make the contrary more painfully conspicuous.

EVE'S PUDDING.

If you like a good pudding, mind what you are taught:

First, take six eggs, when they are to be bought for a groat;

Next, take of the fruit which Eve once did cozen,
Well pared and well-chopped, at least half-a-dozen.
From six ounces of bread let Jane cut the crust,
And let it be crumbled as small as the dust.

Six ounces of currants from the stones you must sort,

Lest they break out your teeth and spoil all your sport;

Six ounces of sugar wont make it too sweet,
Then some salt and some nutmeg the whole will complete.

Mix well the whole, and your basin well butter,
Then boil it two hours without any flutter;
And now, if you wish to have a good treat,
Serve it up with some wine and melted butter made sweet.

CHIVALRY.—In the year 1369, John the Second, Duke de Bourbon, instituted an Order of Chivalry. One of the statutes of it is curious, and shows the high opinion he entertained of the influence of the female sex upon the virtue and happiness of mankind. According to this statute the knights were obliged to pay due respect to all ladies, both married and unmarried; and never to suffer anything derogatory to their reputation to be said in their presence; "for," adds the statute, "those who speak ill of women have very little honor, and (to their disgrace be it mentioned) say of that sex which cannot revenge itself what they would not dare say of a man; for from women—after God—arises a great part of the honor that there is in the world."

ON one occasion, as the anchorites around St. Anthony were communing together, there arose a question as to which of all the virtues was most necessary to perfection. One said, chastity; another, humility; a third, justice. St. Anthony remained silent until all had given their opinion, and then he spoke. "Ye have all said well, but none of you have said aright; the virtue most necessary to perfection is prudence; for the most virtuous actions of men, unless governed and directed by prudence, are neither pleasing to God, nor serviceable to others, nor profitable to themselves."

RELATIONS take the greatest liberties, and give the least assistance. If a stranger cannot help us with his purse, he will not insult us with his comments; but with relations it mostly happens, that they are the veriest misers with regard to their property, but perfect prodigals in the article of advice.

GAZETTE AND RULE.

Friendship, Love and Truth.

AUG. C. L. ARNOLD, EDITOR.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1849.

EDUCATION--THE UNIVERSITY OF THE I. O. O. F.

In the last number of the Gazette of the Union we adverted to the proposition of Grand S., J. L. RIDGELY, to establish a National University for the I. O. O. F., and we expressed a belief that such an institution, endowed as it could be by the Order, and founded on right principles would far surpass, in efficiency and usefulness, any school in the Union. In showing what the proposed university should be, we commented, with considerable severity, on the system of instruction now universal in our schools, and suggested a system entirely different. We wished to see a method of instruction adopted, which would accommodate itself to the various capacities and aptitudes of the pupils, stimulating their mental energies, and give them ideas as well as a parotial knowledge of words and sentences. In a word, we said that education should be practical.

To-day we proceed to say that education should be religious. We are aware that we are now treading on dangerous ground, and approach a delicate question; for there are many who suppose that education cannot be religious without being sectarian; and sectarianism is not possible in a school which is established for all sects. But it is a great error to say that religion and sectarianism necessarily go together. Religion is everlasting and absolute—it is reverence and humility before the awful ideas of Infinity and Eternity—a sense of subjection to the great Law of Justice, which stretches through the universe, and of obligation to love and serve man on earth, and God in heaven. The ideas of God, retribution, a future life—these great facts of religion are not the property of any one sect or party—they form the groundwork of all creeds. Religion, we have said, is everlasting, and we will also add, it is unchanging. It is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Sectarianism is but the material framework, changeable and perishable, which men, and bodies of men of different notions, and in different ages, have raised around it. This material and human investiture of sectarian dogmas, changes with the times and seasons, so that sectarians may appropriate to themselves the words of the old Roman poet:

"Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur ab illis."

Pure religion—that religion sent forth into the world with the awful sanction of the Christ upon it—which, as an ancient says, "is to visit the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions, and to keep one's self unspotted from the world," can exist, and be taught in all its ramifications, without sectarianism. Men and sects never dispute or quarrel about religion—they never did, and never will; but about their own private notions and interpretations of it. No! Religion shines over the human soul clear and bright, like the eternal stars, visible to all, and always and everywhere has her voice been heard, consoling the sorrowful, fortifying the weak, and bidding the sons of men to aspire to a celestial communion. Had Stephen Girard been less an infidel and more a philosopher, he would have comprehended this, and never have been guilty of the folly of establishing a school, where religion is prohibited by law, and its ministers treated with contempt. In our common colleges, religious instruction may not, indeed, be considered indispensable, as most of the pupils are generally surrounded by home or family influences, more or less religious, besides being connected with religious societies, where their religious instruction is partially, at least, provided for. But in the Girard school, and the proposed university of our Order, the orphan is cut off from all these influences. The university is his home, his family, his church. Any system of education for orphans, therefore, which does not regard their religious wants, is terribly defective.

Our age is material, and education also partakes of this character. The physical sciences receive more attention than the moral; the body is thought more of than the soul. In this respect we are far behind the ancients. With them all the sciences were revelations from heaven, were all holy. Art was holy, literature was holy; and these all were parts of one vast philosophy or religion which addressed itself to the entire of the human faculties. Instruction with them was religious and moral. And were they not right?

We all love to read of great virtue, great self-denial, great generosity, devoted love and friendship, patriotism and enthusiasm. Our admiration of such excellence is much more impassioned than that for great talents. The heart tells that they are more deserving of love than mere intellectual attainments. Now, it is precisely for such moral excellences that the great men and women of ancient times are held up to admiration, and the philosophers of the ancient world are particularly careful to give the moral, the precedence of the intellectual accomplishments. Indeed, with them the moral are intellectual excellences of the highest order. Virtue with them is intelligence—prudence, temperance, justice, moderation, are the heights of wisdom. He who could show these virtues in his life and conduct, was a great man; however small the amount of his physical knowledge. Physical knowledge occupies a small and an inferior place in ancient philosophy. Heart is everything.

The great men of antiquity, therefore, were heroes, because their philosophy taught heroism and religion. The man who could throw away wealth as he would throw away a burdensome load, was not likely to be influenced by wealth in his public or private conduct. He would not cringe to wealth for the sake of a share, he would not teach a falsehood or conceal a truth for a fee, or the hope of a pecuniary reward; and as their philosophy was not physical philosophy, but moral and religious, it taught them to look beyond the confines of this mortal scene, and hope for the reward of their virtues in another life. To die struggling with evil was glorious, a fall even worthy of envy—the beginning of a new life of unalloyed happiness. This faith was the apex of philosophical instruction. It completed the character of a great man. But it was always the strongest in the primitive and simple times. Luxury weakened it—physical science mystified and shrouded, and at last extinguished it. The times of heroism are the times of faith. It matters not about the character of the faith, so be that it is faith—strong, young, healthy and vigorous faith. This makes the hero and the great man; and even now, whenever a hero appears amid the clouds of society, he is still a man of this description, and seldom remarkable for physical science. Ancient philosophy was religious—modern philosophy is merely a science.

Physical science lowers the tone of the moral attributes of man. We will not go so far as to say that it demoralizes man necessarily, for no truth whatever can with justice be reproached for this. But studied by itself alone, without relation to a higher sphere of thought, we have no hesitation in saying that it is by no means calculated to elevate the character of man. Physical philosophers, therefore, do not ascend to the heroic sphere. They do not occupy the intellectual apex. They do not mount so high as Confucius, Socrates, Plato, Seneca, and Epictetus, of the Pagan, or as Paul, Peter, and John of the Christian school. Let them praise and exalt this natural science as they may, let them expend all their poetry and all their eloquence in eulogising it, still the human heart can never admit that the highest scientific attainments are equal to the highest moral attainments. A physical philosopher may be a bad man, he may be a drunkard, a coarse and profane swearer, a liar, a swindler—but a moral and religious philosopher cannot. The excellence of the one consists in knowing facts about stones, earth, plants, animals, chemical agencies, and the laws of matter and motion, and vice can learn all this as well as virtue. The excellence of the other consists in knowing how to govern the passions, in exemplifying the virtues and the graces, and exhibiting the fruits of wisdom. The latter will ever excel the former, as spirit excels the body, as mind excels matter.

Such is our view of education; briefly expressed, it is true, but also, we believe, plainly. In a future number we may revert to the subject, and offer a more detailed exposition of it.

CEMETERIES.

THE project of establishing an Odd-Fellow's Cemetery in the vicinity of New York, has, for the last few years, been discussed in almost every lodge in the city.

Calls have been made and meetings held for the purpose of effecting this praiseworthy object; but in consequence of the great expense in procuring suitable grounds, little or nothing has been accomplished, excepting the purchasing of "burial plots" in Greenwood, by a few of the Brooklyn Lodges. All acquainted with the wants as well as the objects of our Order, felt convinced that this, and all other obstacles must be overcome, and a Cemetery, worthy of our high standing as a Philanthropic Institution, established. The necessity of providing a suitable and exclusive place of interment for our departed brothers and their families, has been so clearly set forth, both in the arguments of its advocates, and in circulars issued to the different Lodges, that a reiteration at this time is needless. The object of this communication is to inform the numerous readers of your useful and widely-extended journal, of the late, and it is believed effective action had in this matter, by a large number of the Lodges of this city and Brooklyn.

A circular, signed by the Grand Master of our State, and several other influential men of our Order, requesting the Lodges of this city and vicinity, to appoint each a committee of three, to meet in convention, at the Grand Lodge Room, Canal street, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 28th, for the purpose of taking, immediately, the preliminary steps of establishing an Odd-Fellow's Cemetery, was read in said Lodges, during the last week. To this call the Lodges, generally, gave a hearty and prompt response; and on the evening designated, there was a large and respectable attendance of the members, at the G. Lodge Room, all anxious to coöperate with the signers of the call, in so desirable an undertaking. The Convention was called to order by P. G. WEEKS, of Mercantile Lodge, who nominated P. G. SKINNER, of Magnolia Lodge, as Chairman. The nomination being confirmed, P. G. SKINNER took the chair. On motion, P. G. WEEKS was appointed Secretary, who by the request of the Chairman, read the call of the meeting. The call being approved, the Chairman briefly addressed the meeting—showing the necessity of immediate action in the matter. At the close of his remarks, the chairman introduced to the convention, Brother C. EDWARDS LESTER, who is likewise a Trustee of Cypress Hills Cemetery. Brother LESTER made a short, but eloquent address—convincing all who heard him, of the indispensable duty of Odd-Fellows to procure a suitable place as the repository for their dead—the enclosing of the same with an emblematical railing, and erecting thereon a monument, that should tell the world that our brothers, though out of sight, were not forgotten. At the conclusion of Brother LESTER's address, several brothers present suggested the names of different Cemeteries in this neighborhood, they all being anxious to accommodate the Order.

The following resolution, offered by Brother W. D. Kennedy, was then adopted:

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to make the necessary inquiries of the managers or directors of the several Cemeteries in this vicinity, as to the price of burial lots, and ascertain on what terms associated bodies can obtain them; also to ascertain the practicability of purchasing a suitable tract of land for an Odd-Fellow's Cemetery.

The Committee, as authorized by the above resolution, being appointed, on motion, the Convention adjourned until Wednesday evening, the 14th inst., when they will meet again, at the same place, to hear the report of the Committee. It is hoped that the members will be punctual in their attendance at that time; and those Lodges which have not yet appointed delegates, will do so at their next meeting; for on so important a subject it is desirable to have a full representation.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN ALABAMA.

MOBILE, Ala., Feb. 18, 1849.

OUR Order is as flourishing here as could be expected, and is steadily and rapidly increasing through the State. About ten years ago it was first planted here, but those into whose hands it fell, not being over zealous in the cause, it lingered on until 1843, at which time there were three Lodges and the Grand Lodge, numbering some one hundred members. In the fall of 1843, that High Priest of Odd-Fellowship, (as well as religion,) Rev. I. D. Williamson, came among us, and "he spake as one having authority." A new spirit was infused into the Order; the luke-warm became ardent supporters, and the consequences have been as might be expected. It is now one of the most numerous, as well as respectable, institutions in the State, numbering about 1200, and possessing sufficient funds for the needy or the widow and orphan. With such men as Jennings, Snow, Chapman, Solomon, Porter, Shortridge, Silsby, Williams, and a host of others, no institution can recede—it must of necessity "go ahead."

There are no places in the Union where there is so much money paid out for the needy, as at Mobile and New Orleans. They are both at the little end of the funnel, where all travelers are bound to pass, and if sick or in distress they must be relieved; and sometimes we have paid large amounts, which have not been refunded by Lodges, on the strength of whose cards it has been paid. Northern Lodges do not for a moment think that our expenses here are at least double theirs, and when they pay from $3 to $5 per week benefits, we pay $10. Our Lodges don't complain, although they think it hard that their money should be spent for that which others, in honor, ought to pay. I may, at a future time, refer to this subject again.

Yours, in F., L. & T., ALPHA.

INSTITUTION OF A NEW LODGE.

MIDDLEPORT, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1849.

D. D. G. M. P. L. Ely, of Niagara District, assisted by D. D. G. M. J. W. Otto, of Orleans District, and P. Gs. O. C. Wright, W. Russ, W. Mack, S. M. Burroughs and S. M. Spencer, assembled in the new Lodge Room, and organized and summoned the charter members, and duly instituted Algonac Lodge No. 861, I. O. O. F. A large number of visiting brothers were in attendance, from neighboring Lodges, who were present during the ceremonies usual on such occasions.

The following officers were duly elected and installed in their respective stations, for the present term—viz: C. Craig, N. G.; W. S. Fenn, V. G.; G. L. Spalding, Jr., S.; A. Kittredge, T. Eight brothers were admitted by card, and five applicants for membership were elected. This Lodge starts with very good prospects, although it is located in the midst of quite a number of rabid anties, whose opposition we shall endeavor to appease by a straight-forward course of conduct, such as becomes true Odd-Fellows.

Respectfully yours, in F., L. & T., C.

A SHORT LETTER.

PHILADELPHIA, March 5, 1849.

BRO. ARNOLD: What have you new in Gotham? Anything? If you have, distribute the contents of your letter bag, and send a fair proportion to the city of Penn; for, indeed, we are absolutely dying for want of something to stimulate our mental in'ards. The newsmongers, the politicians, the office-seekers and the reporters have all gone to Washington, to witness the inauguration, and secure little "odds and ends" for themselves, so that we have nothing left to console ourselves with, but a few items of scandal about police officers, small burglaries, &c. Why, we can't get up a "horrible murder" case, as you can, to sell our papers, or please the people. Cruel world, this. Well, no matter, after the inauguration is over, and the politicians, office-seekers and pick-pockets return to their usual avocations, we can give you something fresh.

How is the weather with you? Sloppy, or anything? What of your streets? Muddy, slushy, swashy, dashy, splashy? Yes, we know it is so. Now, don't say a word about it. It is so here, and the city of Penn can't be better off than York. Spring came to us a few days since, with a real warm, sun-shiny face. She stayed with us for an hour or so, chatting about green leaves and flowers, and all that sort of thing, until every one became pleased—with themselves, and the beautiful world her first appearance so beautifully pictured. But she had a "row," a la Hyer and Sullivan, with Old Boreas, and out of sheer spite, perhaps, this young jade, Spring, commenced pelting the poor devils of this terrene sphere with snow balls; and she did it to perfection, I can assure you.

I wish you had been here on Friday evening last. We had, or rather Lady Washington Association No. 2, of the "Independent Order of Philozatheans" (all ladies, you know,) had a festival—and it was a festival, indeed. They celebrated their first anniversary. Several hundred feminines were present on the occasion, and a small sprinkling of the "sterner sex." The ladies were all beautiful; they were well dressed, and, as ladies always are, were modest in their demeanor, and courteous to their guests. They had delightful singing by a good choir, and an address from Mr. John Perry. The whole affair went off with decided eclat. Bro. Arnold, you should have been there—you, who are so well prepared to address an assemblage of this kind, to instruct and to amuse—you should have been there, to talk awhile to that beautiful group. It would have gratified you, and I know it would have been a matter of sincere delight to your numerous friends in Philadelphia. Never mind, we'll have another in April, and if there be any virtuous Rail-roads and steam, you must be here.

I write in haste, but I am as ever,

P.

MRS. FANNY KEMBLE BUTLER.

THIS lady commenced her readings of Shakspeare at the Stuyvesant Institute on Saturday evening last. She had a crowded audience to greet her, and a highly intellectual one. She came associated with the Kemble name, a proud one in dramatic annals, and also with her own brilliant displays of genius and histrionic powers, when in her early days she burst upon us on the stage. She brought with her great tact, experience, judgment and research—a powerful mind, a refined and highly cultivated taste, and a rich imagination. All her features are expressive, and her eye beyond all. It is not unlike that of the elder Kean. Her voice is powerful, flexible, and at times very musical. It is sustained in its higher notes, and her deep, guttural tones are solemn and impressive. Her style is at times lofty and impassioned, yet not extravagant. In her scenes of pathos she is thrilling in effect, and unsurpassed in depicting mental agony and profound emotion. She gives a warm and lifelike glow to the author's pictures of life. We see them vividly embodied. They are creatures of impulse, actuated by hopes, and aims and ambitions, like living men around us—full of passion, sensibilities, weaknesses and crime.

The scenes in her hands seem naturally wrought up, and the characters impressed with the stamp of reality and truth. We were familiar with Macbeth. We had conned over and over again every passage and word of the play. We had seen it portrayed by the greatest actors of the age. We had beheld Mrs. Butler herself enact that part in which her aunt was unrivaled before her. All was familiar as a tale, not twice, but a thousand times told; and yet we were delighted with the reading. It was full of freshness—there was a depth and a glow about it—there was a vivid reality in its scenes—there was a new force and beauty in its language. It was full of point, and pathos and dignity throughout.

We could have listened an hour longer to tones so powerful and sweet. It is indeed a delightful treat to hear such a play so well and feelingly read. There was voice, look and action, a just conception, soul, taste and nice discrimination, brought to the reading of one of the sublimest intellectual efforts of the immortal bard. And each was the best of its kind. No wonder the audience were absorbed—no wonder a death-like stillness was there, save when interrupted by an occasional burst of applause, loud and irresistible. It was an exhibition in which were displayed the highest dramatic powers, and in a mode new and exciting; divested of the illusions and accessories of the stage, but full of interest and intellectual charms.

D. D. GRAND MASTERS.—In the list of D. D. G. Masters appended to the Grand Master's Report, published last week, there were two important omissions, which we now supply:

AMARANTHUS LODGE No. 852.—Rev. Bro. B. B. HALLECK will deliver a lecture on Odd-Fellowship, before this Lodge, on Monday evening next, at 8 o'clock, at 327 Bowery. Brethren of the Order are invited to attend.

LETTER FROM G. F. SECCHI DE CASALI.

A WINTER EXCURSION.

FRANKLIN HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 26, 1849.

DEAR EDITOR: If a friend of yours should be in want of being relieved from a state of coma, without practical Mesmerism, advise him to travel during the winter season, and then he is sure to realize all the enjoyments of human life over the pleasure of being frozen to death before the end of his journey. In one of the past mornings of this delightful month, when the thermometer had fallen below zero, while sitting near a good fire, and was smoking out, with a cigar, the Pope's threats of excommunication, a telegraphic dispatch from Delaware carried me unexpectedly from my comfortable room to the steamboat of the South Amboy line. Like the Wandering Jew traveling over the eternal snows of Siberia, wrapped in some wintry rags, I began my march to the boat; but not a nose out of doors!—all were masked with enormous red scarfs, as if they were ashamed to show to the public their beautiful red nostrils. At noon we left New-York with a large number of passengers, and, being a stranger to all on board, I retired to the deck, desirous to be alone with my thoughts. What rude scenery around me!—the country desolate, and covered with its white snowy mantle—the bay barricaded in every way by immense blocks of ice floating from side to side—over me a dark sky, threatening to send down all its stormy elements; and, above all, I had to accomplish, before midnight, an excursion of one hundred and fifty miles! While I was profoundly meditating all this, behold! here two strange individuals come to disturb my peaceful solitude, by inquiring of me about the environs of New-York, and of our journey to South Amboy. That I should not have any bad idea of them, they informed me at once that they were husband and wife, natives of Jersey, and married in the same State. Since twenty years of connubial life, they had never had the courage to go out, even for a day, from their sandy State; but, having heard so much in their village of "Mose in California" at the Chatham theater, and of the "Quaker Giant and Giantess" at Barnum's Museum, they decided to see the elephant, and left the village and congregation, without even asking permission from the rector of their parish! What a scandal for our age!

Mr. Picktooth, my new acquaintance—

"He was a cold, good, honorable man, Proud of his birth, and proud of everything," even of his State and of his wife, who had already run a race of two-quarters of a century. Mrs. Picktooth was proud only of herself, and of the score of petticoats around her person; but, not being a Coroner myself, I must not attempt an ante mortem examination, and, for modesty's sake, I shall say only that her head was covered with a kind of black wool-hair like the negro-slaves I saw in Alexandria, in Egypt, and her ears were stored with such a quantity of cotton, that I thought it proper to advise her not to approach the pipe of the boat, because the cotton would explode and blow out her delicate brains!

"I thank ye, Mister," answered Mrs. Picktooth. "I dare say that it would catch fire. I have had this cotton in my ears for six months—it is Jersey cotton;" and turning to her husband, "I told you, Mr. Picktooth, that we should have hard times sailing on the ocean!"

"Yes, wife," answered the husband, "we have never been so far and so long away from our village since the days of our honeymoon, when we went to Trenton; but we had to see the world, and at last we sail on the wide waters, and go to visit 'New-York as it is.' I hope we shall have something new to tell in our village. What knowledge I have already acquired the three days we have been out of our Jersey State!"

"Dear me!" answered Madam Picktooth, "you would become another Salmon, as you are a deacon."

I reckon that you would learn to preach in a short time. I wished we should be again at the National to hear the Rev. Mr. Chanfrau, alias Father Moses. What eloquence and elegance of style in his eulogies and speeches! Yet I dislike, in that congregation, the society of these dirty urchins who sell newspapers. They tortured me last night for an hour, throwing into my face peanuts and corn, and calling me an old hen—the wife of a deacon—of a farmer! A Jersey lady to be called an old chicken! I dare say, if they should come to our village, I would lick those little rogues."

Seeing Mrs. Picktooth almost out of patience, and fearing she would lose her senses, I changed the tone of conversation, and made some inquiries about their native State. Mr. Picktooth informed me of the immense richness of that country:

"There," said he, "we have roses in the winter season, like they do in Italy; we have mines of all kinds of minerals, even gold! My son, who is a physician, discovered the other day a gold mine near the house of our clergyman, and has carried home plenty of gold dust!"

If this is true, that New-Jersey has an El Dorado river, I hope they will employ some of their dust to improve agriculture, industry, and, above all, public education. By the last message of the Governor, I saw that nearly half of the population of New-Jersey receive no instruction!

We were near Staten Island, and Mrs. Picktooth desired to know what it was?

"Staten Island, Madam, where there is a quarantine."

"I dare say!" replied the rather-astonished Jersey lady. "The more I stay away from home the more I learn of new things and names. My patience! I reckon I have never heard of that place before. Did you, husband?"

"No," answered the gentle-man, "but I guess that an island must be surrounded by water. Is it not so, Mister?"

"Yes, sir; you are perfectly right in your observations. Did you learn that at the Chatham Academy, from Professor Chanfrau?"

"Moses spoke last night of a gold island and of a gold river in California, and I believe I heard it from him for the first time."

"Mister," inquired Mrs. Picktooth of me, "is there any danger from the sea-serpent?"

"No, Madam! The big sea-serpent of 1848 has passed from the ocean near Rome into the Tiber, and with its big tale has overthrown Pius IX; and his son, the little sea-serpent found near Liverpool, died at the London hospital a month since."

"And what do you think of Jersey pirates?"

"We have nothing to fear from them, as we don't go so far as Barnegat. We turn round and pass between Staten Island and the Deserts of Jersey. In less than an hour we will be at South Amboy."

"Excuse me, Mister," continued Mrs. Picktooth, "as you are so patient and kind, would you inform me if that is Cape Horn," pointing to the lighthouse at Sandy-Hook, "we read so much about in the papers?"

"No, Madam!—it is not the Horn, but the lighthouse at Sandy Hook, where are the plantations of Professor Chanfrau of the Chatham."

"Dear me!—what a great man is that Mr. Moses! I wondered we had to go as far as his plantation. I feel already tired of the sea, and also some sensation which I have not felt for some years, thanks to Heaven!"

At the same moment that Mrs. Picktooth felt so many things, a colored servant rung a bell, and making more noise with his infernal voice, invited all people to dinner. Before sitting down at table, I wished to see the doings of my new acquaintances, and heard Mr. Picktooth asking the servant if every one could go to dinner?

"Yes, Massa, ye can go, I dare say!"

Mr. and Mrs. T. went down, and were rather surprised at the urbanity and politeness of the Captain, as well as of the waiters, and began to swallow anything around them. Certainly I never saw such destruction at any dinner.

"I dare say, husband, that traveling we find very generous people; even Bishop Doane has not such a dinner as this. I must say that I have never sat at a table like this in Jersey. Husband, will you have a meal stake?"

The clerk of the boat began his usual turn till he came to Mr. Picktooth, and he was just devouring a miserable chicken, when he was asked for his ticket.

"What do you mean?" inquired Mr. Picktooth, rather surprised. "Here is the railroad ticket for me and the woman."

"Not that, sir," answered the clerk, in a very peaceful manner; "I mean the dinner ticket, or one dollar for both."

"Oh Job! you had two friends: one's quite enough, Especially when we are ill at ease."

Mr. Picktooth, who never expected such an exaction, felt bitterly the summons of the clerk, for he believed that he had been invited by the dorky. He could not swallow the pill of one dollar.

"I reckon," said he to the clerk, "if you should come to our village, they would not charge you more than twenty-five cents, and we farmers never charge any thing when we invite some friend to dinner. Only think, wife!—one dollar for a dinner! It will take me twenty years before I leave the State again!"

The sea became more rough, and Mrs. Picktooth feeling a little headache, went on the deck, but, in spite of the fresh air, she felt so much sea-sickness, that she was obliged to lighten her body, like a Captain attempting to save his vessel in a storm, by throwing overboard a part of the cargo.

Mr. Picktooth did not seem to regret his wife's illness so much as the half-dollar spent for the dinner.

"There!" said he; "a bushel of corn thrown away! It is like throwing pearls before New-York Aldermen! I hope you will eat no more on any boat!"

But having reached the point of our destination, I left Mr. and Mrs. Picktooth to take care of themselves, and passed into the cars, glad to have missed their interesting company. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

AT US AGAIN—THE OFFICIAL ORGAN.

BRO. COCHRANE, of the Odd-Fellow, cannot reconcile himself to the idea that we have placed the Gazette of the Union under the charge of the M. W. Grand Master of the State of New York, and of the M. W. Grand Sire of the United States, thus making it the official organ. We have done this from a sense of duty. Having confidence in the common sense of Odd-Fellows, as expressed by their representatives, in the Grand Lodge of the United States, we endeavor to follow it; and our Journal, therefore, will ever, so long as we conduct its speech, speak in harmony with its decisions.

As for the article in "The Symbol," to which Bro. Cochrane refers, we have not seen it, nor have we seen the "Symbol" but once for nearly two months. How is this, Brother Jordan?

THE THIRTIETH CONGRESS closed its existence on Sunday morning last, the 4th inst., at 7 o'clock, after having been in session all night, transacting an immense amount of business, in the usual hurried manner, during the last few hours. Among the important bills passed was one for organizing a new Executive Department, called the Home Department, the head of which is to be called the Secretary of the Interior. The Department is to include the Bureau of Pensions, Indian Affairs, and Patent Office. Bills were also passed for minting Double Eagles and Gold Dollars. The bill for establishing a mint in New York, where one is so much needed, was defeated by the objection of a Pennsylvania Senator.

A GLANCE AT EUROPE.

THE "flying" steamship Europa has arrived at our port in less than fourteen days. The political news of the Old World is of great interest. It seems that royalty is more in danger at the present time than it was a few months past. Kings, queens and ministers make patriotic and flattering speeches; they declare themselves in favor of the people, and ready to defend their rights; they show the good they have performed, and conceal the evil they have caused to their fellow subjects. In one word, they try to lengthen their royal or ministerial career, blinding nations with California dust or gun-powder; but those times have passed in which rulers could successfully resort to these infamous means. The terrible sea-serpent of 1848 has appeared, and God knows when it will end its revolutionary tour.

A year ago the Sicilians rose against their bloody tyrant, and the Parisians dismissed Louis Philippe, the Napoleon of peace, the Lombards fought with the Austrians, Venice proclaimed herself a Republic, the Prussians obtained a Democratic Constitution and a National Assembly; while the stupid Emperor of Austria was obliged to abdicate in favor of a young royal snake, because the imperial crown was too heavy for his Christian majesty. Metternich, leaving Vienna for the land of exile, was sorry that he had not been able, in his long political life, to find out a secret how to annihilate printing, telegraphs and the progress of liberal ideas! and the present Pope is almost out of patience at the ridicule and contempt expressed by the Romans against his bull of excommunication.

ENGLAND

Was favored with a speech, read by Mrs. Victoria, before Bishops, Peers, and a fair bevy of Peeresses. The royal lady addressed herself to the dignitaries of the kingdom—to lords and gentlemen. The people were forgotten in that famous composition—not a word for the canaille. The Queen has troubles enough with her children and husband, without losing her precious time with common individuals.

In Manchester there was a splendid banquet, given by the friends of Free Trade, on the 1st of February, the day when expired the last shred of protective duties on foreign corn. The number of guests admitted by ticket was 2,981—700 of them ladies. Among the many notable persons who assisted at this beautiful festival, was the philanthropist, Mr. Cobden, who spoke with his usual energy, though less than his usual novelty. The toast offered by this eminent man was, "Free Trade and peace, as the best guarantees of popular rights; the best promoters of national industry, and the most effectual means for the reduction of national burdens."

Among the personages named by Queen Victoria as ambassadors to foreign countries, we find the brother of the novelist, Bulwer, who intrigued so much in Spain, and now is coming as charge d'affaires to the United States.

The cholera in England continues its ravages much the same. The total number of cases which have occurred from the first appearance of the disease, now amounts to 11,147, of which 4,939 have died, 3,053 have recovered, and 3,199 are under treatment.

IRELAND

Has not been visited by the cholera to any extent, with the exception of Belfast, where the disorder is already on the decline. The writs of error to the House of Lords, in the cases of Smith O'Brien, McManus and O'Donohoe, have been issued from the writ office of the Court of Chancery. As to Mr. Meagher, he has taken no steps for an appeal, and his own means being exhausted, he refuses all pecuniary aid from his friends, who are most anxious to afford him every facility that money can procure, for taking the step. Gavan Duffy asked to be discharged on bail, but he was refused. The treatment of this patriotic Irishman has been barbarous and inhuman. Not only has his health been greatly impaired by confinement, but his property, which at the time it passed into the hands of his trustees, was assessed at £10,000, could now be made to realize only £2000. His paper, one of the most flourishing journals in Ireland, necessarily involving large business transactions, was immediately shut up—himself imprisoned, and all communication with his trustees denied. What a blessing for an editor or a political man to live under the sway of a royal ruler!

FRANCE

Has been on the eve of another bloody revolution, between the troops and the Socialists, united with the Garde Mobile. In our last "Glance at Europe" we predicted a collision between the red republicans and the ministry, which is formed of republicans of la veille, men who served under Charles X and Louis Philippe, and now think better to play the part of liberal men. The question of the dissolution of the National Assembly will cause great trouble to France, and to the President himself. The people are not excited against Louis Napoleon, but against his ministers, and desire a change in this office. The poor class of people in France are not better situated than in England or Ireland. Having passed under so many different forms of government, their situation has never been ameliorated. Thus the true cause of all their popular movements is originated more from misery than for the desire of a new government. The new French President, if he wishes to keep his Napoleonic head on his shoulders, must improve the condition of the poor people, and procure them buildings for public works, under the system of the noble Louis le Blanc.

The ministers, having discovered that a plot of conspiracy existed between the Garde Mobile and the red republicans, took the necessary measures to prevent bloodshed, and 80,000 men were ordered to march in the streets of Paris, while many thousands surrounded the palace of the National Assembly, to oppose the people, should they attempt to invade that national body. The President appeared in public, dressed in the uniform of a Colonel of the National Guard, and was received with applause by the people. We hope that Louis Napoleon, who, while a prisoner at Ham, wrote a work for ameliorating the state of the people, will now do something for those who elected him to such a high dignity, and will put in action his beautiful theory.

ITALY

Has quite forgotten that a Pope exists. Pius IX is in oblivion, and his bull of excommunication has banished his memory from the hearts of all his admirers and friends. Austria dares not interfere in re-establishing him on the Pontifical throne, and the King of Naples, who has just had a narrow escape from drowning, from a collision at sea, is not very anxious to march his troops in the Roman States, while there is danger of a revolution breaking out in the kingdoms of Naples and Calabria. Thus Pius IX remains at Gaeta, and we beg Almighty God to keep him there until Italy has reconquered her freedom and independence. The Spanish and Portuguese intervention will end in smoke, and we believe that such a war will never occur between two poor and destitute nations as Spain and Portugal.

Charles Albert, the King of Sardinia, opened the second session of the Chambers of Piedmont with a most eloquent and patriotic speech, concerning the last war with Austria, and expressed a desire to meet the Austrians again. His army, ready for the field of battle, consists of 190,000 men, beside the National Guard. His navy is superior to that of any Italian power, even of Austria. He has promised the Deputies and the nation that he will resume hostilities with the enemies of Italian independence after the decision of the Congress of Douxelles, on the 8d of March.

In Rome, Prince Canino, and all the present ministry have been returned members of the new Constituent Assembly, whose election by the unanimous vote of the people casts an everlasting banishment on Pius IX. and of any future Pope from the throne of Rome. The protests which Pius has addressed to the European powers, complaining of his dethronement, though certainly he ran away from his temporal throne, seem to produce no effect at all. It is nobody's especial business to interfere, and the business will be transacted accordingly.

AUSTRIA AND GERMANY

Have decided to leave aside the question of electing an Emperor for the German Empire. The Austrian has trouble enough with his own subjects, and with the long and cruel war with Hungary, without aspiring to the supremacy of the German powers. Prussia has stated that Frederic is not willing to become more than he is. "Better be a popular King," said he, "than an Emperor hated by his nation." We fear that his royal person is not so popular among his subjects as he believes; and a proof of our assertion is the continued siege of Berlin by His Majesty's troops. The new Emperor of Austria has invited his beloved subjects of Lombardy to send Deputies to the Austrian Assembly; but the Lombards have refused—they won't have any communication nor take any interest in the affairs of their most hateful enemies.

DENMARK

Waits the spring to continue war against Germany, for the Sleivigh Holstein question. Russia seems disposed to help this power, in order to weaken and divide the German unity.

SPAIN.

The news received from this half barbarous country is as bloody as ever. Another battle has been fought between the Carlists and the royal troops in Catalonia, in the neighborhood of Vich, between Generals Concha and Cabrera, at the head of all the Carlist forces in the province. The latter had been completely beaten and dispersed, after an obstinate battle. General Narvaez, the prime minister, fought a duel with Senor Sagasti, after a stormy debate in the Senate. The nation is sorry that the General was not killed.

CONSTANTINOPLE

Has been visited by Abbas Pacha, of Egypt, who arrived on the 10th of January, and had an interview with the Sultan. He was invested by his sovereign with the vice-royalty of Egypt. The Emperor has grown in popularity among his subjects, and generally with the Christians, who are disposed to sacrifice their lives for the defense and dignity of the throne and the independence of the Empire.

GREECE

Has lost one of her talented children, Mr. Colocotroni, who was Minister of Foreign Affairs, and only thirty-eight years of age.

Thus ends our "Glance at Europe," and the account of what has transpired in Europe since the arrival of the steamship Niagara.

Literary Notices.

✂ "RAPHAEL; OR, THE BOOK OF LIFE AT TWENTY." By Alphonse Lamartine. New-York: 1849.—This is one of the most eloquent of the effusions of its highly-gifted author. It is full of glowing and impassioned feeling, and its impulses spring from a soul that feels profoundly, and is imbued with elevated thoughts and high poetical tendencies. It has a strong original cast, and occasionally great power, and the interest is maintained throughout.

✂ "BENJAMIN FRANKLIN: HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHY." Parts 1, 2, 3, 4. New-York: Harper & Brothers. 1849.—We have received four parts of this splendid work. No other edition is so beautifully embellished. The numerous designs by Chapman are admirable, and the book is replete with great and useful lessons to mankind. We hail the future numbers with great satisfaction.

✂ "HISTORY OF KING CHARLES THE FIRST." "HISTORY OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT." "HISTORY OF HANNIBAL." By Jacob Abbott. New-York: Harper & Brothers.—These compose a part of a series of Histories written chiefly for the use of American Youth, but also for maturer minds, and adapted to "the position, the ideas, and intellectual wants" of an extensive class in our country, who have come within the range of our author's observation. They are written in a clear and concise style, and embody the most interesting and striking historical facts of the periods of which they treat. They have a rich title-page, and some wood engravings of a high order of merit.

✂ JUST IN TIME.—We have received Judge Thornton's "OREGON AND CALIFORNIA IN 1848," 2 vols., from Harper & Brothers. This is interesting and reliable information of what the author experienced during his journey, and while residing in those places. Almost every one being now deeply interested in regions abounding with gold, will eagerly peruse these volumes, which, at any time, would be found exceedingly interesting, but doubly so at this important period. The engravings and map accompanying the work will be found very useful.

✂ "ROLAND CASHEL." By Charles Lever. Part 1. New-York: Harper & Brothers. 1849.—This is a spirited and amusing book, and abounds in characters and scenes full of raciness and a rich humor, in the usual characteristic vein of the author. It will well repay in enjoyment the hour spent in its perusal.

✂ "LANETON PARSONAGE." Third Part. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1849. This is a continuation of a series of novels, under this name, by Miss Sewall, which have been favorably commented on by us. In the work before us there is the same deep interest, the same high moral tendency, the same graphic delineation of the scenes of life. The characters, before introduced to our acquaintances, have become matured; and in none of her charming narrations has she shown a greater knowledge of the human heart, more admirable descriptive powers, and religious thoughts and sentiments, so happily blended with the daily intercourse of life.

✂ "THE SACRED POETS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA." Edited by Rufus W. Griswold. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1849. There is no desideratum in our poetical literature, as a work of this kind. The religious poetry of the best English writers, as well as of our own, is little known among us. The editor of this volume has rearranged and combined the gems of the British sacred poets from their standard works, and made large and valuable additions to these by selections from the best poetical writers, on sacred subjects, in our own country. Writings like these elevate the mind and refine the taste, deepen the religious sentiments, stimulate devotion in the soul, and by their reflections on its responsibilities, its great moral aims in this life, and its high destinies, in that which is to come, are rendered of great importance to mankind. It is beautifully got up, and illustrated with steel engravings.

✂ "WHAT I SAW IN CALIFORNIA." By Edwin Bryant. "THE CALIFORNIA GUIDE BOOK." By Capt. Fremont. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1849. A great mass of geographical and statistical information is afforded in these volumes—the first containing a clever, spirited, graphic account of a tour by the south pass of the Rocky Mountains across the continent of North America, the great desert basin and through California, showing the capabilities, scenery and population of that country; and the manners, customs, and pursuits of the people. The latter is a scientific and elaborate treatise of the climate, productions of the soil, mineral resources and general features of an extensive tract of country, written by Major Emory and Captain

Fremont, respectively, during an overland journey to California, and while engaged in the exploring expedition. They will be found to be of great interest.

✂ "A CATECHISM OF THE STEAM ENGINE." By John Bourne. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1849. This is a practical treatise, intended for common use, and to explain in a plain and concise, but detailed manner, the scientific principles on which the operation of the steam engine depends, in its various applications, and showing also all the modern improvement in its structure. It is a sound, scientific and useful treatise on this most interesting subject.

Theatricals and Amusements.

At the BROADWAY the stock company are playing in the usual varieties. The gymnastic performances of the Martinette family are wonderful and striking, and have proved very attractive.

At the BOWERY, Tom and Jerry, the well known and amusing extravaganza, is played nightly, to crowded houses. Tom Hyer, the victor in the fight with Sullivan, and the two seconds, enact the principle roles. The whole is played with great spirit.

At the NATIONAL, Mose in California, a new piece by Chanfrau, has made a decided hit. Chanfrau is there at home, and Chapman plays a comic character, Mr. Adolphus Pillishroud, admirably.

At BURTON's the usual succession of clever extravaganzas and pointed satires are the prevailing attractions of the day.

MISS FANNY BUTLER commenced her dramatic reading on Saturday evening, with Macbeth. They are full of interest, and will be as successful here as at Boston.

SIGNOR BARILLE.—This accomplished composer and pianist gives a grand concert, aided by fifty performers, at the Tabernacle, on Thursday evening of this week, Le Desart being the music selected for the occasion. It will present a fine display of delightful melodies and scientific execution.

THE ITALIAN OPERA.—The first season is about closing. It has been, on the whole, much better supported than during the past winter. There have been some difficulties encountered by the manager, but he has surmounted them, and has shown decided firmness, judgement and ability. Yet such are the heavy expenses attending this refined and charming entertainment, that it is well known that the season has resulted in loss, and nothing but an advance in the price of seats, and an increased patronage during the ensuing season, can sustain it among us. We hope this support will be given. The new artists are said to possess talents of a high order. The baritone was said to be one of the best in Europe, and the tenor and prima donna enjoyed a very high reputation abroad. They were most favorably received on Friday evening last. The prima donna is a striking looking person, with a fine form, and expressive features: she is very young, and plays in a warm, impassioned style. Her voice is a high soprano, and is brilliant in effects. The tenor has a sweet voice of no great compass, and the bass was respectable; but the baritone in expression, volume, sustained power, and execution, and perfect good taste, has never been equaled or surpassed among us. The house was crowded; it was for the benefit of the director.

There are in the United States, among the Post-Office towns—12 Albanys, 12 Bostons, 18 Bristols, 8 Brightons, 16 Cambridges, 24 Chesters, 20 Camdens, 14 Canaans, 22 Dovers, 6 Dublins, 8 Durhams, 9 Exeters, 18 Fairfields, 12 Goshens, 7 Leeds, 8 Lincolns, 9 Newports, 28 Lebanons, 11 Lancasters, 20 Manchesters, 12 Londons, (but not quite so large,) 16 Rochesters, 19 Oxfords, 15 Plymouths, 28 Richmonds, 40 Salems, 17 Windsors, and 16 Yorks.

Varities.

AN EMIGRATION MARRIAGE.—A Devenport correspondent sends us the following:

A young woman, aged twenty-two, a servant, being taking ill of typhus, was removed to the workhouse at Devenport, where, by attention, she soon recovered. After her restoration to health she expressed a desire to emigrate to Australia, if the guardian would advance the sum of £2 10s., which is necessary to be paid to the Emigration Society for outfit previous to sailing, and which money is returned them on disembarking; and the guardians having received a most satisfactory character of her from the governor of the workhouse, they agreed to do so; and she accordingly went to the office to inquire about her passage. While waiting there, however, she was accosted by a respectable person, who asked her business, and if she were going to emigrate? She replied in the affirmative, when he rejoined:

"So am I; and if you have no objection I'll marry you previous to sailing!"

She replied that she was obliged for the offer, but thought it was very extraordinary and premature, seeing that he knew nothing about her. Upon which he remarked that he liked her honest countenance. At length the matter was most seriously entertained, and she referred him to the service she had lately left. He at once started off to the address, and received such a satisfactory character, that, on returning, he immediately purchased the license, and the hasty couple were married on Christmas-day. It may be added that previous to the wedding, he spent £20 for his wife's outfit, paid her passage, and returned the £2 10s. to the guardian, "with many thanks."

PUZZLE.—There is a barrel which has eight gallons of beer in it, and it is required to draw off exactly four gallons; but there are only two vessels at hand—one of which will hold three gallons, and the other will hold five gallons—how can four gallons be measured by the aid of these two vessels?

Solution.—This may be accomplished in two ways, but the following is readiest: 1. Fill the five gallon measure from the cask, and from it pour three gallons into the other measure; this will leave two gallons in the larger measure. 2. Empty the three gallons from the smaller measure into the cask again, and pour out the two gallons which remained in the larger measure into the smaller, as this holds three gallons, it will, of course, require one gallon to fill it up. 3. Again fill the five gallon measure from the cask, and out of it pour one gallon to make up the deficiency in the smaller measure, and we have four gallons remaining; or, fill the three gallon measure, empty it into the five gallon measure, fill it again, and from it fill up the two deficient gallons of the five gallon measure. We have now one gallon remaining in the smaller measure; empty the five gallon measure into the cask, and transfer the one gallon from the smaller measure, which again fill from the cask, and we have four gallons as in the former case.

ESAU ACKUM, a young Chinaman now employed by Labrey, Scholes & Co., tea-dealers, Manchester, has furnished the Manchester Guardian with an account of a Chinese wedding. If, says he, during courtship, any pot or earthen vessel is cracked or broken, it is considered a bad omen, and one that is never disregarded. Should the young gentleman, therefore, while in the house of the lady's parents, hear or see anything of her that is not to his mind, he generally manages (by accident, of course) to break his tea-cup—and so break off the match.

"HURRAH FOR THE ROAD!"—Two maiden ladies who have just taken a house at Western-super-Mare, have such a fondness for things as they were, and such an utter abhorrence of railways, that they last week dispatched from London a small wagon-load of furniture, drawn by three horses, and attended by two men. After five weary days' journey, the distance of 140 miles was performed at the expense of 12l., and the loss, through the breaking of a handsome mirror, valued above that sum. The same goods could have been conveyed by rail in a few hours, and delivered at less than one quarter the wagon charges.

THE PRESENT WINTER.—Dr. Robbins, Librarian of the Hartford Athenæum, (Conn.) now over eighty years of age, has kept a record of the weather from his youth up and acknowledges that the present winter beats all former ones within his recollection, for the extent of its coldness, as measured by the thermometer.

CANADIAN GOLD.—Recently some gold was found in the Valley of Chaudiere, Canada. A ton of gravel produced when washed, four dollars of gold.

PRESIDENT TAYLOR'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

GEN. ZACHARY TAYLOR was inaugurated as President of the United States, at the capitol, in Washington, on Monday last, the 5th inst. The ceremonies were performed in the usual manner, in the presence of the Senate, the Justices of the Supreme Court, Foreign Diplomatic Agents, &c., &c.; and an immense assemblage of citizens. Previous to the administration of the oath of office, the President elect read the following Inaugural Address, which, for conciseness and clearness of expression, may be regarded as a model document:

Elected by the American people to the highest office known to our laws, I appear here to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution; and, in compliance with a time-honored custom, to address those who are now assembled.

The confidence and respect shown by my countrymen in calling me to be the chief magistrate of a Republic holding a high rank among the nations of the earth, have inspired me with the most profound gratitude; but, when I reflect that the acceptance of the office which their partiality has bestowed, imposes the discharge of the most arduous duties, and involves the weightiest obligations, I am conscious that the position which I have been called to fill, though sufficient to satisfy the loftiest ambition, is surrounded by fearful responsibilities. Happily, however, in the performance of my new duties, I shall not be without able co-operation. The legislative and judicial branches of the government present prominent examples of distinguished civil attainments, and matured experience; and it shall be my endeavor to call to my assistance in the Executive Departments, individuals whose talents, integrity, and purity of character will furnish ample guarantees for the faithful and honorable performance of the trusts to be committed to their charge.

With such aids and an honest purpose to do whatever is right, I hope to execute diligently, impartially, and for the best interests of the country, the manifold duties devolved upon me. In the discharge of these duties my guide will be the constitution, which I this day swear to "preserve, protect and defend."

For the interpretation of that instrument, I shall look to the decisions of the judicial tribunals, established by its authority, and to the practice of the government under the earlier Presidents, who had so large a share of its formation.

To the example of those illustrious patriots I shall always defer, with reverence; and especially to his example who was, by so many titles, "the father of his country."

To command the army and navy of the United States; with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors and other officers; to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend such measures as he shall judge to be necessary; and to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed—these are the most important functions entrusted to the President by the Constitution, and it may be expected that I shall briefly indicate the principles which will control me in their execution.

Chosen by the body of the people under the assurance that my administration would be devoted to the welfare of the whole country, and not to the support of any particular section, or merely local interests, I this day renew the declaration I have heretofore made, and proclaim my fixed determination to maintain, to the extent of my ability, the Government in its original purity, and to adopt as the basis of my public policy those great republican doctrines which constitute the strength of our national existence.

In reference to the army and navy, lately employed with so much distinction on active service, care shall be taken to insure the highest condition of efficiency; and, in furtherance of that object, the Military and Naval Schools, sustained by the liberality of Congress, shall receive the special attention of the Executive.

As American freemen we cannot but sympathize in all efforts to extend the blessings of civil and political liberty; but, at the same time, we are warned by the admonitions of history, and the voice of our beloved Washington, to abstain from entangling alliances with foreign nations.

In all disputes between conflicting Governments, it is our interest not less than our duty, to remain strictly neutral; while our geographical position, the genius of our institutions and our people, the advancing spirit of civilization, and above all, the dictates of religion, direct us to the cultivation of peaceful and friendly relations with all other powers.

It is to be hoped that no international question can now arise which a Government, confident in its own strength and resolved to protect its own just rights, may not settle by wise negotiation; and it eminently becomes a Government like our own, founded on the morality and intelligence of its citizens, and upheld by their affections, to exhaust every resort of honorable diplomacy before appealing to arms.

In the conduct of our foreign relations I shall conform to these views, as I believe them essential to the best interests and the true honor of the country. The appointing power vested in the President imposes delicate and onerous duties. So far as it is possible to be informed, I shall make honesty, capacity, and fidelity indispensable prerequisites to the bestowal of office, and the absence of either of these qualities shall be deemed sufficient cause for removal. It shall be my study to recommend such constitutional measures to Congress as may be necessary and proper to secure encouragement and protection to the great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; to improve our rivers and harbors; to provide for the speedy extinguishment of the public debt; to enforce a strict accountability on the part of all officers of the Government, and the utmost economy in all public expenditures.

But it is for the wisdom of Congress itself, in which all legislative powers are vested by the Constitution, to regulate these and other matters of domestic policy. I shall look with confidence to the enlightened patriotism of that body to adopt such measures of conciliation as may harmonize conflicting interests, and tend to perpetuate that union which should be the paramount object of our hopes and affections. In any action calculated to promote an object so near the heart of every one who truly loves his country, I will zealously unite with the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

In conclusion, I congratulate you, my fellow-citizens, upon the high state of prosperity to which the goodness of Divine Providence has conducted our common country.

Let us invoke a continuance of the same protecting care, which has led us from small beginnings to the eminence we this day occupy. And let us seek to deserve that continuance by prudence and moderation in our counsels; by well-directed attempts to assuage the bitterness which too often marks unavoidable differences of opinion; by the promulgation and practice of just and liberal principles, and by an enlarged patriotism, which shall acknowledge no limits but those of our own wide-spread republic.

On the conclusion of the address, which was received by prolonged cheering by the assembled multitude, the following oath was administered to President Taylor by Chief Justice Taney of the Supreme Court:

"I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

The president returned into the capitol amid prolonged vociferous cheering.

LECTURE ON CALIFORNIA.—Mr. Saxton, who visited California in Gen. Kearny's Expedition, will, on FRIDAY EVENING, the 9th inst., deliver a lecture on California, in the American Hall, corner of Grand street and Broadway, at half-past 7 o'clock. Admittance 25 cents. The citizens of New York, who take an interest in the literary, moral, and benevolent enterprises of the day, as well as strangers who are preparing to emigrate to California, may hear something of interest to them on that evening.

The subject will be discussed as follows:

1. Speak of the climate, soil, productions, and commercial advantages of California.
2. Of the conquest of California by Commodore Stockton and Lieut. Col. Fremont, and of the establishment of a Military Government there by General Kearny.
3. Of the mines of gold and quicksilver, and of the different routes, both by land and sea, to this El Dorado of the New World.
4. Conclude by offering some remarks to emigrants in reference to seeking gold as an ultimate object of pursuit, and of the opening for literary and benevolent enterprises in California.

MITCHEL.—A letter from Bermuda says that John Mitchel "is a poor, miserable, broken-hearted looking creature, and in wretched health."

Humorous.

HOW TO PAY THE CABMAN.—Every body has heard of the ingenious manner in which Sheridan evaded payment of a considerable sum for coach hire, by inveigling Richardson into the vehicle, getting up a quarrel—no very difficult matter—then jumping out in disgust, and leaving his irritable friend to recover his composure, and pay the fare. Hook, who, like all men of genius, augmented the resources of his own wit by a judicious borrowing from that of others, seems to have caught at that idea, when once, under similar circumstances, he found himself, after a long and agreeable ride, without money to satisfy the coachman; a friend happened to be passing, he was hailed and taken up, but unfortunately proved to be, on inquiry, as unprepared for any pecuniary transaction as Theodore himself. A dull copyist would have broken down at once; but, with a promptitude and felicity of conception that amply redeem the plagiarism, with whatever else he may be left chargeable, Hook pulled the check-string, and bade the driver proceed as rapidly as possible to No. —, — street, at the west end of the town, the residence of a well-known "surgeon, &c." Arrived, he ordered the coachman to "knock and ring," as desired, with energy; and, on the door opening, told his friend to follow, and hastily entered the house. "Mr. —, is he at home? I must see him immediately!" Mr. — soon made his appearance, when Hook, in an agitated and hurried tone, commenced: "My dear sir, I trust you are disengaged?" Mr. — bowed. "Thank heaven!—pardon my incoherence, sir—make allowance for the feelings of a husband, perhaps a father; your attendance, sir, is instantly required—instantly—by Mrs. —, No. —, &c.; pray lose not a moment, it is a very peculiar case, I assure you." "I will start directly," replied the medical man; "I have only to run up stairs, get my apparatus, and step into my carriage." "Ah! exactly," returned Hook; "but I am in agony till I see you fairly off; don't think of ordering out your own carriage—here's one at the door—jump into that." Mr. —, with a great mahogany case under his arm, made the jump, and quickly found himself at the house to which he had been directed. It was the abode of a very stiff-mannered, middle-aged maiden lady, not unknown to Hook; one, moreover, to whom he owed a grudge, a kind of debt he rarely failed to pay. The doctor was admitted; but, on explaining the object of his visit, soon found it convenient to make a precipitate retreat from the claws of the infuriate spinster into the arms of the hackney coachman, who deposited him in safety at his own door, which, however, he declined quitting without the full amount of his fare.—[Life of Theodore Hook.

AMUSEMENTS FOR THE YOUNG.—Touch hundreds at the same time. Touch your hair.

Place three chairs in the middle of a room; then pull off your shoes and jump over them. Jump over your shoes.

Say nine times, without a mistake, "Three sieves of sifted thistles, and three sieves of unsifted thistles."

Go out of the room with two legs, and come in with six. Bring a chair in with you.

Place a ruler on the floor of a room so that no one can jump over it. Put it close to the wall.

Lay a handkerchief on the floor so that two persons can stand on it, and yet not be able to touch each other. Lay it under the door, and place one person on one side of the door and another on the other side.

Say twice, without a mistake, "Peter Piper's peacock pecked a peck of pepper out of a pewter platter; if Peter Piper's peacock pecked a peck of pepper out of a pewter platter, where's the peck of pepper Peter Piper's peacock pecked."

A FORTUNATE MAN.—About the year 1713, the government, suspecting the loyalty of some of the clans, sent John Duke of Argyle to inspect the country and its strongholds. On his way to the castle of Inverness, he stayed some days at Kilravock, and enjoyed himself with the hospitable laird. Now, it must be borne in mind that the duke had no family, and had separated from the duchess. Hugh Rose, the Black Baron of Kilravock, had seventeen children, and after dinner they were all marched in, from Hugh, the young baron, to the infant in the nurse's arms. The Duke of Argyle was astonished, and asked, "Are all these your children?" The baron smiled assent. "What! all by one mother?" "No, no, my lord; this is my fifth wife." "Your fifth wife! oh, Rose, how fortunate some people are!" But whether Macalluimore alluded to the numerous family or the loss of the wives, must be left to conjecture.

SHARP PRACTICE.—Sir John Sylvester, Recorder of London, was in my time robbed of his watch by a thief whom he tried at the Old Bailey. During the trial, he happened to say aloud that he had forgotten to bring his watch with him. The thief, being acquitted for want of evidence, went with the Recorder's love to Lady Sylvester, and requested that she would immediately send his watch to him by a constable he had ordered to fetch it. Soon after I was called to the bar, and had published the first number of my "Nisi Prius Reports," while defending a prisoner in the Crown Court, I had occasion to consult my client, and I went to the dock, where I conversed with him for a minute or two. I got him off, and he was immediately discharged. But my joy was soon disturbed; putting my hand in my pocket to pay the "junior" of the circuit my quota for yesterday's dinner, I found that my purse was gone, containing several bank-notes, the currency of that day. The incident causing much merriment, it was communicated to Lord Chief Baron Macdonald, the presiding judge, who said, "What! does Mr. Campbell think that no one is entitled to take notes in court except himself?"—[Campbell's Lives of the Lord Chancellors.]

DREAMING FOR A BREAKFAST.—Down in Aroos-took county, Maine, a Scotchman and an Irishman happened to be journeying together through the almost interminable forests of that region, and by some mishap had lost their way, and had wandered about in a starving condition for a while, when they fortunately came across a miserable hovel, which was deserted, save by a lone chicken. As this poor biped was the only thing eatable to be obtained, they eagerly dispatched and prepared it for supper. When laid before them, Pat concluded that it was insufficient for the supper of both himself and Sawney, and therefore made a proposition to his companion that they should spare their chicken until the next morning, and the one who had the most pleasant dream would have the chicken, which was agreed to by the Scotchman.

In the morning Sawney told his dream—said he thought angels were drawing him to Heaven in a basket, and he never was so happy in his life. Upon concluding his dream, Pat exclaimed: "Ooh, sure and be Jabers, I saw you going, and thought you wouldn't come back after the chicken, and I got up and ate it myself!"

MENDING MATTERS.—A short time ago, a lady and gentleman were married in the neighborhood of Nottingham, and proceeded, in their own carriage, to spend the honeymoon by the Cumberland lakes, the gentleman giving strict orders to Murphy, his Irish footman, on no account to state to inquirers that they were newly married. When leaving the first inn on the road, the happy couple were much astonished and annoyed to find the servants all assembled, and, pointing to the gentleman, mysteriously exclaiming, "That's him—that's the man!" On reaching the next stage, the indignant master told Murphy he must certainly discharge him, as he had divulged what he had impressed upon him as a secret. "An' pray, yer honor," inquired Murphy, "what is it yer complains of?" "That you told the servants at the last inn we were a new-married couple." "By the powers, an' it's not thrue, yer honor," replied Murphy; "I told the whole kit that yer honor, and yer honor's lady—God bless her!—wouldn't be married yet for a fortnight!"

FATHER FELIX'S SERMON.—An Irish priest, by name Felix Macabe, author of a grammar of the English language, was expatiating from the pulpit on the reciprocal duties of the pastor and his flock, and on the account to be given on the subject at the day of final retribution. "Well, Father Felix," he observed, "the great judge will say, 'And how have you fulfilled the duties of your office? Have you neglected the charge you undertook, or supplied the wants of your parishioners?' and I shall reply, 'Holy Father, I preached to them, and I prayed for their souls, and I gave them my blessing.' 'Well, Father Felix, and how did your flock trate you? Did they pay their dues, and bring you their offerings?' And then, you villains, what am I to say?" apostrophising the congregation, "you know you do nothing but chate me."

As a gentleman was dining at an inn in Coventry, on Christmas day, on a prime out of roast beef, a man, genteely dressed, opened the door of the room, saying, "Have you done, sir? Shall I change the dish?" The gentleman nodded assent, and the beef disappeared. Soon after, the gentleman rang the bell for the waiter, who attended the summons, and inquiringly asked where was the roast beef? An explanation ensued, which proved that some hungry customer had personated the waiter, and thus secured a good Christmas dinner.

DEATH OF A POLISH EXILE.—Mr. Henry A. Gaspar, a Polish exile, died at his residence in Brooklyn, on Thursday last. The funeral services, which took place on Sunday, at the Washington street M. E. Church, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, were attended by a large concourse of friends, and by the members of Magnolia Lodge, No. 166, I. O. of O. F., Washington Court No. 1, Independent Order of Ancient Foresters, and a tent of Rechabites. His remains were taken to Greenwood Cemetery for interment.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO I.

I KNEW a maiden once, named Julia Wright,
Whose form was beautiful beyond conception;
But then her skin was dark as moonless night—
Or, like in water, twilight's shades' reflection;
Her face was covered o'er with pimples quite;
A moustache marr'd her chisell'd lips' perfection;
Her eyes were brilliant and as black as coal,
But then her hair was red—upon my soul!

For a Dark, Tanned, Freckled, Sallow, Pimpled or Tettered Skin, no preparation in the world can vie with GOURAUD'S Italian Medicated Soap, which will also cure Ringworm, Salt Rheum, Scrofula, and the like. GOURAUD'S POUDEUR SUBTILE is warranted to extirpate superfluous hair. GOURAUD'S Grecian Hair Dye will change red, light or gray hair to a jet black. GOURAUD'S Lily White is the best article extant for eliciting a delicate whiteness and smoothness to the skin.

Anecdotes.

The Countess G— has very fine children. She brings them up in the English, or rather the Scotch fashion, for they always go out with bare legs. On the other hand, the Countess has a dear little Italian greyhound, who never goes out without being warmly covered. One very cold day recently, when the frost was most biting, one of these pretty children, who was walking in Regent street, between his mother and the favorite dog, said to his mother, showing her his little legs, which were quite red, "Ma, look how cold my legs are;" and then throwing an envious look at the dog, he added, beseechingly, "May I borrow Tiny's paletot?"

GENERAL RULE FOR POOR PEOPLE.—If you happen to have any relations in India or Australia who have amassed large fortunes, cease to regret they are so far away, and to sigh for their return, as their doing so would not alter the state of things in the least. They would be quite as distant then as they are now.—[Puppet-Show.]

EMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION.—"Ma," said a young lady to her mother the other day, "what is emigrating?" "Emigrating, dear, is a young lady going to Australia." "What is colonizing, ma?" "Colonizing, dear, is marrying there and having a family." "Ma, I should like to go to Australia."

A duelist, who fancied himself insulted by one who had won the affections of his lady-love, left the room with the ominous words, "You will hear from me, sir!" "Well, do so!" replied the other, "glad on't; write once in a while; I shall be glad to hear from you as often as you have a mind to let us know how you get along."

"Would it were lawful to marry two wives!" exclaimed an enthusiastic young bachelor, desperately in love with a couple of country cousins. "Try one to begin with," was the remark of a surly old benedict.

SLEEPY.—"Isn't your hat sleepy?" inquired a little urchin of a gentleman with a shocking bad one on. "No—why?" inquired the gentleman. "Why, because I think it is a long time since it has had a nap," was the answer.

David Fender, "popping the question," in a letter, concluded thus: "And should you say yes, dear Mary, I will truly be your D. Fender."

OLD DOCTOR Jacob Townsend, THE ORIGINAL DISCOVERER OF THE GENUINE TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA.

Old Dr. Townsend is now about 70 years of age, and has long been known as the AUTHOR and DISCOVERER of the GENUINE ORIGINAL "TOWNSEND SARSAPARILLA." Being poor, he was compelled to limit its manufacture, by which means it has been kept out of market, and the sales circumscribed to those only who had proved its worth and known its value. It had reached the ears of many, nevertheless, so that persons who had been healed of sore diseases, and saved from death, proclaimed its excellence and wonderful HEALING POWER. This is manufactured on the largest scale, and is called for throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Unlike young S. P. Townsend's, it improves with age, and never changes, but for the latter, because it is prepared on scientific principles by a scientific man. The highest knowledge of Chemistry and the latest discoveries of the Art, have all been brought into requisition in the manufacture of the OLD DR.'S SARSAPARILLA. The Sarsaparilla root, it is well known to medical men, contains many medicinal properties, and some properties which are inert and useless; and others, which, if retained in preparing it for use, produce fermentation and acid, which is injurious to the system. Some of the properties of Sarsaparilla are so volatile, that they entirely evaporate and are lost in the preparation, if they are not preserved by a scientific process, known only to those experienced in its manufacture. Moreover, these volatile principles, which fly off in vapor, or as an exhalation, under heat, are the very essential medical properties of the root, which give to it all its value. The

GENUINE

is so prepared, that all the inert properties of the Sarsaparilla root are first removed, every thing capable of becoming acid or of fermentation, is extracted and rejected; then every particle of medicinal virtue is secured in a pure and concentrated form; and thus it is rendered incapable of losing any of its valuable and healing properties. Prepared in this way, it is made the most powerful agent in the Cure of Innumerable Diseases.

Hence the reason why we hear commendations on every side in its favor by men, women and children. We find it doing wonders in the cure of CONSUMPTION, DYSPPEPSIA, and LIVER COMPLAINT, and in RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA and PILES, COSTIVENESS, all CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, and all affections arising from Impurity of the Blood.

It possesses a marvellous efficacy in all complaints arising from Indigestion, from Acidity of the Stomach; from unequal circulation, determination of blood to the head, palpitation of the heart, cold feet and cold hands, cold shills and hot flashes over the body. It has not had its equal in coughs and colds; and promotes easy expectoration, and gentle perspiration, relaxing stricture of the lungs, throat, and every other part.

But in nothing is its excellence more manifestly seen and acknowledged than in all kinds and stages of Female Complaints.

It works wonders in cases of fluor albus or whites, Falling of the Womb, Obstructed, Suppressed, or Painful Menstrues, Irregularity of the menstrual periods, and the like; and is effectual in curing all forms of the Kidney Disease.

By removing obstructions, and regulating the general system, it gives tone and strength to the whole body, and cures all forms of

Nervous Diseases and Debility,

and thus prevents or relieves a great variety of other diseases, as Spinal Irritation, Neuralgia, St. Vitus Dance, Swooning, Epileptic Fits, Convulsions, &c.

It is not possible for this medicine to fail to do good; it has nothing in it which can ever harm it. It can never sour or spoil, and therefore, can never lose its curative properties. It cleanses the blood, excites the liver to healthy action, tones the stomach, and gives good digestion, relieves the bowels of torpor and constipation, allays inflammation, purifies the skin, equalizes the circulation of the blood, producing gentle warmth all over the body, and the insensible perspiration; relaxes all strictures and tightness, removes all obstructions, and invigorates the entire nervous system. Is not this, then,

The Medicine you Pre-eminently Need?

But can any of these things be said of S. P. Townsend's inferior article? This young man's liquid is not to be

Compared with the Old Dr.'s,

because of one GRAND FACT, that the one is INCAPABLE of DETE-RIORATION and

Never Spoils,

while the other DOES; it sours, ferments, and blows the bottles containing it into fragments; it creates acid, and acid liquid expires, and damages other goods! Must not this horrible compound be poisonous to the system? What! put acid into a system already diseased with acid! What causes Dyspepsia but acid? Do we not all know, that when food sours in our stomachs, what mischief it produces!—flatulency, heartburn, palpitation of the heart, liver complaint, diarrhoea, dysentery, colic, and corruption of the blood? What is Scrofula but an acid humor in the body? What produces all the humors which bring on Eruptions of the Skin, Scald Head, Salt Rheum, Erysipelas, White Swellings, Fever-Sore, and all ulcerations internal and external? It is nothing under heaven but an acid substance, which sours, and thus spoils all the fluids of the body, more or less. What causes Rheumatism, but a sour acid fluid, which insinuates itself between the joints and elsewhere, irritating and inflaming the tender and delicate tissues upon which it acts? So of nervous diseases, of impurity of the blood, of deranged circulations, and nearly all the ailments which afflict human nature.

Now, is it not horrible to make and sell, and infinitely worse to use this

Souring, Fermenting, Acid "Compound"

OF S. P. TOWNSEND!

and yet no would fain have it understood that Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's GENUINE ORIGINAL SARSAPARILLA, is an IMITATION of his inferior preparation!!

Heaven forbid that we should deal in an article which would bear the most distant resemblance to S. P. Townsend's article! and which should bring down upon the Old Dr. such a mountain load of complaints and criminations from Agents who have sold, and purchasers who have used S. P. Townsend's FERMENTING COMPOUND.

We wish it understood, because it is the absolute truth, that S. P. Townsend's article and Old Dr. Jacob Townsend's Sarsaparilla are heaven-wide apart, and infinitely dissimilar; that they are unlike in every particular, having not one single thing in common.

As S. P. Townsend is no doctor, and never was, is no chemist, no pharmacist—knows no more of medicine or disease than any other common, unscientific, unprofessional man, what guarantee can the public have that they are receiving a genuine scientific medicine, containing all the virtues of the articles used in preparing it, and which are incapable of changing which might render them the AGENTS of DISEASE instead of health?

It is to arrest frauds upon the unfortunate, to pour balm into wounded humanity, to kindle hope in the despairing bosom, to restore health and bloom and vigor into the crushed and broken, and to banish infirmity—that OLD DR. JACOB TOWNSEND has SOUGHT and FOUND the opportunity and means to bring his

Grand Universal Concentrated Remedy,

within the reach, and to the knowledge of all who need it, that they may learn and know, by joyful experience, its Transcendent Power to Heal!

and thus to have the unsurpassable satisfaction of having raised thousands and millions from the bed of sickness and despondency to hope, health, and a long life of vigor and usefulness to themselves, their families and friends.

THE HUNTER'S LOVE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY MRS. H. S. DE GROVE.

"Away! away! the couriers fly,
Nor stay for bridge or brake—
On! on! is heard the hunter's cry—
Speed, for my true love's sake!

"My love sitteth now in a lordly hall,
And vassals in waiting attend her call,
Yet would she gladly be riding with me,
On thro' the wild-wood, far over the lea.
Her sire is old, and his eyes are dim,
I shortly will sing him a pilgrim's hymn—
His wine will he pledge till his ear shall fail,
For age shall not stand the long night's wassail.
While his wardens guard, you will watch and wake,
As sleepless you thread this tangled brake;
And hold! for a sign when the warden must fall,
When the bravest shall scale the grim castle wall:
Have you heard the whoop of the bird that flies
Ever on, on, 'till in lighting she dies?
'Tis the sound of the shrillest winter blast,
And by it, ye know that he slumbers fast.
Then awake! awake!
For my true love's sake!

And guerdon true of the night shall be,
The lady's smile, and my love for thee!"

The pilgrim sat in this lordly hall,
And slowly his breath it came and went—
The palmer's cloak concealed him all,
As heavily on his staff he leant;
And gaily he sang in mirth and glee,
For a jolly old pilgrim he seemed to be,
Save for that restless and fiery eye,
That kept not pace with his melody.
Good wine was brought, and a bed for repose—
Not thus had Langwellan once dealt with his foes,
For he could display many trophies of war,
The bones of the dead, and the living scar,
Till many a cheek had blanched with fear,
Those trophies to see, and his tales to hear.
Ah! ne'er before was it understood,
Langwellan with foe had tasted food;
Now, with open heart and jovial hand,
He feasteth the chieftain of rival clan,
Till his tales are told, and the frequent pledge
Hath dimmed remembrance of wit's keen edge;
And the ringing laugh, and the beaker deep,
Remain unshared for his death-like sleep.

Aha! aha! the young hunter bold
Now doffs the guise of the pilgrim old,
And seeketh the chamber of lady fair,
And wotteth well of his welcome there.

"Knowest thou, lady, the mountain flower
It was once my pride to obtain?
Blossoms it still in thy maiden bower,
Chrished remembrance of happy hour—
Of a lover's farewell plain?"

"Knowest thou, ringlet of sunny hair,
Dy'd in blood of an anguished breast—
Kissed by thy lips, a seal that where
The red stain glowed thy heart was there,
Placed by my hand on its heaving rest?"

"Knowest thou, lady, the precipice edge
Where with chamois step he stood?
The flower I plucked from his rocky ledge,
And gave to thee as the hunter's pledge
Of faith and truth to the lady wooed!"

One glance to the maiden has all revealed—
Her own daring hunter before her kneeled;
In accents of love his name she breathes,
And tenderly round his form enweathes
Her snowy arms, in that long full clasp
That holdeth the heart in its earnest grasp,
Without fear or shame, for the one she loves
Hath come to win, and her faith she proves.
The silver-gemmed cestus that maidens wear
Is unloosed, and her robe, of texture rare,
Floats free as the waves of that shining hair.
Her truth stands confessed, for resting there
Lay the blood-stained lock; on its snowy throne,
The lord of her bosom his pledge must own.

Shrilly and clear was the signal-note given,
The air with answering echo is riven;
On, surely and bravely, his followers came,
Till the castle was ta'en in Lord Edgar's name!
Rough hands now arouse Langwellan from sleep,
Away to the chapel they hurried him on,
Where stood the priest, in tones solemn and deep,
Pronouncing the hunter and Agnes one!
"Forgive us, our father?" the lady cried—
"Forgive!" in response the robed priest replied.
"No base-born serf does thy pardon claim!
Thy castle is mine!—I honor thy name!—
I conquered for sake of true love alone—
Grant me my treasure, and let me begone!
I ask not thy castle—of lands not a rood,
For with thee in peace have I once broken food;
But offer thee friendship, on parole and hand,
To rank with thy allies Lord Edgar's stout band!"
The pledge is exchanged with the suppliant one,
And Edgar the hunter—is Langwellan's son!

CHAPTER VI.

THE SPY.

Rank treason—such as lurks
In villain minds, and plots the fate of virtue.—Brooks.

ROBERT ATREE, after leaving the room in which took place his interview with Lord Marmount, now emerged into a passage or gallery which terminated in a spiral stair-case. Ascending this stair-case to the second story of the house, the young man reached a door opening upon a spacious parlor. It was furnished sumptuously in the style of that period. Massy chairs of black walnut, mirrors, heavy with gilded carvings, and portraits in immense oval frames, were the first objects calculated to strike a stranger on entering; and the pictures, of cavaliers and ladies, bore, generally, resemblance enough to the owner of the house to inform one at once that they must be ancestors. The windows were open, but the night air was excluded by thick crimson curtains. Two large waxen candles burned upon an antique table near one of the windows, which itself opened upon a balcony that overlooked the gardens in the rear of the mansion.

But it is time, and here occurs a good opportunity, to give the reader an insight into the present position and plans of Robert Atree. We have already described his personal appearance, and shall therefore briefly glance at his character and prospects.

Atree was an orphan, like his rival, Ernest Rivers, but in point of worldly possessions, he ranked much higher than the young captain. He was at the present period in possession of a yearly income, which, though not large, would have been amply sufficient to cover the expenses of a less extravagant young man. But Robert, from his early youth upward, and even before the death of his last surviving parent, an indulgent mother, had been his own master, and consequently had been served badly. He was now, though not pecuniarily involved, in a fair way of dissipating what was left of an originally large fortune. He was, at the same time, artful, unscrupulous and ambitious.

He had been cunning enough, even at the commencement of ill-feeling between the previnces and the mother country, to conceal any predilection for either side, and had all along maintained the reputation of a careless, generous youth, who would require maturity to ripen his ideas for or against either party which divided the country; and it was generally conceded that he knew and recked little about whig or tory views.

But in this many on both sides were mistaken. Robert Atree had laid his schemes from the beginning. He doubted not that England would soon crush the patriot spirit, and he devoted himself secretly to her service. At the same time, he abandoned not his non-committal stand, but maintained with whig and tory the same reckless unconcern as regarded political matters.

Such men as Robert Atree were the most dangerous foes with which the early lovers of freedom had to contend. They inspired confidence, and continually but secretly betrayed it. And many of them continued their machinations throughout the entire war, and even at its close, managed to conceal the fact of their ever having been other than the purest patriots.

Atree was unscrupulous in the means he employed on all occasions to effect his purposes, as we have seen from his bloody commission to the bravo Orrall. And all his schemes were subservient to a powerful ambition, which painted to his fancy the most unbounded dreams of future success and greatness. Such was the individual who had held a nocturnal interview with a British officer, and who was now about to visit the camp of Gen. Lee, where, as in other places, he had secret and sagacious emissaries.

The apartment which Robert Atree entered from the spiral stair-case, was already occupied by two persons—an old negress, black as jet, and a young quadroon. They were both slaves, belonging to the young man, and the negress had been long a house-servant in the family, and was, in fact, the ancient nurse of her present master. The quadroon was the old woman's daughter, and foster-sister to Atree.

This girl was in her sixteenth year, gracefully formed, and with a face containing scarce one negro feature. She had large, sleepy eyes, fringed with long lashes, a well-formed nose, a voluptuous looking mouth, and teeth dazzlingly white, like little pearls.

She sat with the old negress at the antique table, near the open window, busily employed, as it seemed, upon an embroidery pattern of a military sash. Her head was bent down over her lap, disclosing the graceful turn of a fair and polished neck; and she lifted not her eyes at the entrance of Atree, though an observer might have noticed that her shoulders and what could be seen of her face, were overspread with a sudden crimson flush.

"Well, mother Gotta," said the young man, approaching and speaking to the old woman, without apparently casting a glance upon her daughter; "I have come to plan with you."

The negress rose, and drew a chair with officious haste toward the table, and then waited till Atree was seated before venturing to resume her own position. Though her faded skin had once been of the blackest hue, this old woman had once been good-looking. Her features possessed none of the disagreeable characteristics of the Congolese or Guinea tribes, but partook more of the Moorish nature; and probably she had originally sprung from that part of the Afric family who inhabit that country bordering on Fezzan or Morocco. Indeed, it was a customary boast of Margarette, or Gotta, as she was usually called, that her ancestors had been princes, and made war upon the white men. Wherever might have been her birth-place, from which she had been brought in very early youth, she retained traces of superstition and ceremonies in her mind which could only have emanated from Mohamedan teachings. And there was a great deal remaining about the old woman, to show that in youth she had probably felt much of the queen in her untaught breast. There was even now, at times, a haughty glitter in her bright black eyes, and a sort of stateliness of mien, that were quite unusual things to meet with in a slave. Her figure, too, had doubtless once been elegant and graceful as that of her quadroon daughter now was; and it still preserved a tall and erect bearing.

"Shall Filippa go away?" asked the negress, glancing at the young girl, who had not yet raised her eyes from her embroidery.

"Yes, Filippa may retire," answered Atree.

"Go!" was the monosyllable command of the mother, with a wave of the hand toward the young quadroon, who immediately gathered up her work basket and materials, and left the apartment without a word.

"How old is Filippa?" said the master, when the light figure of the girl had disappeared through the door. The negress pondered a moment, and then replied:

"Sixteen years, master Robert."

There was none of the broken patois of her class in the old woman's speech, but her voice trembled slightly as she uttered the last words.

"She is a tall child for her age," remarked Atree. "I was asked to part with her, nurse Gotta." Atree, as he said this, smiled to notice the shudder which ran through the old woman's frame. "But," he continued, "I refused a very large sum, because I promised you, good Gotta, not to sell Filippa."

Gotta seized her master's hand, and raised it respectfully to her withered lips. There was more strength in this mute manifestation of her gratitude, than would have been conveyed by a torrent of words. "Good master—kind master," she murmured, as if to herself.

"And I have not forgotten, nurse, that you saved my life," resumed Atree. "It was you who nursed me when every one, even my own mother, fled from me." The young tory alluded to a contagious fever that had nearly terminated his life in childhood, and from which he had only recovered through the untiring devotion of his black nurse.

"So, you see, good Gotta, I will never displease you, nor cause you any uneasiness."

"Dear master—good master Robert," cried the negress, her bright eyes filling with tears, while she bent over the young man's hand, and kissed it again and again.

Atree submitted to the endearments of his nurse's gratitude for a moment, and then, changing his tone, "Gotta," he said, "I want you to do something for me."

The negress dried her eyes, and listened.

"You must go away from Charleston, to Laurelwood."

The old woman's eyes lighted up as if with recollection.

"You know, Gotta, that was my father's favorite residence, and it is so secluded, and distant from the noise of the city, and safe from enemies, that I have concluded to place a treasure there."

The negress looked surprised.

"Not a treasure of gold, Gotta, but a child, a young girl, like Filippa. You must have charge of her, and keep her very close—you and Filippa."

The old woman peered into her master's face, to catch some expression which she doubtless expected to see there, while her small, black eyes twinkled brightly. Atree went on without seeming to regard her look:

"You must watch over the child day and night, and never let her be seen. She will never need to go out of the house, because she is blind."

The nurse clasped her hands together, and an expression of deep pity flitted across her face:

"Poor child—poor baby!" she murmured.

"You must take great care of her, Atree. She has no mother, like Filippa—so you must be her mother, and Filippa her sister."

Gotta began to weep, for the nature of the old negress was tender in the extreme, and this Atree well knew. Hence he anticipated the effect of his simple mode of communicating his wishes, in order to enlist the sympathies of his aged nurse.

"Now you must be ready to start with Filippa to-morrow, and go secretly to Laurelwood. I will soon visit you there; and before you go I will speak further with you about the matter."

With these words Robert Atree arose, and quickly leaving the apartment, he descended the spiral staircase. Gotta remained for a moment wrapped in thought, till the soft pressure of her daughter's hand upon her arm aroused her. The quadroon had returned, silently, and now whispered hurriedly to the negress.

"Quick, mother—come! I must go!" and she pulled rather than led the old woman through a small door opposite to that by which she had first left the room. Thence in the space of scarce three minutes, she returned with the negress.

She returned, or rather her metamorphose returned; for instead of the plain, close-fitted white dress she had worn, the quadroon was now clothed in a complete suit of male apparel, and presented the appearance of a handsome boy of twelve or thirteen years. A blue jacket, or rather coatee, with short curled tails, trousers of coarse blue cotton-jean, small shoes, or rather slippers, and a close skull-cap, gave her the tout ensemble of a sprightly youth, while her long black ringlets were wound into a plait upon the top of her head. She hurriedly thrust a pistol into the breast of her jacket, and kissing the old woman's forehead, started from the room.

Gotta clasped her hands together and raised her eyes:

"Poor child—sweet Filippa," she murmured; "she loves, as Gotta once loved!"

The quadroon ran swiftly down the spiral staircase, and out of the front door of the mansion, down an avenue overhung with trees, until she reached the street. The night was still bright as day, the starlight falling in a shower upon every object. Filippa looked anxiously around, and at last caught a glimpse of Atree's figure, just disappearing at a point in the distance; and with a joyful exclamation the disguised girl quickened her steps.

The young tory pursued his way without noticing that he was followed; until, in the space of half an hour, he reached the outskirts of the American camp, and answered the challenge of the sentinel. Then traversing through a clump of trees which grew near the line of outposts, he gained the shelter of a giant oak, beneath which he was joined by a man in the uniform of an American soldier.

"You are punctual," remarked Robert Atree, as the person, who had evidently expected his arrival, emerged suddenly from behind the oak.

"Not more so than you probably expected, sir," answered the other, a man of smaller stature, and slight dimensions, who appeared somewhat agitated as he spoke.

"I relied on your promptness, which I know well," said the tory; "but what have you learned further?"

"That the General is opposed to the stand which Colonel Moultrie takes, and predicts a total defeat," replied the soldier.

"And is this all you know? Why, my good Samuel Pappett, you are somewhat behind. I was aware of Lee's opposition hours ago!"

"All I know," said Pappett, sullenly, "that the General returned to the camp, and issued orders to these raw recruits to hold themselves ready to cover Moultrie's retreat."

"Fish!" cried Atree, impatiently. "Have you any more papers?"

"One," answered the soldier—"a letter from Washington—yes, and a plan of an expedition against the Floridas. Here they are; and I hope, sir, you will not forget to mention me to Sir Henry—"

"I shall not, you may depend, Pappett," said Atree, possessing himself of the papers.

"Because, you know I am risking my life!"

"Oh, I know your sacrifices," said the tory, with a slight sneer. "You shall be rewarded, never fear!"

"But if I am found in the Yankee camp, sir, it may go hard with me."

"Nonsense, man, I shall take care of that. However, if you desire it, Pappett, you may return with me to-night. Perhaps you can assist me in a small affair I have on hand."

"That is just what I want—to get away," cried the other, who appeared to be of an exceedingly timorous disposition. "If I could only—"

"You shall come with me, Pappett, and I will see that you're not harmed. We cannot afford to spare you, though I believe, sincerely, a greater coward never disguised himself in soldier's clothes."

"But I'm of use in some things," said Pappett, whiningly.

"Oh, yes, everything has its uses," answered Atree; "but come along; time wears."

So saying the young tory retraced his steps; and followed by Pappett, repassed the guard. Filippa, the quadron, who had not ventured within sight of the sentinel; but, concealed at some distance from the outposts, had awaited anxiously the return of her master; now crept out from her hiding-place, and prepared to follow the young man's steps.

At the same moment, too, another person, clad like Pappett, in the American uniform, stole from the shadow of the oak tree, where he had evidently been a listener to the conversation of the two, and hastily giving the password to the sentry, hurried after the two spies.

The disguised Filippa noticed quickly this new pursuer of her master, and watched his movements.

Atree and Pappett walked rapidly along the river-road towards the city. It was a lonesome path, with a stretch of beach on one hand, and dense palmetto thickets upon the other; and in the shadow of these thickets the two pursuers crept, while the tories kept the unshaded road.

Suddenly, Filippa following slowly behind the person who had tracked her master from the camp, heard a short, quick cry, and immediately after discovered the man who had accompanied her master dashing swiftly down the road. She sprang forward and beheld Robert Atree struggling with the soldier who had tracked him from the oak tree.

The man had taken his opportunity to attack the tory while crossing a small bridge, which spanned a narrow creek, stretching in from the river. He had apparently counted upon no resistance from Pappett, whom doubtless he knew to be a coward, and had therefore directed his attack against Atree alone.

The two now stood upon the frail bridge, struggling desperately with each other for the mastery. But Atree was no match for the man with whom he had grappled, and was evidently fast sinking beneath the other's strength. Filippa drew the concealed pistol from her bosom, and still keeping in the shadow of the wood, ran towards the bridge. She heard the gasping voice of her master.

"What would you?" cried Atree to the soldier, who had wound one arm about his neck; and was almost strangling him by the tightness with which he compressed it. "Do you want to murder me?"

"No, unless you force me to that measure," answered the man, gruffly. "Submit quietly, and I'll not harm you!" And as he said this, the soldier, by a sudden jerk, threw Atree upon his back, with his head hanging over the side of the bridge.

"For God's sake, let me go! I have money—I will reward you," cried the tory.

"Yes, let you go with the general's letters in your pocket, which that traitor Pappett stole for you. No, sir! you are a prisoner, and must go to the camp!"

"My God! you will ruin me! Let me alone, and you shall have money. Take my watch—my purse!"

"You infernal tory, do you take me for a footpad?" cried the soldier, indignantly. "I've a mind to throw you into the creek for that last speech of your's. I'm an American, my young friend—a good whig, and not to be bribed. So, be quiet, while I secure you, my good sir."

Robert Atree's situation seemed desperate. It was plain that his powerful captor was not to be bought over; and it was equally certain that he knew enough of the tory's secret treachery, to render his life very insecure, should he be taken back a prisoner to the camp of General Lee. The young man inwardly cursed the timidity of his emissary Pappett, which had led that worthy to retreat so precipitately, as well as his own fool-hardiness in appointing an interview within the camp.

But neither of the two men noticed the slight figure, that, crouching in the obscurity of the thicket, which threw the bridge and part of the road into a dense shadow, was even now at the edge of the creek. The patriot soldier, kneeling upon the prostrate Atree, was just in the act of drawing a stout cord from his pocket, with which to pinion the arms of his prisoner, when the scarcely perceptible tread of the disguised quadron upon the bridge, caused him suddenly to raise his head.

But he was too late. Filippa's pistol was, the next moment, pressed against his breast; and ere he could rise from his knee, or even utter an exclamation, she had fired. The soldier fell back heavily, over the edge of the log-bridge, into the dark creek below. Robert Atree was saved.

He sprang to his feet, while the reverberations of the pistol-shot rang through the stillness of night. But his preserver was gone.

One glimpse of a light, boyish figure, the tory caught, as he dashed his hair from his eyes, and gazed down the road; the next moment it had disappeared. Atree reeled to the side of the narrow bridge, and looked down into the water. He heard a slight struggle below, and a choked groan—then all was still.

"He will tell no tales," muttered the young man. "But, by the Fiend, I myself have had a narrow escape! My curse light on that treacherous Pappett!"

The tory drew a long breath, and pursued his way along the lonesome road, fearful that the pistol-shot might have alarmed the outposts of the camp, and that further pursuit would follow. But he had not proceeded a quarter of a mile, before a figure sprang into his path from the road-side. It was Pappett, who, more dead than alive, had concealed himself in the brushwood in dreadful apprehension that the entire army was in pursuit of him. He had recognised the figure of his employer, and at once knew that he had escaped.

"You cowardly wretch," muttered Robert Atree, seizing the spy by the throat, who threw himself on his knees before him, "you deserted me!"

"O, forgive me, master Atree! I was frightened, and knew not what I was about. O, for Heaven's sake, forgive me. That fellow, Tom Evans, I know him well. He's a terrible fellow. How did you escape him?"

"Terrible or not, he'll not harm us now, Pappett," said Atree, amused in spite of his anger, by the desponding look of the trembling wretch at his feet. "He lies cold enough, by this time, in the mud of yonder creek. But, up, you white-livered knave, and follow me. And, if you attempt another desertion in case of attack, I promise you that my first thought shall be to send a bullet after you instead of the assailant."

Pappett rose, and with trembling limbs, followed Atree, without speaking, save in reply to the question which the tory put, as to the man who had dogged them. It appeared that he had been a common soldier in Lee's camp, a determined fellow, well known as an ardent patriot; and it was doubtless a wish to signalize himself in his commander's eyes, as well as his love of the whig cause, that had prompted him to the daring attempt to secure the tory's person, and which had resulted so seriously to himself.

But of the mysterious preserver of his life, Robert Atree could imagine no clue to information. The sudden appearance, the pistol-shot, and immediate retreat of his strange coadjutor, constituted a problem which defied the young man's utmost ingenuity to solve.

Pappett trod mechanically in his employer's foot-steps, till they reached the upper extremity of the city, and stood before a hut, which will be hereafter described as the dwelling of MATTHEW ORRALL.

It was now past midnight, and the city was wrapped in profound silence, though many an anxious heart was awake in fearful anticipation of the morrow's struggle. Robert Atree beckoned Pappett to approach. "You mark this hut," he whispered.

The spy made an affirmative gesture.

"In that hut there are now two—a man and a child. The child is blind. Well, sir, what I wish you to do, is to remain about this place the rest of the night, until the man leaves the house.

Then you must manage to effect an entrance. You are cunning, Pappett, where there is no danger, and you can do this."

"Perhaps I can get in through yonder window," answered the spy, attentively examining the exterior of the hut.

"I perceive you understand the business," said Atree. "Well, sir, you must gain the interior of this house, and bring the blind child away."

"How old is the child?" whispered Pappett.

"A young girl of twelve. Doubtless, the man will leave his dwelling at day-break. You must then enter. If the child is sleeping, awake her, and say that her father has sent for her. Bring her immediately to my house, by the secret door. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly, Master Atree," replied the spy, who had recovered from his terror, and whose cunning—which quality he possessed in a remarkable degree—was now called into exercise. "The thing shall be done; but are you sure that there will be no others in the house to prevent the—"

"If you perceive a dark, ruffian-looking man leave the hut, you may be sure of meeting with no obstacle."

"But, if this ruffian-looking fellow should return?"

"Will you never have done, Pappett, with your cowardly scruples? He will not return, you may be certain of that, until night. Are you satisfied to obey me, or do you longer need my protection?"

"I will do it, Master Atree. I did not refuse!"

"See to it, then. I shall wait your coming at the secret door. Be shrewd, and fear nothing. If any unforeseen obstacle should prevent your success, hurry to me at once. Now, sir, keep vigilant watch."

"I will do so, you may depend, sir," answered the spy.

"Stay," cried Atree, pausing for a moment, and then drawing a scrap of paper and a pencil from his pocket. "Take this, and write as I dictate."

Pappett took the pencil, and wrote upon the strip of paper, by the moonlight, which still was bright, a few words, at the tory's dictation.

"Now, leave this scrawl in the hut when you have secured the blind girl. Do you comprehend me?"

"All shall be done, Master Atree."

"Very well, Pappett, I shall depend upon your shrewdness. Good night."

Robert Atree turned and wended his path homeward, while the spy concealed himself among the brushwood that covered the bank against which the hut was built.

Pappett was one of those wretchedly nervous persons, whose constitutional timidity is often the cause of their becoming the most arrant rascals. He had all his life been engaged in plots and designs, in which he was invariably the tool of bolder villains. Nature, it seemed, had given him a large share of shrewdness, and in everything which required no physical or mental courage, he was clear-headed and calculating to the last degree. Had his peculiar qualities been directed to a good use, he might have been an invaluable citizen, living and dying with the reputation of a wise man. As it was, however, from early education and association, his shrewdness had ripened into cunning, which found its principal employment in carrying out or counseling the nefarious schemes of the dissolute and bad. At the breaking out of the Revolution, Pappett was the keeper of a drinking house at Charleston, and had been early employed by Atree in his treasonable intercourse with the British. At the young tory's direction he had afterwards connected himself with the American recruits, and carried on the trade of a camp-spy with all the ingenuity of his nature. But the near approach of the British, acting on his nervous timidity, had made him, as we have seen, anxious to leave the patriot camp, lest from one or the other belligerents his personal safety might be compromised.

Pappett was, in fact, a coward of the first water, and he trembled most violently as he enconsed himself, closely concealed, among the bushes in the rear of the hut, to await the egress of the dweller within.

But the spy had scarcely hidden himself, with noiseless precaution, when he observed a phenomenon which immediately caused the perspiration to ooze in large drops from his body. This was a faint light which appeared among the leaves a few feet from where he lay, apparently proceeding from a small opening in the bank itself. It was very dim, but yet distinctly visible, and Pappett trembled with the strongest apprehensions.

By degrees, however, as no increase was observable in the size of the light, the spy grew less uneasy, and finally ventured to draw nearer to the opening, to ascertain if possible whence it proceeded. And what was his surprise, when parting the bushes near the river's edge, he saw clearly that it was evidently the mouth of a passage connecting with the interior of the bank, perhaps with the hut itself.

On making this discovery Pappett shook with new alarm, and it was some minutes before he could summon courage enough to reflect coolly. Then his curiosity struggled hard with his fears, and he was strongly tempted to creep forward into the opening. He hesitated, however, and placed his ear down to the aperture.

Was it fancy? Pappett thought he recognized the clinking sound of gold coins. Then his curiosity and avarice were both stimulated, and he moved cautiously into the passage.

It was damp and clammy, and the sudden contact of the wet clay sent a chill through the spy's blood, which made him half withdraw his body. But as the subterranean path appeared gradually to widen, and as the thought happened to strike him, that probably the occupant of the hut was unaware of the existence of the outlet, he summoned a sort of desperate resolution, and crept further in.

The light still glimmered, and Pappett crowded by almost imperceptible degrees, towards the point whence it proceeded.

At last he came in sight of an object which riveted at once his gaze, though at the same time it banished every atom of strength for a moment from his frame. This was the appearance of a man kneeling beside a casket of jewels, the light of which flashed like fire in the rays of the taper which he held.

The most magnificent jewels heaped together met Pappett's dazzling sight—a spectacle that almost deprived him of his senses. His brain swam, and for a moment he lost his power of vision.

When he could recover himself once more he rapidly surveyed the objects around him. But the man was then in the act of closing the small chest, or casket, which he immediately pushed into a recess in the wall. Then, before the spy could catch more than a glimpse of his features, he turned away and passed from the cave in the opposite direction from where Pappett was concealed.

The sudden darkness which ensued from the withdrawal of the light, almost paralyzed the spy with terror. It was with difficulty that he could gather strength to draw his limbs back once more to the outlet; and even after he had gained the open air, and was again closely hidden among the thick bushes, at the summit of the bank, he could scarcely convince himself that all he had witnessed was not a vision of enchantment.

ICE.—Every one has suffered by having bottles and pitchers cracked by their contents freezing but very few persons are aware of the cause—viz, that water, unlike any other liquid, swells in becoming solid. This is a wise and kind provision of God; for if, in freezing, water became more compact and heavier, the ice would sink to the bottom of our ponds and rivers,—and there, never thawing, the whole of the northern and temperate parts of the globe would become, in the course of a few years, as cold, and even more dreary, than the snow tracts inhabited by the Esquimaux. The force with which water expands or swells in freezing, has been shown by filling with it hollow balls or shells of iron, and then freezing them. The shells were split.

THE HAPPY VALLEY.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

It was a valley filled with sweetest sounds,
A languid music haunted every where,—
Like that with which a summer-eye abounds,
From rustling corn, and song-birds calling clear,
Down sloping uplands, which some wood surrounds,
With tinkling rills just heard, but not too near;
And low of cattle on the distant plain,
And peal of far-off bells, now caught, then lost again.
It seemed like Eden's angel-peopled vale,
So bright the sky, so soft the streams did flow;
Such tones came riding on the musk-winged gale,
The very air seemed sleepily to blow;
And choicest flowers enameled every dale,
Flushed with the richest sunlight's rosy glow:
It was a valley drowsy with delight,
Such fragrance floated round, such beauty dimmed the sight.

The golden-belted bees hummed in the air,
The tall silk grasses bent and waved along;
The trees slept in the steeping sunbeams glare,
The dreamy river chimed its undersong,
And took its own free course without a care:
Amid the boughs did lute-tongued songsters throng.

And the green valley throbbed beneath their lays,
While echo echo chased, through many a leafy maze.

And shapes were there, like spirits of the flowers,
Sent down to see the Summer-beauties dress,
And feed their fragrant mouths with silver showers;

Their eyes peeped out from many a green recess:
And their fair forms made light the thick-set bowers;
The very flowers seemed eager to caress
Such living sisters; and the boughs, long-leaved,
Clustered to catch the sighs their pearl-flushed bosoms heaved.

One through her long loose hair was backward peeping,

Or throwing, with raised arm, the locks aside;
Another high a pile of flowers was heaping,
Or looking love askance, and, when descried,
Her coy glance on the bedded greenward keeping;
She pulled the flowers to pieces as she sighed,—
Then blushed like timid daybreak, when the dawn
Looks crimson on the night, and then again 's withdrawn.

One, with her white and milk-white arms outspread,
On tip-toe tripped along a sun-lit glade;
Half-turned the matchless sculpture of her head,
And half-shook down her silken circling braid;
She seemed to float on air, so light she sped;
Her back-blown scarf an archèd rainbow made;
She skimmed the wavy flowers as she passed by,
With fair and printless feet, like clouds along the sky.

One sat alone within a shady nook,
With wild-wood songs the lazy hours beguiling;
Or, looking at her shadow in the brook,
Trying to frown, then at the effort smiling—
Her laughing eyes mocked every serious look;
'Twas as if Love stood at himself reviling:
She threw in flowers, and watched them float away,
Then at her beauty looked, then sang a sweeter lay.

Others on beds of roses lay reclined,
The regal flowers athwart their full lips thrown,
And in one fragrance both their sweets combined,
As if they on the self-same stem had grown,
So close were rose and lip together twined,
A double flower that from one bud had blown,
Till none could tell, so sweetly were they blended,
Where swelled the curving lip, or where the rose-bloom ended.

One, half-asleep, crushing the twined flowers,
Upon a velvet-slope like Dian lay;
Still as a lark that mid the daisies cowers:
Her looped-up tunic, tossed in disarray,
Showed rounded limbs too fair for earthly bowers;
They looked like roses on a cloudy day,
The warm white dulle amid the colder green;
The flowers too rough a couch that lovely shape to screen.

Some lay like Thetis' nymphs along the shore,
With ocean-pearl combing their golden locks,
And singing to the waves for evermore;
Sinking like flowers at eve beside the rocks,
If but a sound above the muffled roar
Of the low waves was heard. In little flocks,
Others went trooping through the wooded alleys,
Their kirtles glancing white, like streams in sunny valleys.

They were such forms as, imaged in the night,
Sail in our dreams across the Heaven's steep blue;
When the closed lid sees visions streaming bright,
Too beautiful to meet the naked view,
Like faces formed in clouds of silver light.
Women they were! such as the angels knew—
Such as the Mammoth looked on, ere he fled,
Scared by the lovers' wings, that streamed in sunset red.

HOW TO CORRECT A SPOILED TEMPER.

Dr. Ayscough one day, according to the rules of his office, as assistant librarian in the British Museum, London, attended through that grand magazine of curiosities a party of ladies and a gentleman, all of whom, except one lady, were disposed to be highly pleased with what they saw; and really would have been so, if this capricious fair one had not continually damped their gratification with such exclamations as these: "Oh, trumpery! come along! I see nothing worth looking at."

This lady being the handsomest of the group, Mr. A. (who, though an old bachelor, was a great admirer of beauty,) at first fixed upon her as his temporary favorite, but soon had reason to transfer his particular attentions to another less handsome, but more amiable.

On her continuing a similar strain of exclamations, uttered with correspondent looks and demeanor, he turned kindly towards her and said, "My sweet young lady, what pains you take to prevent that fine face of yours from killing half the beaux in London!" and then directed his conversation, explanatory of the different objects to the rest of the party.

So much influence, however, had she over her companions, that, beaten as the round was to the doctor, she caused him to finish it considerably sooner than was either pleasant to his mind or convenient to the state and ponderosity of his body. While in the last room, just before he made his parting bow, addressing himself to her, with that suavity of manner which was so peculiar to him, he smilingly said, "Why, what a cross little puss you are! Nothing pleases you. Here are ten thousand curious and valuable things, brought at a vast expense from all parts of the world, and you turn up your nose at the whole of them. Do you think, with these airs, that pretty face will ever get you a husband? Not if he knows you half an hour first. Almost every day of my life, and especially when attending ladies through these rooms, I regret being an old bachelor; for I see so many charming, good-tempered women, that I reproach myself for not trying to persuade one of them to bless me with her company. But I cannot fall in love with you, and I'll honestly tell you I shall pity the man that does; for I'm sure that you'll plague him out of his life."

During this singular valedictory speech (delivered with such pleasantry that even the reproved could not take offense at it), the gentleman who was of the party looked now at the speaker and then at the lady with considerable emotion, but said nothing; while she called up no small portion of lightning into a fine pair of dark eyes, and some transient flashes of it into her cheeks; and then with her friends (who affably wished their candid cicerone a good morning) withdrew.

Somewhat more than a year afterwards, on going the same round again, the doctor was particularly pleased with one lady of the party; and that one being the prettiest, he contrived, according to his wonted custom, (as a sailor would say) "to near her." Respectfully inquisitive concerning every object which time allowed her to notice, she asked a number of questions; and most willingly "he taught his lovely fair one all he knew;" while in the most engaging manner, she drew the attention of her friends to many curiosities which they would otherwise have passed unobserved. In short, as good Bishop Rundle says, "she being disposed to be pleased with everything, everything conspired to please her." Nor was less pleased her worthy and benevolent guide; who, while she was contemplating the rare beauties of nature, was contemplating not only the charms of her person, but also those of her mind. At length, "the wonders ended," he was about to make his best bow, when the fascinating fair one, with an arch smile (looking him rather askew in the face), asked him whether he remembered her?

"No, ma'am," said he, "but I shall not easily forget you."

Then linking her arm in that of a gentleman who was of the party, she asked in the same engaging manner whether he remembered him? To which he replied that he thought he did; but the gentleman looked better than when he saw him before.

"Now, sir, don't you recollect once, in this very room, giving a lady, who was pleased with nothing and displeased with everything, a smart lecture for her caprice and ill temper?"

"Yes, ma'am, I do."

"Well, sir, I am that lady; or I should rather say, I was; for you have been the means, in the hands of Divine Providence, of making me a totally different being from what I then was; and I am now come to thank you for it. Your half-in-jest and half-in-earnest mode of reproof caused me to know myself; and was of far more use than all that had been done before in correcting a spoiled temper. After we had left you," continued she, "I said to myself, if I appear thus unamiable to a stranger, how must I appear to my friends, especially to those who are destined to live constantly with me? You asked me, sir, if I expected to get a husband; I then had one—this gentleman—who was present at your just reproof; and I dare say he will join with me in thanking you for giving it so frankly and successfully."

The husband then cordially repeated his acknowledgments to him for having been instrumental in contributing so largely to their mutual felicity; "a felicity," said he, "which, should anything lead you, sir, into the neighborhood of—, you will gratify extremely both myself and my wife if you will call and witness." Then leaving his address, he and his lady shaking Dr. A. by the hand, they departed.

Here, surely, was a heroic triumph of temper; and, as the wise king observes, "greater" does this sensible and candid woman seem "in ruling her spirit, than he that taketh a city."

PRESERVATION OF HEALTH.

COLDS.—The present time is opportune for saying something about "colds," as, during the next three or four weeks, almost every other person will carry one about with him. Few people pass through the winter without experiencing the nuisance of a cold; and some suffer from it almost continually during that season. In our climate, particularly about this time, one perpetually hears, as a matter of course, in answer to inquiries relating to the state of health, the stereotyped phrases, "Oh! I've only a cold;" "I'm in the fashion, I've caught a bad cold;" "We've all been laid up with colds;" "Very well, except a shocking cold." During the pauses of the service in a church or chapel, also, one is disagreeably impressed with the prevalence of catarrhs, by a frequent gruff coughing chorus, midgled with a trumpet accompaniment on the nasal organ.

Catarrh is an inflammation—perhaps of a specific kind—of the mucous membrane of the nostrils; extending generally to the eyes—to the cavities called sinuses, above and on each side of the bridge of the nose—and to the throat.

Cold and moisture, or sudden variations in temperature, are the chief causes of catarrh. It is probable, too, that irrespective of these causes, there is occasionally "something in the air," depending perhaps upon its electrical condition, which produces epidemic catarrh; for it has been observed that this complaint has prevailed very extensively and severely without any sufficient previous changes in the temperature, or in the degree of moisture, to account for it. By some authors, catarrh is considered to be infectious, from the fact of its attacking consecutively every member of even a large household. Professional opinion is, however, averse to this notion. Individuals of the lymphatic temperament, long spare persons with contracted chests, those who live chiefly indoors, and all who are in a debilitated condition, or whose digestive organs are out of order, are most prone to colds.

The most common cause of colds is sudden alternation of temperature, either from heat to cold, or vice versa. Thus going from the cold air into a heated room—from a freezing temperature to one above 70 deg.; or emerging from a crowded theater or ball-room into the frosty, or still worse, chill and humid atmosphere of a January night, is very likely to give cold. How frequently one sees, in mid-winter, files of fair ladies with necks and arms barely covered by a light shawl, coming from the heated atmosphere of the ball-room into the cutting north-east wind. It requires no prophet to foretell that catarrhs, sore throats, perhaps more serious affections, must, in many instances, be the result of such incautious exposure; that the doctor will be sent for in the morning; and, perhaps, in the end, a more somber functionary. How many premature deaths may be attributed to this common indiscretion so easily avoidable! A very usual cause of catarrh is exposure to a draught of cold air, especially when the body is in a heated state; and it is worthy of remark, that the less the surface exposed to the draught, the greater is the likelihood of "catching" cold. Everybody knows, too, that wet feet and damp clothing will give cold, especially if the circulation is not kept up by brisk exercise.

EXEMPLIFICATIONS OF INSTINCT.

THE similarity between the simple instinctive actions of animals and their ordinary organic functions is so great, as to lead us to suppose that both sets of operations are arranged upon similar plans, though these may not be identical, and both are carried on with the forethought or the consciousness of the animal. Thus the young bee, on the day that it first leaves the cell, without teaching and without experience, begins to collect honey and form wax, and build up its hexagonal cell, according to the form which its progenitors have used from the earliest generations. Birds build nests of a certain structure after their kinds; and many species, at certain seasons, excited by some internal impulse, take their migratory flight to other countries. The insect, which never experienced a parent's care or a mother's example, labors assiduously and effectively for the future development and sustenance of an offspring, which it, in its turn, is doomed never to behold. Others toil all the summer, and lay up stores for the winter, without ever having experienced the severity of such seasons, or being in any sensible way aware of its approach. We know that such actions are the result of involuntary and unreflective impulses, because we often find them performed in vain.

Sir Joseph Banks had a tame beaver, which was allowed to range at liberty in a ditch about his grounds, and was at all seasons liberally supplied with food. One day, about the end of autumn, it was discovered in the ditch very busily engaged in attempting to build a dam, after the manner of its companions in a state of nature. This was evidently the blind impulse of its instinctive feelings, for a moment's exercise of the lowest degree of reflection must have shown it that such labor, under the circumstances in which it was placed, was altogether superfluous.

A common quail was kept in a cage, and became quite tame and reconciled to its food. At the period of its natural migration, it became exceedingly restless and sleepless—it beat its head against the cage in many vain efforts to escape, and on examination its skin was found several degrees above its usual temperature.

A bee which can fly homewards, one or two miles in a straight line to its hive with extreme accuracy, if it happens to enter an open window in a room, will exhaust all its efforts in attempting to get out at the opposite window which is shut down, but never pauses to think of retracing its steps a little way backward, so as to fly out at the opening at which it entered. We often observe a dog, when going to sleep on the floor, turn himself several times around before he lies down, and this is just one of the lingering instincts which he has retained; while in his wild state he is accustomed thus to prepare his bed amid the tall grass or rushes.

An acute observer of animals has remarked that a jackdaw, which, for want of its usual abode, had for its nest made choice of a rabbit hole, was often sorely perplexed in what way to get the long sticks, of which its nest was to be formed, within the narrow entrance. Again and again did it attempt to pull in the piece of stick, while it held it in the middle in its bill; and it was only after a series of vain efforts that, by mere chance, it at last accomplished its object by happening to seize it near one end instead of the center. In this case it appeared to the observer that the building instincts of this bird were complete and perfect within a certain range, but without the limits of this circle it had no deliberate foresight to guide its action.—[British Quarterly.]

MAN'S FOOD.—What do men really live upon? The answers will be various enough. The Guacho, who is the wild pampas of Buenos Ayres, managing his half-wild horse with incredible dexterity, throws the lasso or bolas to catch the ostrich, the guanaco, or the wild bull, consumes daily from ten to twelve pounds of meat, and regards it as a high feast day when in any hacienda he gains a variety in the shape of a morsel of pumpkin. The word bread does not exist in his vocabulary. The Irishman, on the other hand, regales himself in careless mirth on his "potatoes and point," after a day of painful labor, he who cannot help making a joke even of the name he gives to his scanty meal. Meat is a strange idea to him, and he is happy indeed if four times a-year he can add a herring to season the mealy tubers. The hunter of the prairies lays low the buffalo with sure bullet; and its juicy, fatstreaked hump, roasted between two hot stones, is to him the greatest of delicacies. Meanwhile, the industrious Chinese carries to market his carefully fattened rats, delicately arranged upon white sticks, certain to find a good customer among the epicures of Peking; and in his hot, smoky hut, fast buried beneath the snow and ice, the Greenland consumer his fat, which he has just carved, rejoicing over the costly prize, from a stranded whale. Here the black slave sucks the sugar-cane, and eats his banana; there the African merchant fills his wallet with sweet dates, his sole sustenance in the long desert journey; and there the Siamese crams himself with a quantity of rice from which an European would shrink appalled. And whosoever over the whole inhabited earth we approach and demand hospitality, in almost every little spot a different kind of food is set before us, and the "daily bread" offered in another form.

CORRECT SPEAKING.—We advise all young people to acquire in early life the habit of using good language, both in speaking and writing, and to abandon as early as possible any use of slang words and phrases. The longer they live the more difficult the acquisition of such language will be; and if the golden age of youth, the proper season for the acquisition of language, be passed in its abuse, the unfortunate victim of neglected education is very probably doomed to talk slang for life. Money is not necessary to procure this education. Every man has it in his power. He has merely to use the language which he reads instead of the slang which he hears; to form his taste from the best speakers, writers, and poets of the country; to treasure up choice phrases in his memory, and habituate himself to their use—avoiding at the same time that pedantic precision and bombast, which bespeak rather the weakness of a vain ambition than the polish of an educated mind. There is no man, however low in rank, who may not materially benefit his financial condition by following this advice, and cultivating at the same time such morals and manners as correspond in character with good words.

MAIDEN, KEEP THY HEART FROM LOVE.

WRITTEN FOR THE GAZETTE OF THE UNION AND GOLDEN RULE,
BY MRS. H. S. DE GROVE.

MAIDEN, keep thy heart from love—
There is danger,
Which the trusting often prove,
In the ranger.
Oh! trust not, when gallants say
Thou art fair—
For they laugh, when once the prey
Of their snare.
Few there are, who'll not deceive
The unwary.—
Prithee, then, not one believe,
Gentle Mary.
Mother, now my heart doth ache—
Love's tale is known—
And thy gentle words but wake
Sad echo's moan.
Ah! it was a beauteous beam,
Swiftly cast,
Like bright fancies seen in dream
When sleep hath past.—
Was it, then, my fault alone,
I heedless grew?
For, with thy precept, ever shone
Example, too.

THE PROFLIGATE.

A TALE FOR THE NEW YEAR.

DURING the summer of 1839 I resided at Marseilles. The ravishing beauties of the Mediterranean presented infinite attractions; the picturesque costumes of the multiform population that crowded the streets of the town, exhibiting types of almost all the races that have sprang from Adam, likewise chained me to the spot.

On the last day of the year I received two visits—one was from Monsieur le Propriétaire, the other from my portier. Both visitors had a common object—to wish me many happy new years, and a thousand other good things, including that best of all, immortal felicity. Throughout France the new year is ushered in with a vast deal more of ceremony than we wot of in Old England, and new year's gifts are there universally exchanged.

I received my guests like a man who feels himself flattered by peculiar deference, although I felt perfectly assured that the visits with which I was "honored" were a matter of course. A couple of bottles of champagne and a few bonbons were the portion which I contributed to the ceremony. I gave M. le Propriétaire a most respectful embrace, and left in the portier's hand the customary gift of ten francs. The latter saluted me profoundly and retired. The Propriétaire installed himself right in front of my wood-fire, crossed his legs, and began speaking with true Gallican familiarity of horses, carriages, women, young bloods, and the opera. M. le Propriétaire was a consummate dandy! He was the owner in fee of several of the best houses in Marseilles, which brought him in an income of 80,000 francs per annum—more than 3000*l.* sterling. Such a man would not have been despised in England; in Marseilles he was a very important personage indeed.

"Have you any time to lose?" quoth M. le Propriétaire.

"Yes, undoubtedly, I am at your service. Pray, to what may your question relate?"

"I want you to give me your advice."

"You do me too much honor."

"I know that you are a man of taste, and desire to consult you."

"I am all attention."

"It is a private history. You will keep it secret?"

"Depend upon my fidelity."

"Here it is: Six years ago, when I purchased this house, one of my friends recommended to me a poor fellow dying of hunger. Though we landlords—unfortunate wretches that we are—are besieged daily and hourly by applicants for relief, I could not help being moved, first by the poor wretch's appearance of genuine suffering, and next by an excessively pretty girl, whom he led by the hand—his daughter. She was just fourteen years old, a most charming girl; large black eyes, full of soul and sentiment; a shape remarkably fine for a girl of her age; small feet, small hands, a Grecian nose; hair glossy black and silken; add to all this a most seductive air of modesty, simplicity, and candor—"

"In short, you fell in love with her."

"I became their protector; I had a place to dispose of; I installed both father and child, and since that hour of good fortune, for myself as well as them I have been their good genius."

"Yours is a real happiness, my dear sir, to be able thus to congratulate yourself upon having performed a good action, from the most disinterested motives. Assuredly you cannot better employ either your time or your fortune."

M. le Propriétaire made a slight grimace, and proceeded:

"Stop—you have not heard all. When one is determined upon doing good, he should avoid, as far as possible, doing it by halves. The poor child interested me beyond measure. The ease and comfort which her modest employment procured her—a simple seamstress—her joy at seeing her dear father prosperous; the gay and cheerful vivacity of her age; and, lastly, the devil, who always mixes himself up in these matters, made her a most fascinating creature, whom I loved passionately, in spite of every effort to the contrary. One morning I sent for her father, who presented himself before me with all the profound respect and humility of a man whose life you have been the means of saving, when the following dialogue ensued between us:

"You did me the honor to send for me, sir?"

"Yes. Your daughter is fourteen years old is it not so?"

"At the feast of St. Benoit."

"For what station in life do you destine her?"

"Sir," replied the good man, in a tone of deep emotion, "my first object is to make her a good and honest woman, like her mother before her."

"But you must not be indifferent to her prospects for the future."

"Alas, sir, if I could only get her taught to become a good seamstress, so as to shine in the business in these parts, her fortune might be made, with a little prudence and economy."

"Will you permit me to make choice of a state of life for your daughter?"

"I owe you too much already, sir. You quite overwhelm me with your goodness," and the warm-hearted man was constrained to wipe away a tear.

"Will you leave me the choice without compliments?"

"Yes, yes, sir. Choose her condition. Make her a good and happy woman. Only recommend to her never to forget her poor old father in her elevation."

"Good! I undertake to provide for her."

"And what will you make of her, sir? What do you intend to make of the dear girl? Pardon me for asking this much."

"You shall know all that in a little time. It will depend on the abilities she displays. She shall enter a school to-morrow, where she shall be instructed by competent masters; and in three or four years, when she shall have become an accomplished woman, I shall restore her to you, with a position in life which shall be the just recompense of the diligence with which she will have availed herself of this liberal course of instruction."

"The tears which filled the old man's eyes rolled down his cheeks in a torrent of gratitude. He could find no other mode of expressing his feelings than by devoting to me the entire of his after-life."

"Arise," said I, "my good-hearted friend; go and tell your daughter the good that is in store for her, and hold her in readiness for ten o'clock to-morrow."

"The next day we set out together, and the young girl was placed at a first-rate school, from whence she was destined to depart lovelier than ever, and far more accomplished than the most sanguine would have dared to hope. Each successive year she came to spend a short time with her father, and Rosalie's charms and wonderful grace soon began to attract universal admiration. I saw her with a joy which bordered on extravagance. Elated with my own work, I participated in the old man's pride at beholding this beautiful flower, which grew up in matchless loveliness by our side. I sounded her young heart, to discover, if possible, whether a place was reserved for me; and whether that place was yielded through love or gratitude. That heart retained its virgin purity. Love had not entered there."

"In truth, my good sir," I interposed, "this is a most interesting history, and redounds greatly to your honor."

"Not at all, not at all; the most difficult part is yet to come. This day concludes the fourth year of Rosalie's education. She has already surpassed her masters; and her age renders it necessary to withdraw her from a seminary where she has nothing more to learn. To-morrow I shall take her to her father. But to fulfil exactly the condition which I have voluntarily imposed upon myself, I must restore her to him with a social position, which her education renders it extremely difficult to choose. I desire to consult you. Speak without reserve, Monsieur l'Anglais, you are a man of the world—no speculator nor enthusiastic. How would you extricate yourself from this position?"

"I must first ask you a question."

"What is it?"

"Do you love this beautiful girl?"

"Do I love her? For four long years have I been dreaming but of her. Do I love her? Why, absolutely to distraction!"

"You can have no need of advice, then. You are the happiest of men. Receive my most sincere congratulations."

"What do you mean?"

"That you are speedily blest, my dear sir, since you have met with that which is often sought for through a whole lifetime in vain. You have formed the heart of a lovely and amiable woman to your own image. You can seat her by your side, and when you give her your hand, you can—"

"You are surely dreaming, my dear sir."

"How?"

"Would you have me marry the daughter of my servant?"

"My good sir, you have assured me that you love her. You have made her an accomplished lady, and I see no reason why you should not marry her."

Monsieur le Propriétaire burst into a loud fit of laughter, and overturned at once the entire of the romantic scaffolding which I had been erecting during the course of his recital. I remained silent and stupefied.

"Bless me, dear sir," he resumed, "you must really find me out something better than that. The marriage ceremony grows quite antiquated. It were a tasteless present for the new year. Let us find some more novel expedient."

"I have, in truth, no other means by which I can extricate you from your position, and am vexed at my incapacity."

"We must not despair too soon. Let us seek, and we may find something. Recollect that the business is of a pressing nature; it cannot be postponed beyond to-morrow. I must then find two new year's gifts—one for the father, the other for the daughter."

"The father," I said, "will be abundantly gifted by the restoration of his daughter. We need not trouble ourselves about him. Then for the young lady, there need be no difficulty in her case, either—unless your love for her should unfortunately take the wrong direction."

"This new year has absolutely turned your head. It is the love which I feel for the daughter that embarrasses me in the father's presence. It is the father alone that causes me my anxiety. As for the daughter I know well enough what is to be done with her."

"And what is that?"

"You wish to have a laugh at my expense."

"No; I have not a thought of laughter, for I begin to understand you. You have labored for four long years in perfecting the old man's new year's gift. You have a fertile genius, and your notion might figure in the darkest melodrama. To-morrow you will say to the father: 'Here is gold to recompense your faithful services; your daughter belongs to me; I have acquired an inalienable right over her, for to me she owes her expensive education. She can no longer live in your condition; and I am about to elevate her through your dishonor, to the social height for which I destined her from the very first day when you called me your preserver, and devoted to me your life.' All this will sound exceedingly pathetic; and the old man will doubtless murmur forth his thanks, and repeat that you have acted towards him 'as a God.'"

"My friend, you wax warm; and, in fact, you have laid hold of the thread of the whole intrigue. This is exactly what struck me from the first, and I mean to act precisely as you have said. I have bought a charming britschka, with two magnificent English horses. You shall see the lovely girl in her equipage; you shall see with what grace her exquisite little feet will spurn the leopard's skin on which they shall repose; with what an air she shall wear her furs and her satins. Prithee, be not envious. You are a furious moralist to-day. By the way, it is not surprising that you should be; for the 31st of December is most fatiguing, from the number of visits one is obliged to pay. Au revoir, au revoir."

I was deeply mortified at the part which I was compelled to play in this frightful conversation. Contempt, disgust, and horror were the sole feelings which my mind could harbor. A knock was heard at my door. The porter presented himself, with his hat under his arm, and a small wooden case in his left hand.

"Are you engaged, sir?"

"No."

"Can you favor me with a few minute's conversation? I have to request your advice."

I could not help smiling ironically, and replied by requesting him to be seated.

"Ah, sir, I cannot hold myself down in a chair on a day like this. I am happier than a prince."

"So much the better for you. Speak."

"Sir, you are the friend of my master, the proprietor of this house."

"I am not his friend; but proceed."

"Ah, sir, you have been stopping here but a few months, and you do not know the history of Monsieur P., who is indeed the friend of the unfortunate."

I interrupted him with impatience.

"Well, sir, I will confess to you that, if I am now a living man—if I am at my ease—if my poor Rosalie is beautiful and accomplished, it is to Monsieur P. that I owe it all."

"You!" I cried, looking at the wretched father with the liveliest interest.

"Yes, sir, I was dying of hunger—had no clothes—no asylum. I presented myself before him—I did not supplicate him; yet this good Monsieur P. placed me here, in this house; for four years he has supported, clothed, befriended me. And then, sir, he has taken the charge of my daughter's education, placed her at one of the first schools in Marseilles, and taken as much care of her as if she were a duchess. To-morrow—yes, to-morrow, he is going to restore her to me—too charming, it is true, for me to look on without being dazzled. But this is not all. He has promised to make her a present, which will insure her happiness for life. How god-like he is in his actions!"

"And what do you desire me to do for you, my friend?"

"Sir, I know you to be a man of prudence, and I came to ask your advice."

"Well."

"You cannot but feel, sir, that I can ill-bear the burden of this debt without acquitting myself, as far as my humble means will permit, towards my noble benefactor."

"You are a man of the highest principles."

"My good sir, it is the heart that speaks—and my heart has never been ungrateful."

"Well, how are you going to act?"

"I am not rich, and my four years' savings do not amount to a large sum. But my intention is good, and that is sufficient. I have long thought on the means of proving my gratitude to Monsieur P.; but my imagination is none of the liveliest, and it is not without a world of pains that I have thought of consecrating all my savings to immortalize my preserver's generosity."

"To immortalize? Your preserver?"

"Yes, to immortalize him! Look, sir," he said, as he opened the wooden case which he held in his left hand—"here is what they call 'a group'—it is of the finest marble, and the resemblance is striking. It represents Monsieur P. rescuing us from misery, covering us with his protection, and pointing to a brilliant future. How shall I introduce this into his sleeping apartment, so that to-morrow morning, at waking, he may find it for his new year's gift? I should never dare to make my appearance with it before him. Pray, give me your advice, and tell me first whether you think it prettily executed?"

"I shall give you both advice and warning. Listen to me attentively, and without interruption."

"Yes, sir."

"Break this marble into a thousand pieces! Your pretended benefactor is an infamous seducer, who for four years has been making you the victim of a cowardly deception. He has made an accomplished woman of your daughter—not for your sake, nor for hers, but for himself!"

"How? what?"

"Unhappy father! you will see to-morrow. To-morrow, instead of restoring you your daughter, he will present you, for your new year's gift, with a bag of crowns, (a mere trifle to him) and will make himself a present of your daughter."

"What a monstrous deed! It is impossible, sir!"

"To-morrow! Inform me of the moment when you will be all three together, and then you will see whether I have deceived you."

The poor old man had turned deadly pale, and shook as if in a palsy. His footsteps faltered as he took his leave, and I heard stifled sobs in my ante-chamber."

The 1st of January, 1840, was a lovely winter's day. Every roof in Marseilles was gilded by the sun. The streets were crowded with persons eager to partake of the festivities of the day; and the rich dashed the mud from their chariot-wheels upon the garments of the poor, as upon other days of the year. A splendid britschka stopped before my porte-cochere. A woman of admirable beauty descended from it. Monsieur P. gave her his arm. The porter gave me a sign to follow him; but I could not comply with his wish, for Monsieur P. politely shut the door in my face.

At the expiration of half an hour the porter came down stairs, leading his daughter by the hand. His air was calm and dignified, and he seemed to be the taller by some inches than before. I ran to the door; and endeavoring to hide his tears, he said:

"Monsieur P. is a demon, who has given me a glimpse of hell!"

"What do you intend doing?"

"He will pursue us!"

"I will take you under my protection."

"Alas! alas!" said the old man. His daughter was bathed in tears.

For nine years past Rosalie has been my wedded wife. Her father is the most excellent father the world ever saw. As for Rosalie, I shall keep to myself the radiant record of perhaps the sole wedded history that never has had one blot upon its page. OMEGA.

THE DEFECTS OF FEMALE EDUCATION.—The difference between the mental qualities of the sexes is owing, we apprehend, far more to education than to nature. At all events, there is no such natural difference as warrants the distinction we make in the mental discipline we provide for them. There are certain professional studies with which no one thinks of vexing the mind of any one, man or woman, but those who intend to practice the professions; but why, in a good English library, there should be one half of it, and that the better half, which a young woman is not expected to read—this we never could understand, and never reflect on with common patience. Why may not a Locke, or a Paley, or a Dugald Stewart, train the mind of the future mother of a family? or why may not an intelligent young woman be a companion, for her brother or her husband in his more serious moods of thought, as well as in his gayer and more trifling? Would the world lose any thing of social happiness or moral refinement by this intellectual equality of the two sexes? You vex the memory of a young girl with dictionaries and vocabularies without end; you tax her memory in every conceivable manner; and at an after age you give the literature of sentiment freely to her pillage; but that which should step between the two—the culture of the reason this is entirely forbidden. If she learns a dozen modern languages, she does not read a single book in any one of them that would make her think. Even in her religious library the same distinction is preserved. Books of sentimental piety—some of them maudlin enough—are thrust with kindest anxiety and most liberal profusion upon her. Any work of theology, any work that discusses and examines, is as carefully excluded.—[Blackwood's Magazine.

GERTRUDE VON DER WART.

HER hands were clasped, her dark eyes raised,
The breeze threw back her hair,
Up to the fearful wheel she gazed:
All that she loved was there.
The night was round her, clear and dark,
The holy heavens above;
Its pale stars watching to behold
The might of earthly love.

"And bid me not depart," she cried;

"My Rudolph, say not so;

This is no time to quit thy side—

Peace, peace! I cannot go.

Hath the world sought for me to fear,

When death is on thy brow?

The world—what means it? mine is here!

I will not leave thee now.

"I have been with thee in thine hour

Of glory and of bliss;

Doubt not its memory's living power

To strengthen me in this.

And thou, my honored love and true,

Bear on—bear nobly on!

We have the blessed Heaven above,

Whose rest shall soon be won."

And were not these high words to flow

From woman's breaking heart?

Through all that night of bitterest wo

She bore her lofty part.

But, oh! with such a glazing eye,

With such a curdling cheek,

Love—love of mortal agony—

Thou—only thou couldst speak.

The wind rose high, but with it rose

Her voice, that he might hear.

Perchance that dark hour brought repose

To happy bosoms near;

While she sat shivering with despair

Beside his tortured form,

And pouring her deep soul in prayer

Forth on the rushing storm.

She wiped the death-damps from his brow,

With her pale hands and soft;

Whose touch upon the lute cords low

Had stilled his heart so oft.

She spread her mantle o'er his breast,

She bathed his lips with dew,

And on his cheek such kisses press'd

As hope and joy ne'er knew.

While even, as o'er a martyr's grave,

She knelt on that sad spot;

And weeping, blessed the God who gave

Her strength to forsake it not.

Oh, lovely are you, love and faith

Enduring to the last.

She had her meed—one smile in death;

And his worn spirit pass'd.

Those foes of Truth, they poke, and dig, and mine,—
The faithful Tree they soon will overthrow!
Nay, fear not, friend, though hosts their toil combine,
They move the earth and help the tree to grow.

Choice Miscellany.

MY OWN.

BY ELIZA COOK.

- "My own, my own"—oh! who shall dare
To set this seal of claim on earth?
When "chance and change" are everywhere,
On all and each of human birth.
- "My own, my own"—these words are breathed,
By the young mother o'er her child;
Her Hope and Joy about it wreathed,
Like moss to wood-flowers—warm and wild.
- "My own, my own"—so gently sighs
The doting lover to his bride,
Finding his sunshine in her eyes,
His world of Pleasure by her side.
- "My own, my own"—so gaily sings
The merchant with exulting lip,
While the strong Eastern pinion brings
The heavy freight and gallant ship.
- "My own, my own"—the miser cries,
O'er tarnish'd dross and parchment fold,
Chain'd where his cumbrous coffer lies,
With hand all close, and heart all cold.
- "My own, my own"—the poet one
Thus fondly hails his minstrel power,
While dreaming in the summer sun,
Or musing in the moonlight hour.
- "My own, my own"—the fair girl says,
Noting her beauty, young and bright,
Smoothing her ringlet as it strays
Upon her cheek, with proud delight.
- "My own, own"—these words resound
Distinctly through the Babel noise,
From kings with mighty nations round,
And infants o'er their gather'd toys.
- "My own, my own"—ay, thus we boast—
Short-sighted worshippers of clay;
Yet where's the heart that holds no ghost
Of treasures lent and snatch'd away?
- Who has not stood beneath life's tree,
Reapt by some song-bird perching nigh;
And when the music seem'd to be
The sweetest, seen the warbler fly?
- Who has not planted some fair shoot,
Nursing it as the garden gem,
And seen foul canker sap its root,
Or rushing storm-wind snap the stem?
- Do we not meet hard blows, that fall
Upon the pile deem'd most secure?
Do we not grieve the strokes that leave
The poet mad, the rich man poor?
- Do we not see deep love estranged—
Thrust from the heart it held so dear;
And all the dazzling garlands changed
For willow-branches, dead and sere?
- Do we not see the pest-worm steal
The rose of beauty to destroy?
Does not the frantic mother kneel
Beside her "own," her coffin'd boy?
- "My own, my own,"—oh, cheating speech!
How soon its falsehood smites the breast
What monitors come nigh to teach
Man to be humble while he's blest!
- Who shall presume with boasting hand
To trace such words on ought below?
It is but writing on the sand,
Where troubled waters ebb and flow.
- Our "talents" are but held in trust,
Grasp them as closely as we will;
And draughts that swim with highest brim
The lightest touch will serve to spill.
- "My own, my own,"—oh! who shall dare
Thus to defy pain, wo, and strife,
When chance and change are everywhere,
And Death walks hand in hand with Life?

A GREEK FUNERAL.

I remember when they buried that bright-eyed Greek maiden, snatched suddenly from earth, when her young heart was light as her face was fair, they arrayed her, so rigid and motionless, in the gay dress she had never worn but for some great fete or gala, as through this, more than any, were a day of rejoicing for her; and thus attired, with her long hair spread out over her still bosom all decked with flowers, they laid her uncoffined in her grave. At her feet they placed a small flask of wine and a basket of corn, in accordance with an ancient Greek superstition, which supposes that for three days and nights the disembodied spirit lingers mournfully round its tenement of clay, the garment of its mortality, wherein as a pilgrim and a stranger on the earth, it lived and loved, it sinned and suffered!

As soon as the first symptoms of decay announce that the curse of corruption is at work, they believe that the purer essence departs to purer realms. Before the grave was closed, while for the last time the warm radiance of the sunset cast a glow like the mockery of life over the marble face of the poor young girl, her friends, as a last precaution, took measures to ascertain that she was actually dead, and not in a swoon. The means they always take in such instances to ascertain a fact which elsewhere would be insured by a doctor's certificate, is touching in the extreme; the person whom, while alive, it was known the deceased loved best, the mother, or it may be the young betrothed, who had hoped to place on her head the gay and bridal crown, instead of the green laurel garland of death, advances and calls her by her name, repeating after it the word ella (come) several times, in a tone of the most passionate entreaty; if she is mute to this appeal, if she is deaf to the voice dearest to her on earth, then they no longer doubt that she is dead indeed; they cover up the grave, lift their eyes to the heaven where they believe her to be—for the Greeks do not hold to the doctrine of purgatory—and, having made the sign of the cross, they depart in silence to their homes. But a year after, on the anniversary of the death, they return to the grave, and kneeling down, lay their lips to the sod, and whisper to the silent tenant that they love her stile, that she is yet remembered and regretted.

THE BEAR.—The bear is capable of general attachment. Leopold Duke of Lorraine had a bear called Marco, of the sagacity of which we have the following remarkable instance: During the winter of 1709 a Savoyard boy, ready to perish with cold in a barn, in which he had been put by a good woman with some more of his companions, thought proper to enter Marco's hut, without reflecting on the danger which he ran by exposing himself to the mercy of the animal which occupied it. Marco, however, instead of doing any injury to the child, took him between his paws, and warmed him by pressing him to his breast until next morning, when he suffered him to depart to ramble about the city. The young Savoyard returned in the evening to the hut, and was received with the same affection. For several days he had no other retreat, and it added not a little to his joy to observe that the bear regularly reserved part of his food for him. A number of days passed in this manner without the servants knowing any thing of the circumstances. At length, when one of them came one day to bring the bear his supper rather later than ordinary, he was astonished to see the animal roll its eyes in a furious manner, and seeming as if he wished him to make as little noise as possible for fear of waking the child, whom he had clasped to his breast. The bear, though ravenous, did not appear the least moved with the food which was placed before him. The report of this extraordinary circumstance was soon spread at court, and reached the ears of Leopold, who, with part of his courtiers, was desirous of being satisfied with the truth of Marco's generosity. Several of them passed the night near his hut, and beheld with astonishment that the bear never stirred as long as his guest showed an inclination to sleep. At break of day the child awoke, was much ashamed to find himself discovered, and fearing that he would be punished for his temerity, begged pardon. The bear, however, caressed him, and endeavored to prevail on him to eat what had been brought the morning before, which he did at the request of the spectators, who afterwards conducted him to the prince. Having learned the whole history of this singular alliance, and the time which it had continued, Leopold ordered care to be taken of the little Savoyard.

Pencilings from New Works.

MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

SIGHINGS AFTER THE PAST.—It is now the fashion to place the golden age of England in times when noblemen were destitute of comforts the want of which would be intolerable to a modern footman; when farmers and shopkeepers breakfasted on loaves the very sight of which would raise a riot in a modern workhouse; when men died faster in the purest country air than they now die in the most pestilential lanes of our towns; and when men died faster in the lanes of our towns than they now die on, the coast of Guiana. We, too, shall in our turn be outstripped, and in our turn be envied. It may well be, in the twentieth century, that the peasant of Dorsetshire may think himself miserably paid with 15s. a week; that the carpenter of Greenwich may receive 10s. a day; that laboring men may be as little used to dine without meat as they now are to eat rye-bread; that sanitary police and medical discoveries may have added several more years to the average length of human life; that numerous comforts and luxuries which are now unknown or, confined to a few, may be within the reach of every diligent and thrifty working man. And yet it may then be the mode to assert that the increase of wealth and the progress of science, have benefited the few at the expense of the many, and to talk of the reign of Queen Victoria as the time when England was truly merry England, when all classes were bound together by brotherly sympathy, when the rich did not grind the faces of the poor, and the poor did not envy the splendor of the rich.

CIVILIZATION.—Of the blessings which civilization and philosophy bring with them, a large proportion is common to all rank, and would, if withdrawn, be missed as painfully by the laborer as by the peer. The market place which the rustic can now reach with his cart in an hour, was, a hundred and sixty years ago, a day's journey from him. The street which now affords to the artisan, during the whole night, a secure, a convenient, and a brilliantly-lighted walk, was, a hundred and sixty years ago, so dark after sunset that he would not have been able to see his hand, so ill paved that he would have run constant risk of breaking his neck, and so ill watched that he would have been in imminent danger of being knocked down, and plundered of his small earnings. Every bricklayer who falls from a scaffold, every sweeper of a crossing who is run over by a carriage, may now have his wounds dressed and his limbs set with a skill such as, a hundred and sixty years ago, all the wealth of a great lord like Ormond, or of a merchant prince like Clayton, could not have purchased. Some frightful diseases have been extirpated by science, and some have been banished by police.

CHARACTER OF CRANMER.—The man who took the chief part in settling the condition of the alliance which produced the Anglican Church was Thomas Cranmer. He was the representative of both the parties which at that time needed each other's assistance. He was at once a divine and a statesman. In his character of a divine he was desirous to preserve that organization which had, during many ages, admirably served the purposes of the Bishops of Rome, and might now be expected to serve equally well the purposes of the English Kings and their Ministers. His temper and his understanding eminently fitted him to act as mediator. Sainly in his professions, unscrupulous in his dealings, zealous for nothing, bold in speculation, a coward and a time-server in action, a placable enemy, and a luke-warm friend; he was in every way qualified to arrange the terms of the coalition between the religious and the worldly enemies of popery.

SENSE AND WIT.—Prefer solid sense to wit; never study to be diverting without being useful; let no jest intrude upon good manners, nor say anything that may offend modesty.

I. O. OF O. F.

Office of the Grand Secretary Grand Lodge State of New-York:

ODD FELLOW'S HALL, CITY OF NEW-YORK, }
 March 13, 1849. }

To District Deputy Grand Masters, Officers of Lodges, and Brethren:

In consequence of the many complaints made to this Office of the failure of Deputies, Officers of Lodges and Members to receive communications which have been issued from this Office, and of the failure to receive many communications which have been intended to reach this Office, for several months last past, and which have been transmitted by Deputies, Lodges and individuals, you are therefore notified and requested to address all communications intended for the Grand Lodge, Grand Master, or Grand Secretary, to BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Box No. 838, Post Office, New-York, and in all cases to be particular that Letters and Documents are properly mailed, in order that a failure of papers intended for this, or sent from this Office, to reach their destination, may be traced to the proper cause.

Fraternally yours,

BENJAMIN J. PENTZ, Grand Secretary.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

We find the following remarks in the "Times" of last Sunday, and introduce them here as a text, to lead the way to certain thoughts we wish to utter, in regard to secret societies:

SECRET SOCIETIES.—We are realizing in this country some of the fruits which have made European monarchs, tyrants, and despots—and these are secret associations and societies of foreigners, who, accustomed at home to burrow in secret, and avoid spies and police, cannot in this country surrender the practice. Here they are not dangerous, because if ever directed against the government, or attempts are made to control the measures of government, there is a native power and energy ever ready to arrest the evil. We make these remarks in consequence of seeing in the German Schnellpost a proclamation from German secret societies, the secretary of which is a respectable man residing in Philadelphia, offering a large reward in money for the head of the Emperor of Austria, and corresponding amounts for that of the King of Prussia and other crowned heads, generals, and others, who have, in defending royalty, assailed, put down, and put to death the patriots who were struggling to establish free governments. It is very true that such individual acts cannot compromise our government, as we have no censorship of the press, and have no right to interfere with those who are not violating our laws; but it is extreme bad taste, and utterly repugnant to the wishes of every American citizen, for foreigners to make this country, which is affording them an asylum, the theater for fulminating such proclamations and decrees. Safe themselves, and beyond the reach of their own sovereigns and potentates, why should rewards be offered in this country for any king or general? If these patriots are so anxious to rid the world of tyrants, why not go in person, and take the hazard of such an act? Why, sitting in safety and comfort in their domicils, invite any assassin to kill the Emperor of Austria, and call for the money when the deed is done—as if it were carrying out a law to kill dogs? It is, as we conceive, a great act of assurance towards any nation at peace with the United States—a most unwarrantable measure—and under our laws, if complaint was made, they could be held answerable for such acts.

We are surprised that Maj. Noah, whose views are generally so correct, should allow himself to pen, or even to admit to his columns, an article so utterly absurd as the foregoing. Maj. Noah is wise, he is a philosopher, and especially is a republican—and yet he utters here the most foolish, unphilosophical, and anti-republican doctrines imaginable. In the first place he attempts to throw ridicule and contempt upon those earnest, true, and self-sacrificing spirits, who are struggling in Europe for the establishment of "Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality." He compares the republicans of France, Germany and Italy, who employ the secret principle, as a means of human progress, to ferocious beasts, who "burrow in secret." He speaks of them as the enemies of "European Monarchs," as indeed they are, and apparently sympathizes with those outraged individuals, who are obliged by these secret societies to become "tyrants and despots." So then, kings, and princes, and emperors, are tyrannical and despotical because there are secret societies. What stupid ignorance! And what strange language to come from the lips of a republican editor, in this republican country and age!

Probably no person living is better acquainted with secret societies of all ages than our humble self, and we assert that so far from meriting reproof and condemnation, they are entitled to the gratitude and sympathy of all who seek to advance the interests of their race. To say nothing of those ancient societies which, in earlier ages, gave man a civilization, the arts, philosophy, and ethics, and which tamed and polished the primitive people, the secret societies which have been active in Europe for the last fifty years, have, with few exceptions, been composed of men wiser, purer, and nobler than the world around them, and who have earnestly labored to establish man in his primitive rights. What does not Republicanism owe to Freemasonry; that great and good association which has preserved and cherished the precious idea of liberty and brought it down safely through so many despotical ages? The assertion of the "Times" is a libel on all secret societies which have ever existed, and a base calumny of republicanism. Secret societies may be, and no doubt are, dangerous to despotical and tyrannical governments, for their very breath is freedom, and republicanism is the ideal they wish to incarnate in the world's life. To complain of secret societies, therefore, is to complain of freedom, to oppose them is to oppose its progress. With us they are not destructive, and cannot be destructive; but conservative. They are ordained by Providence to overturn gradually, despotism and aristocracy—to preserve order in times of transition and revolution, and to re-establish humanity in freedom and truth, and love, and to urge the race forward, unceasingly, towards a higher and more perfect state.

NEW-YORK ODD-FELLOWS' LIBRARY.

We have from time to time notified our readers of the progress of this great enterprise, which, we trust, will in a few weeks be brought to a successful result. It is expected the Library will open about the first of May, at the Odd-Fellows' Hall, Grand-street, corner of Center. The plan for the establishment and support of the institution which was first offered by Bro. E. S. RALPHS—viz. the imposition of a weekly penny tax on the entire membership of the city—has been partially departed from, although we doubt not the Lodges will all come into this measure in the end.

The Library Committee, of which we have the honor to be a member, have prepared the Constitution, which will be presented to the Convention next Thursday evening, at which time it is expected there will be a full representation of Lodges.

We are exceedingly gratified to see the deep interest which the entire Order in this city appears to feel in regard to this noble enterprise. It speaks well for our Association, and it gives us an opportunity of repeating an assertion we have more than once made, that Odd-Fellowship will each succeeding year reveal some new capacity for good, some new adaptation to the wants and circumstances of men. This Library will be a noble monument for our Order, more glorious and enduring than pillars of granite or of marble, as well as a never-failing means of intellectual and moral progress for the Brotherhood.

We shall publish hereafter a full account of this institution; meanwhile we hope our brethren of the city will not forget, that the Library Convention meets next Thursday evening, the 22d inst. at 38 Canal-street.

MRS. FANNY KEMBLE BUTLER.—Those who remember this lady in her range of tragic personations, have formed the idea that her powers are confined to the higher walks of the tragic drama only, and that in no other she excels. So far is this from being the case, that we have been delighted with the reading of the "Tempest" and the "Midsummers' Night's Dream." Besides their exquisite poetry, these plays are characterized by a humor quaint and broad, and which requires comic powers of no ordinary cast to read with effect. In portraying the humorous characters of these respective pieces, she was peculiarly happy. They spoke and acted with the most striking reality. We were completely lost in the illusions which the Genius of her art created. She gave embodiment and form to the creations of the mighty bard, and they stood out before you with all their originality, piquancy and the charm of nature with which they are invested. The net-work of imagination and creative fancy, the sweet illusions of love, the sighs, the struggles, and the tender breathings of the impassioned soul, also came from her lips with an irresistible power and sweetness; and the delightful pictures and airy structures of the poet's brain, his rich and wild conceptions, his beautifully sweet and glowing language, awakened in our minds a deep, fresh and vivid pleasure before unfelt and unknown.

HENRY CLAY AGAINST SLAVERY.—This distinguished citizen has recently addressed a letter to Mr. Richard Pindel, of Kentucky, on the subject of Slavery, in which he takes ground in favor of a provision in the New Constitution for the gradual abolition of Slavery in Kentucky. Mr. Clay says he was in favor of the gradual emancipation of the Slaves in 1790, and he deeply laments that the Constitution then adopted did not provide for it, as in that event, Kentucky would now be a free State. His idea at present is to fix a period, say 1855 or 1860, when all born after it should be free at a certain age, which he suggests should be 25 years; after which they are to be liable to be hired out by the State for a period not exceeding three years, for the purpose of raising the funds necessary to defray the expenses of their conveyance to Liberia. Their colonization he regards as a condition absolutely indispensable to their emancipation.

PORTRAIT OF P. G. MASTER J. R. TAYLOR.—This excellent engraved portrait of our much esteemed Bro. Taylor, is the production of Bro. Rawson Packard, a young artist of great promise. The mechanical execution of the engraving is fine, and although it is not so handsome as the original, it is a most striking likeness. It is published by Bro. P. G. Wm. Worts, an Odd-Fellow who has a heart as big as a mountain, and a zeal as untiring as the falls of Niagara. The engraving is sold at fifty cents a copy, and every brother, of course, will send to this office for one.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP IN THE SOUTH-WEST.

CONSECRATION OF THE ODD-FELLOWS' REST, NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 27, 1849.

DEAR SIR AND BRO.: It is so seldom that the readers of the Gazette and Golden Rule see any thing relative to the condition and prospects of the Order in this section of the Union, and particularly in this great commercial emporium of the South, that I have no doubt any information on the subject will be read with interest. Having looked for some time past in vain for some abler pen than mine to do justice to the theme, and finding communications in each number from every quarter except this, I have ventured upon the effort of saying a few words, in order to let your readers know that there is such a thing as Odd-Fellowship in New Orleans, as well as any where else.

There is, perhaps, no other section of the United States in which there is a wider field for the practice of those sublime principles of our Order, than this. Situated as it is, at the very extreme point of ingress and egress, it becomes the rendezvous of wanderers from every part of the Union and the world, in pursuit of either health or fortune, too often, alas! to the disappointment of both. How many of these, alone and friendless, would have perished in want and misery, without the helping aid of Odd-Fellowship, let the records of the Order tell. It is foreign both to its object and benefit, to publish them to the world; yet, although unheralded with pompous ceremonial and eclat, their good deeds have been no less certain, though in secret. Then again comes the ravages of the deadly pestilence, tearing asunder the bonds of earth, leaving the hearth desolate, and the widow and orphan a prey to misery and want, at a moment's warning. In such a strait is Odd-Fellowship ready to aid in binding the broken heart and causing the tear of gladness to succeed that of sorrow. And in no city does this occur more frequently than in New Orleans. To all such is our Order a heavenly blessing, and many are the prayers offered by such for its prosperity.

At present it is in a most flourishing condition, and unites within its folds the most respectable, intelligent and worthy of our citizens. Under the superintendence of our present efficient and well as most worthy Grand Master, (Bro. Emerson,) whose zeal in its behalf seems untiring, and who possesses the happy faculty of blending the suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re, we move along harmoniously and prosperously, daily with increasing strength, as well as usefulness. In no city in the Union does Odd-Fellowship enjoy a more enviable popularity, and comprise a larger proportion of its citizens, than does New Orleans at present.

Yesterday we had one of the most imposing processions ever witnessed in this city, an account of which I herewith enclose. It was on the occasion of dedicating a new cemetery, appropriately termed "Odd-Fellows' Rest." The following account of the same I clip from the Daily Picayune, which, if not too long, it will be very gratifying to every member of the Order in this city, and, no doubt, to your readers generally, many of whom may be found here, to see inserted. Wishing your excellent paper the success it deserves,

I remain yours, respectfully, in F. L. & T., J. H. B.

CONSECRATION OF ODD-FELLOWS' REST.

The ceremonies of consecrating the new burial ground of the Odd-Fellows at Cypress Grove yesterday took place, and one of the finest turnouts we have ever witnessed in New Orleans honored the occasion. At about 10 o'clock, A. M., nearly one thousand members of the Order from the different Lodges of the city, all of which were represented, assembled in the Place d'Armes, where a procession was formed under the direction of Major Gen. J. L. Lewis, assisted by Col. Labuzan and others. The procession, with its bands of music, the showy regalia of its members, and the splendid funeral car, drawn by six white horses, with black housings, formed a scene beautiful and picturesque in the extreme, and it was gazed upon with feelings of awe and respect as it marched to the sound of solemn music through the principal streets of the city. All contemplated the spectacle with emotion, and no one could fail to admire the sublime principles which draw together in the bands of brotherhood men of all classes and of all nations. The funeral car, driven by Mr. S. P. Stickney, a member of the Order, formed a grand feature in the procession, and excited general interest. It was got up with excellent taste, surmounted by a coffin, and bearing inside sixteen boxes, containing the ashes of Odd Fellows collected from the different cemeteries. The grand cortege moved from the Place d'Armes about half-past 11 o'clock, and proceeded down Conde and Moreau streets to Esplanade, up Royal to Canal, up north side of Canal to Rampart, down south side of Canal to Camp, up Camp to St. Joseph, and through St. Joseph to the New Basin, where conveyances to the cemetery were provided. The Shell Road from the Basin warehouse to the toll-gate was lined with omnibuses, thirty-five in number, chartered for the occasion, and they were all soon filled inside and covered on top.

The carriages were drawn by four horses each, all tastefully decorated and presenting a fine appearance. After a little delay, the procession, which, including the numerous vehicles of spectators, was more than a mile in length, was on its way again, the splendid band carriages of Messrs. Stone & McCollum's and Stickney's circuses leading the van. The carriages contained the circus bands, which discoursed some excellent music on the way down. The carriage of Messrs. Stone & McCollum was drawn by sixteen splendid horses, and that of Mr. Stickney by four, both of them being furnished for the occasion by the enterprising proprietors. The Grand Lodge proceeded to the cemetery in one of the passenger barges on the canal, and on its arrival the procession again formed on foot and marched over the bridge to the entrance of the "Odd-Fellows' Rest," where the Lodges were drawn up in line on each side of the road, and the funeral car, escorted by the Marshal and Grand Lodge, entered the enclosure. The scene at this point was also one of great interest and beauty. Every head was uncovered throughout the long lines as the car passed along and conveyed to their final resting place the mournful relics of deceased brothers.

Opposite the general reception tomb, erected to receive the remains of Odd-Fellows who have been buried elsewhere in the city, a comfortable stand was prepared, and to this the Grand Master, Mr. Emerson, Grand Chaplain, Mr. Hooper, the Rev. Brother Whitall, J. C. Larue, Esq., the orator of the day, and several other members of the Grand Lodge, ascended, when the procession marched in and formed with their banners around the spot. The Grand Master, Emerson, made some remarks in regard to the object for which they had assembled, and enjoined upon the brethren to attend with due respect to the solemn ceremonies. The Rev. Brother Whitall then made an eloquent and appropriate appeal to the Throne of Grace; after which the following ode, by J. L. Sheafe, was sung, the ladies, of whom there were a considerable number present, joining:

ODE.

I.

Field of repose! 'tis hallowed ground,
Where friends and Brothers peaceful sleep,
For here shall Friendship, Love and Truth
Their never-ceasing vigil keep.

II.

O! lost companions, on your urn
Sad wreaths we bind, sacred to you:
And while your hovering spirits bend,
Our high resolves we here renew.

III.

What, though in grim array ye came,
Nerveless and voiceless to our "Rest,"
Yet your free spirits spurn the clod,
Recalled to regions of the blest.

IV.

There in unbroken numbers met,
We'll emulate celestial powers,
Glad songs efface sad requiems
When their rapt spirits shall be ours.

V.

They are not here—the rescued dead—
Verdure and bloom spring from their dust.
Then to thy wave, on life's broad sea,
Return my soul, with constant trust.

The ode, sung to the tune of "Old Hundred," and given by the vast assemblage as with one voice, produced a powerful effect upon the feelings of all present, and we have never witnessed any thing more imposing. At the conclusion the Grand Chaplain proceeded to dedicate the cemetery, to be known as the "Odd-Fellows' Rest." A psalm from the Bible was then read by the Chaplain and members generally, when the orator of the day, Mr. J. C. Larue, was announced. Mr. L. stepped forward and delivered the following address:

Brothers—We have dedicated the "Odd-Fellows' Rest." We have brought hither the ashes of our departed friends; we have here prepared a last earthly abode for ourselves, and those who shall come after us, in order that they who are bound together by the ties of our holy brotherhood in life may not be separated even in the grave. The work in which we are engaged is peculiarly appropriate to our Order. In all ages of the world, and among all the races of mankind, a degree of respect, bordering upon veneration, has been shown to the remains of the dead; and whether by the customs of the people they were embalmed or burned or buried, the ceremony has always been regarded as a religious duty, and has called into action the deepest sympathies of the human heart. No nation has yet existed so refined as to despise—none yet been discovered so rude as to neglect these touching rites. An unfeeling philosophy may sneer at this display of emotion, and the cold utilitarian may find in it something to condemn, but the warm instincts of nature will ever triumph over the deductions of unsympathising reason or the sordid calculations of interest. Men sink not heedlessly to the grave like the brutes that perish. The living fondly cherish the memory of the departed, and the last wish of the dying is that some token of their existence may remain on earth to recall them to the remembrance of those whom they loved and respected. We would not altogether die—

"For who to dumb forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing, anxious being e'er resigned—
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing, lingering look behind."

To this deep-seated feeling of our nature we owe the vast Asiatic cities of the dead; many of the beautiful temples of Greece and Rome; much of the gorgeous architecture of the middle ages, and the hundreds of tasteful cemeteries which lend a melancholy interest to the neighborhood of the great cities of Europe and America. The same feeling gave existence to the wondrous pyramids, fit monuments of earth's mightiest rulers, and the rude stone-heap of the desert, where rest the body of some robber-chief—to the sculptured pomp of Westminster Abbey, and the whitened pailing, unpretending cross, and flower-covered grave of the simple cottager. Cast your eye around you, and you behold its workings here—on the right hand and on the left, you may behold the monuments and tombs, erected by the piety of the living to the memory of their departed friends—and even beyond, where the poor, the unknown and the friendless are buried, their graves are distinguished by some frail memorial of their past existence. How meet, then, that this sentiment which pervades all, should be manifested by our fraternity. How natural that those whose hands have been joined in the offices of friendship, whose hearts have communed together in the spirit of love, whose minds have been united in the contemplation of the power and sublimity of truth, should desire to mingle their ashes in the tomb. How proper that those whose duty it is to relieve the distressed, visit the sick, and bury the dead, should make all needful preparations for the decorous performance of the last act of kindness that man can render to his brother man. This preparation we have made. This burial place we have set apart for the reception of our dead. Here, remote from the din of the crowded city—distant from the toil and turmoil of life, the anxieties of business, the excitement of passion, and the strife of avarice and ambition; here, where the mementoes of man's mortality are all around us, where the dark cypress, fitting emblem, waves its mournful branches to the breeze, we have fixed our "rest." Solemn, yet dearly nourished, will be the associations connected with it henceforward. Here all that is earthly of the wise and the good, the brave and the beautiful, must submit to the great law of nature and be resolved into its original elements. We who now perform these ceremonies full of life, and strength and hope, must yield to the inevitable doom, and follow the generations that have gone before us. The duty which we now discharge toward others, those who come after us will discharge toward us. Here will our bodies repose and here our epitaphs be read. A few short years at most and we shall have fulfilled our destinies on earth, and have passed beyond the reach of its pleasures and its pains. Here the mother will weep over the grave of a much loved son, the widow will mourn the husband departed, the fair maiden will shed tears of sorrow over a father or a brother dead, and even strong and lion-hearted man will lament over hopes destroyed and the friendships of a life severed for ever.

How vividly does this scene, and the knowledge of those which must follow, recall the lessons which we have been taught? How strongly do they speak of the vanity of worldly things, the instability of wealth and power, and the certain decay of all earthly greatness? How effectively do they impress upon our hearts, that

"Tis not in empty or in vain delights,
Nor in the fading echoes of renown,
Power's purple robe or pleasure's flowery lap," that man should seek enjoyment. For what are all these things at last? What are they here while gilded vanity can make no more display, and squalid misery need not hide its head? Can the charms of beauty resist the progress of decay? Can the rich man carry his wealth to the grave, or the ambitious one wield his power beyond the tomb?

"Can honor's voice awake the silent dust,
Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?"

No! Here all distinctions cease. The king and the beggar are at last but molding clay. What a lesson to human pride! But why should man be proud? What is the earth which he inhabits but a point in space—what is he himself but an ephemeron in duration? The busy ant on the mole-hill, the sluggish insect on the cabbage leaf, or the gaudy butterfly that flutters an instant in the light and then is seen no more, is as great, compared with this vast universe, as the mightiest and the proudest who treads with haughty step and imperious eye among those who cringe around and fawn before him. He may deem himself a god, and he is but dust. Let him come here and learn a lesson of humility—learn how little he is, and how much less he will be. But if his mind be not shut to wisdom, and his heart still open to instruction, as he learns to be humble let him learn to hope. The grave is not the end—death is not annihilation. However insignificant in the scale of being man may be, he is still under the care of Him to whom the infinite and the infinitesimal are alike,

"Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish and a sparrow fall,
Atoms or systems into ruin hurled,
And now a bubble burst, and now a world."

And He, the great creator and preserver, would not have lighted the promethean spark within us to let it glimmer for a moment and then be quenched in eternal night. He would not have planted in our minds the love of the sublime, the beautiful, and the true, the irradicable hope of immortality, and the ardent yearning after the mysterious and the unknown, had we been intended merely to pass a few days on the earth and then to live no more. He would not thus have mocked his creatures. The grave is the end of our earthly career, but it is not our end. When yonder sun shall sink beneath the horizon, he will be seen no more by our eyes, yet will not his luster be dimmed—he will be shorn of no beam, robbed of no ray of glory, but as he courses through boundless space, will continue to shine on, brightly and for ever. So with the soul of man—the grave will shut its actions from our view, but it will not die. The dark "valley and the shadow of death" must be traversed, but it terminates at the portals of endless day. And the spirit of man, disburdened from the clogs of earth—released from the dominion of the animal appetites and passions,

"Shall flourish in eternal youth,
Unhurt amid the war of elements,
The wreck of matter and the crush of worlds."

scanning the workings of Almighty power, participating in the councils of divine wisdom, and basking for ever in the smiles of boundless and ineffable love.

Brothers, in view of our certain fate here, and of the bright and hopeful hereafter, with what devotion should we uphold the holy principles of our Order? These teach us to despise the vanities and selfishness of the world—to look beyond its wealth, its power, its titles or its praise—teach us to care but little what men say of us, or how we may be regarded by our fellow-worms—but to practice the virtues of temperance, prudence, honor and benevolence—to go about in the highways and byways, in the nooks and corners of the earth, doing good for the sake of good, not seeking the reward of men, but finding it in the improvement of our own hearts and in the bright hope of the treasure which we are laying up for ourselves in another and a better world. Let us never forget to practice lessons which we have been taught. Let us show that we are worthy members of that great brotherhood, by relieving distress, sharing our worldly goods with the destitute, smoothing the pillow and cooling the feverish brow of sickness, and finally, when all else has been done, by burying decently and respectfully the dead.

Brothers, neither my powers nor your patience will permit a long discourse. It is enough for me to have recalled to your minds on an occasion like this the principles and duties of our beloved Order. It aims to establish Friendship, Love and Truth, and to do this by the workings of Faith, Hope and Charity—

In our hearts, enshrined and cherished,
May these feelings ever bloom,
Failing not when life has perished,
Living still beyond the tomb.

The remarks of Mr. Larue were listened to with profound attention, and they produced a pleasing effect. The orator sat down amid solemn strains of music from the bands, which harmonized with the feelings of the audience. The Grand Master then announced Mr. G. W. Christy, who rose and recited the following poem, written by himself for the occasion:

POEM:

DELIVERED BY BROTHER GEO. W. CHRISTY,
N. G. of Crescent Lodge No. 8.

The solitude of Nature reigns around,
Sweet Echo sleeps within these shades profound,
No broken strain, no hum from active life,
Recalls ambition, and its endless strife.
But all alone, with Nature and her God,
In humble prayer, we consecrate this sod!
The mournful Cypress, with its outstretched arms—
The moss-grown Oak, so wreath'd with hoary charms—

Like Sponsors stand: and deeper shadows spread,
While thus we found this "City of the Dead."
Oh! fitting time, befitting place indeed,
To scan the past, and Life's sad history read.
The curse of Adam, and a fallen race,
On every page our eager glances trace:
And as we close the Book, with trembling breath,
We sigh to think, Man's history is Death!

First, mark the course of wild, impetuous Youth,
All hope, all joy, all eloquence, all truth;
Like billowing waves, succeeding visions rise,
Heaven beyond, and Earth a Paradise.
Sweet fancies, like the breath of early Spring,
Unnumbered harmonies around him fling,
And ere the soul yet feels her steady aim,
Dream carves Renown upon the heights of Fame:

No doubt intrudes when aspirations swell;
No hopes betrayed their disappointments tell;
But, like the train of maidens round a bride,
Fair angel forms are ever at his side:
Love whispers with her soft, impassioned tone,
And wooing, wins, to wear him as her own;
Each bashful art but half conceals her chains,
Whose golden links, while yielding, still restrains:
And Friendship, poised in attitude of grief,
With silent tears claims generous relief;

While untold purposes, to noble end, [blend
Sweep through the soul, and, lingering, sweetly
Success and triumph with each vision fair,
Which painted life a joy without its care!
How changed each scene. The evanescent dream,
Like glittering sunlight from the summer stream,
Have passed away: the visions of an hour
Have faded with the freshness of the flower!
Hope yields to doubt, and o'er the trembling soul
Dark fantasies like troubled waters roll!

Lo! Manhood next appears upon the stage—
Connecting link 'twixt Youth and feeble Age—
Full-armed for strife and panopied in pride,
Stern energies enlisted at his side,
And God-like Action bannered the way,
He stands a warrior, impatient of delay!
Now plies the ready hand each thrifful art,
Now toils the dizzy brain to play its part,
Till Wealth, accumulating, centers power,
And pompous Pride plays Nabob for the hour.

The midnight taper marks the Student's toil,
Whose flame grows brighter with the waning oil.
And o'er the field where outraged Mercy strays,
The Hero rushes to his meed of praise,
The wayward Poet wakes his tuneful lyre,
To notes of scorn, or Love's more soft desire.
The Statesman, pondering, knits his shaggy brow,
As pliant Sympathy makes its bow.
And gifted Eloquence, sweet child of song,
With wild, impassioned bursts, enslaves the throng!
Vain efforts all. The onward course of Time
But proves each struggle idle as this rhyme.
And Manhood turns from each ambitious aim,
To weep, in solitude, the emptiness of Fame.

Old Age, last scene of Life's eventful play,
Steals over us, like twilight's lingering ray;
And dreams of peace in Angel forms appear,
To shield from ill, what still the heart holds dear,
Each passion, in its grave, the old man's eye
Grows brighter as he sees Tranquillity,
With dove-like wings descend upon his home,
And bid each wayward thought no longer roam.
The storms of Life have circled into calm,
And wounded grief hath found a healing balm.
The incense of a prayer ascends to God:
Faith meekly bows before the chastening rod:

Contentment teaches Wealth, and all around
The elements of Happiness abound!
The quiet hearth—the cheerful fireside,
Where childhood revels in the gushing tide
Of unrestrained merriment. The smile
Which paints each thought and shows it free from guile,

All, all proclaim that Happiness, at last,
Hath taught the soul oblivion to the past!
It may not be! Grim Poverty is near,
And feeble Health untombs each buried fear.
The church-bell tolls: the mourners gather round—
The grave is closed, and rest eternal found!
What lesson doth each fleeting vision teach?
What moral doth the broken column preach?
Man stands in need of aid from fellow man:
And Time bids love to labor while it can.
Aye! "Labor while ye can"—the high command
Of boundless love—the motto of our band,
Is graven on each heart; and here to-day,
Before the world our principles we lay;
Nor blush to own that where Affection weeps,
There Odd-Fellowship, its untold treasure heaps.
We seek to dry the Widow's gushing tears—
We seek to calm the trembling Orphan's fears—
We seek to raise Humanity above
The ills of life, by ministries of love.
And when the tale is told, and Man resigns his trust,
We seek, in Friendship's name, to monument his dust!

At the conclusion of the poem the caskets containing the ashes of Odd-Fellows were deposited in the reception tomb, the Grand Chaplain reading the Odd-Fellows' funeral service. The Rev. Brother Whitall then pronounced a prayer and benediction, when the procession again formed on foot and marched to Lafayette Square, from whence the Grand Lodge was escorted to its room by the two "Encampments;" the other Lodges filed off to their rooms—and thus ended the ceremonies of the day.

ODD-FELLOWS' CELEBRATION AT RHINEBECK, N. Y.—The celebration of the birth-day of Washington by the Odd-Fellows of this village, took place agreeably to announcement, on Thursday evening of last week, in the Reformed Dutch Church. The Sons of Temperance, United American Mechanics, and Cadets of Temperance participated by their presence in full regalia, in compliance with an invitation from the Odd-Fellows.

The various societies formed in front of their respective rendezvous at half-past six o'clock, and having formed a junction in front of the Council Room of the Mechanics' Association, marched in procession to the Church, headed by Capt. N. DARRING, as Marshal of the occasion, and a band of musicians. They entered the Church at 7 o'clock, and occupied the central pews, which had been reserved for their use. The galleries, and many of the side pews were occupied by the ladies, who only were allowed to enter before the arrival of the procession. The turnout of the members of the various Orders represented was large, and many of the spectators were consequently obliged to leave for want of room. A staging had been erected in front of the pulpit, which was occupied by the speakers, officers and clergy. The splendid banner of the Odd-Fellows was displayed over the pulpit, that of the Sons of Temperance on the East, and the flag of the Mechanics on the West of the pulpit. The banner of the Washingtonians, a relic of the old Temperance guard of that name, bearing a beautiful full length portrait of the noble Chief—a most suitable emblem for the occasion—was suspended from the East gallery, and that of the rising generation from the West.

The tout ensemble of the decorations was tasteful and appropriate.

The exercises were commenced by a Voluntary on the organ by Mr. E. Styles. This was followed by prayer from the Rev. B. Hoff, and this again by the singing of the Odd-Fellows' Opening Ode by the choir, when Jacob W. Elseffer, Esq., of Red Hook, addressed the audience in a brief, pertinent and forcible address. After the choir had again sung, Ambrose Wager, Esq., of this village, came forward and chained the rapt attention of the audience for more than an hour, in a strain of burning eloquence and soul-stirring philanthropy.

At the close of Mr. Wager's address, the Odd-Fellows' Closing Ode was performed by the choir, when the Rev. Chas. A. Smith made the closing prayer. He was followed by another Voluntary on the organ, when the Benediction was pronounced by the Rev. T. Bradley, of this village.

The ceremonies were highly interesting throughout, and suitably commemorated the anniversary of the Father of our Country.

The Odd-Fellows, having returned to their Lodge Room and divested themselves of their regalia, proceeded to the house of Peter Pultz, to partake of a sumptuous repast, which had been prepared for them in the host's best style.—[Rhinebeck Gaz.

LETTER FROM G. F. SECCHI DE CASALI.

(CONCLUDED.)

FRANKLIN HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 26, 1849.

MR. AND MRS. PICKTOOTH exceunt from my letter; may Heaven take good care of their precious bodies, and may we meet no more either on earth or on the great ocean! This was my solemn vow when I entered car B of the South Amboy line, on my way to the Quaker city. Was I a father—by no means a convent's father—I would advise my young pedigree to travel in order to become well acquainted with the strange and different varieties of the human family. Without sailing on the "wide waters," as said Mrs. Picktooth of blessed memory, between two commas, I would take my progeny on a railroad tour, to listen to the conversation of the different passengers in a car. What beautiful and amusing notes they would take, and what an interesting book they would write! I am sure to find there often sufficient matter and subjects for a funny drama for the classic stage of the Chatham or Burton's theater.

Near me was sitting a young lady, how old I cannot say, as there is nothing more unpleasant and annoying for a woman than to be asked about her age. You may be sure that she will lie down from her race five or ten years; and I shall only add, and this I hope will satisfy you, that my fair lady companion was a pure image of one of the Madonnas of Guido or Raffaello. Was I not pleasantly situated for this time? She was cheerful in spite of the bad weather; but was silent, and I thought her deaf and dumb, as she never answered to my questions. After a while, she had the kindness to let me know that she was not dumb—have you never found, dear Editor, a dumb woman?—but she could not talk with me for the very modest reason, that she had not been introduced to me by some acquaintance! Hurra for Jersey virtues! She asked me if I knew the conductor. "Very well, Miss," I replied; then, turning to the kind conductor, "Please," said the traveling lady, "relieve me from this horrible position; introduce me to this" — I could not understand what. Thus, thanks to our leader, we shake hands, and become very intimate friends. Miss Chastity, from Jersey State, was a very intelligent and accomplished young lady; she knew the Scriptures, but would not say a word out of church or appropriate place, and I may venture to assert that she would suit as a wife to any young clergyman. She would dress his sermons, and facilitate his painful ecclesiastical career.

During our questioning and answering, she gave me some very interesting information about the great progress of her State and of Princeton Seminary; she was well acquainted with Jersey History, from the hard times of the American Revolution to the present month; all the events that had transpired since that epoch, and all the distinguished men of the State, were very familiar to her memory. She believed that I, as well as many other foreigners, had very wrong and prejudicial ideas of her blue State, "because," said Miss Chastity, "we pass just over the poorest and most barren part of Jersey;" and she wished I should visit her village, which is the model place of the State. My handsome companion—whose beautiful mouth and fair curly hair would spoil any methodistical youth, and throw him into a state of love—knew, also, all the private and small affairs of every family in the village—from the Presbyterian minister's history, down to the sexton and deacon's, she knew all; and I have no doubt that, from her room, Miss Chastity could write the life, miracles and doings of all the inhabitants of Jersey, without the trouble of consulting Blackstone or Byron's Don Juan.

When at Bordentown, my companion informed me that she could go no farther with me, as this was her stopping place. She wished me a pleasant journey, and made me promise to visit N— next summer.

A young Philadelphian came to occupy the seat just vacated by Miss Chastity, who pitied me when I informed him of the few acquaintances I had made since I left New-York. God spare Jersey State and people from such a friend as this young chap! I never heard a more severe and satirical critic than my new companion. He was a student, and had been to Bishop Doane's college, where, he said, he had learned nothing; and where he had conceived such an unjust opinion of Jersey people, although he had been in Bordentown but six months. He also narrated to me many interesting anecdotes and most amusing tales concerning the familiar customs of Jersey people. He assured me that even in his boarding-house the women—and, unfortunately, there were too many of them—sat down to breakfast without washing themselves or dressing their hair! "They used to sit at the table," said he, "with their d—d hair dressed in old newspapers, and their daily talk was about their State. It gave me the dyspepsy, and now I am glad to go home."

Arrived at Philadelphia, I went to the Baltimore Railroad office, and, after paying a dollar, was admitted into a car which they would not use in New-York to carry dead bodies from the Hospital to Potter's Field. Truly, I never traveled on a worse line, and in more filthy cars, than the Baltimore evening train. I had the fortune to have the company of a large party of young Californians going to Wilmington, on their way to San Francisco. I never before heard such profane language as was uttered by these modern adventurers; and wished that they had been compelled to swallow or put in their pockets the dirty juice of their disgusting chewing tobacco. Late at night I arrived at Newark, and was favored with a horse to reach the place of my destination. I wished, at that prospect, rather to be a sea-attorney, a peddler, or a missionary at Borneo, than a traveler at that hour. It was a stormy and cold night, and Jeremiah—I do not mean the good old prophet, but my horse—was moving as slowly as he could walk; he was blind and lame, and feared a fall in the ditch. At last, after one hour, I arrived at my friend's, satisfied with the length of my journey, and willing to remain there for that night.

I have a great deal to tell you about this beautiful State of Delaware, but, as my epistle is already too long, I shall trouble you next week with another letter, which I trust will be of some interest to your numerous subscribers in that State. I shall only ask you to send some honest and intelligent agents to Delaware, who will find no difficulties in the way of collecting subscribers. They should be supplied with traveling cards from their respective Lodges, and visit the Odd-Fellow's Rooms on the days of their re-union. I can assure them success.

I spoke to you sometime ago rather in favor of the Baltimore line. I am still of the same opinion concerning its chief engineer, Mr. Trimble, but I cannot speak in the same commendable manner of the conductors and other persons employed on this road. That they are rough and uncourteous towards passengers, I am not the only one who admits it. I think they should show themselves more gentlemanly to travelers, and especially to those who belong to the press. As I am not under obligations to the company for any favor, I may speak more fearlessly. One of the great abuses and impositions on this line is that kind of snake or man employed to receive the checks for the trunks. If you have the misfortune to refuse the offers of this worthy, when you arrive at the depot in Philadelphia you have to wait for your trunk until he has carried away all those which are entrusted to his care, with an addition of twenty-five cents besides the carriage. I had time enough to continue my way to New-York, but not willing to undergo this imposition, I was obliged to remain at the depot from half-past three to four o'clock. I think that travelers should be treated better, and not made to suffer this kind of extortion; and if the conductors and men who attend the stoves are in want of some advice, I would pray Mr. Trimble, the talented and gentlemanly engineer, to make them understand not to seat themselves among the travelers, to be more prudent in their conversation, and to chew less in the cars. When I passed from New-York to Philadelphia, there were five young men seated near some young ladies, who enjoyed rather too freely—words. I knew them as employees on this road, whether as clerks or conductors I wont venture to say.

Being unable to go to New-York for that day—thanks to the officers at the depot—I went to the Franklin House to pay a visit to our good friends, Messrs. Burroughs and D. C. Burnett. At any hour you arrive at this place, you are sure of finding a sumptuous table, and plenty of servants to wait on you. The house was crowded to excess, and there was but a single spare room at that moment. Nothing is more imposing than the dinner-hour at the Franklin House; besides the abundance of the table, I had a company of more than two hundred persons. All of them spoke very highly of the house, and of the gentlemanly proprietors. I wish them all the success they so well merit, and would recommend every one visiting Philadelphia to give them a call. Adieu a revoir.

Literary Notices.

☞ "FRIDAY CHRISTIAN." D. Appleton & Co. 1849. We have here a little volume, containing an account of the discovery of Pitcairn's Island in the South Seas, and of Friday Christian, the first person born on the Island. The state of society here is perfectly unique, and the narrative of the voyage of the first settlers, their difficulties, dangers and privations on the land, their profound piety and resignation, and their religious life, is full of interest.

☞ "DEMOCRACY IN FRANCE." By Mons. Guizot. D. Appleton & Co. 1849. However much we may differ from M. Guizot on the subject of this book, we cannot deny to him the possession of a powerful mind, and that his works, on which his fame as a statesman and philosopher is founded, evince profound sagacity, and great powers of analysis and deduction. Such is also the work before us. Its applicability to the present state of France, and coming from one who was so long at the head of affairs in that country, gives it a great additional importance and value.

☞ "LITERARY SKETCHES AND LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB." By T. N. Talfourd. D. Appleton & Co. 1849. We have already commented on these Letters and Sketches of Lamb. They form delightful reading. Nowhere do we find that combination of whim, originality and racy humor. They abound in kindness, piquancy, and in a poetic tone of feeling. They portray the characters of distinguished men, his intimate companions, in that undress always so attractive. We commend the book to all.

☞ "SCHOOL ARCHITECTURE." By Henry Barnard. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1848. This work is a valuable contribution to the improvement of school-houses in this country. The condition of most of our District Schools shows a most culpable neglect in their construction and arrangements, and is a disgrace to the different States in which they are located. To state the evils, and point out the remedy, is the design of this book. Reforms in regard to construction, size, light, ventilation and temperature are greatly needed. Plans by distinguished architects, and buildings, now finished or in progress of erection, are analyzed and commented upon; and those best adapted to health, comfort and convenience, suggested. It is a work highly useful, well digested, and treats of a subject to which but little attention has been given.

☞ "FREE-MASONS MONTHLY MAGAZINE." We wish to call the attention of our Masonic friends to this excellent publication. As an exposition of Masonic science and laws it has no equal. Bro. Moore seems to understand every rope of our Masonic ship.

“THEORY AND PRACTICE OF TEACHING.”

By David P. Page. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1849. This book is of a practical character, and treats of School Government. The office of a school teacher is an important one. His duties should be felt and known by himself, as regards his relation to those under his charge. His responsibility, his personal habits, his literary qualifications, his views of education and right modes of teaching are here dwelt upon; and every man entering upon that profession should carefully peruse this volume. It is also valuable to the pupil, who has a deep interest in the subject.

“THE MINER’S GUIDE.”

By J. W. Orton. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1849. This little work is all essential to those who explore the Gold Mines. It is in a portable form, is an excellent book of reference, contains the researches of eminent metallurgists, and is a valuable companion to the practical miner.

“FRIENDS AND FORTUNE.”

By Anna Harriet Drury. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1849. This is a love story, portraying characters of much interest, and many struggles of duty, and trials of the heart. It is written in a simple and spirited style, and scenes and passages of eloquence and feeling are scattered throughout.

“ACTON; OR, THE CIRCLE OF LIFE.”

D. Appleton & Co. 1849. This work is designed to delineate Life, Man and the World. It consists of a series of maxims and reflections on all the subjects connected with daily life. These are given in a pithy style, have, at times, an original cast and a vein of satire, and are occasionally very suggestive. They are the thoughts of a man well read, and who has had opportunities of extended observation of men and society, of which he has availed himself. We shall make some extracts hereafter, to illustrate the author's style.

“THE YOUNG PEOPLE’S MIRROR.” We wish to call the attention of our readers to this admirable work. It is the delight of all young persons who are fortunate enough to see it. It has peculiar claims upon Odd-Fellows, not merely because it is published by Bro. E. Walker, of the Offering, and is edited by our worthy Bro. B. J. Lossing, so well known to the Order, but because of its intrinsic value. It is superbly illustrated with numerous engravings, and is only one dollar a year.

“AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL”

for March is received, and contains an immense quantity of reading matter, of great interest and value. The following are some of its contents: The Phrenological and Physiological Organization of Truman H. Safford, Jr. with a likeness; the Organization or Temperaments as Indicating Character, No. 7; Phrenology a Science, by J. R. Howard; quickening of the Mental Operations in Death; lectures to Young men on Idleness, by Henry Ward Beecher; reformation of the United States Post-Office.

“THE WATER CURE JOURNAL.” This is a very ably conducted publication, containing much information regarding the Hydropathic method of cure.

DR. MANSON’S VANILLA TOOTH WASH.—This is the most delightful tooth wash we have as yet met with, and we once more recommend it to our readers. The peculiar properties of the Vanilla Tooth Wash are such, that a piece of cotton wet with the wash, and placed in a decayed tooth prevents and cures tooth-ache in many cases, by destroying the acetous fermentation constantly going on. Sourvy of the teeth, spongy and tender gums are prevented by using this wash; and it is particularly useful in painful affections of the face, Tic Doloraux, Neuralgia, by simply using it as a gargle for the mouth, by bathing the face and temples.

CALIFORNIA GOLD DIGGING.

THE following article we find in the Boston Bee. If the statements it contains be true, our friends who have gone to California, will not find precisely the El Dorado they expected:

AUTHENTIC ACCOUNTS FROM CALIFORNIA.—Capt. William D. Phelps, late of bark Moscow, of this port, arrived here from California, via Panama, on Saturday morning. Capt. P. brings a quantity of gold, in grains, in scales, and in lumps—the largest of the latter weighing about an ounce and a half. The Traveller says:

The amount of gold brought by him has been much overrated in the published accounts, though he brings a considerable quantity—much less, however than the lowest amount stated ($38,000.)

As Capt. P. worked personally at the mines—which was not the case with Mr. Atherton—his experience of the minutiae of the gold digging there is considerable. In the first place, as to the pieces of gold that have been reported to be found, he says the largest piece he has seen is in the possession of Mr. Mellus, and weighs but six ounces. He heard numerous stories at the mines of large pieces being found; but in every instance where they were investigated, they turned out to be false or exaggerated. One man was reported to have found a piece weighing several pounds; he went to see him, and found that its weight was only two ounces, and that it was the proceeds of an entire day's work.

As to the stories that the diggers were many of them averaging $150 per day, he thinks that those who have done the best have not obtained more than $3000 during the entire digging season. The hours of work were from four to five hours per day. Formerly the Indians were willing to work for a trifle, but they have since become better acquainted with the value of their toil. They are principally the remnants of tribes, and are not formidable.

Agriculture has been so totally neglected that a man who had a field containing 15,000 bushels of wheat, could not get it harvested, though he offered half the products; and was obliged to let his cattle eat it. Women and children, as well as their husbands and fathers, had become gold diggers. Capt. Phelps' opinion as to the success of expeditions daily starting from this country is, that it will depend upon the manner of their organization. There is no doubt, he says, of there being considerable quantities of gold in California, but there is gross exaggerations in the matter.

Letters had appeared in the papers from persons who had no existence in California, and in respect to vessels that had never been there.

Captain Phelps looks hearty and healthy, and bears no marks of a toilsome voyage from the other side of the world.

COL. WILLIAM B. MOORE.—A correspondent has sent us a communication signed “Many Voters,” in which many and cogent reasons are given why this gentleman should be the successor of Moses G. Leonard, the present Alms House Commissioner. We do not wish to make the “Review” a political journal, but, in this case, we must express the gratification we feel in adding our testimony of the worth and fitness of Col. Moore for the office of Alms House Commissioner. He has held an appointment of trust under Mr. Leonard for two years, and is fully conversant with the duties pertaining to this department of the City government. In the selection of city officers, we hold a man's politics should be a minor consideration, and his ability to fill a peculiar situation the only criterion; and we believe the citizens of New-York are prepared to make this issue at the approaching election. We hope Col. Moore will be put forward as the “People's” or “Independent Candidate,” and as he has a host of friends throughout the city, his success is, we think, certain.

The above is from the Military Review. We know Col. Moore well, and believe he is just the man for Alms House Commissioner. He is well acquainted with the business, and possesses every qualification for the office.

FLOOD IN THE MISSISSIPPI.—The lower Mississippi has overflowed its banks in many places, and at the last dates, the 24th ult., Bayou Sara, Baton Rouge, Natchez-under-the-Hill, and many other towns, were several feet under water. All the landings on the Red River were inundated. The damage will be immense, and fears were entertained of a break in the Levee at New-Orleans.

The Inaugural Address of Gen. Taylor was expressed from Washington to Boston in 18 hours.

POPE PIUS IX DEPOSED—ROME A REPUBLIC.

The last European steamer brought us the important intelligence that Pope Pius IX had been deposed, and that Rome had once more become a Republic! This event occurred at one o'clock in the morning of the 9th of February, the Assembly having sat from mid-day.

This sitting commenced on the 8th, at noon. M. Galletti occupied the chair, and all the Ministers were present. The number of representatives present was 144. The proceedings commenced with M. Armellini, in the name of the Provisional Government, coming forward, and resigning into the hands of the Assembly the powers which it had hitherto held. The Prince de Canino called upon the Assembly to declare that the Government had not done all it ought to have done relative to three things—arms, money, and the purging of different departments.

He concluded by a long examination of the acts of the Provisional Government, several of which he condemned. After some further remarks, M. Corio Rusconi proposed that the present Ministry be confirmed. The motion was carried unanimously, and after some further debate the sitting was suspended for half an hour. When the Assembly resumed, M. Savoni moved the following decree:

Art. 1. The Papedom has fallen, in fact, as well as in law, from the temporal Government of the Roman States.

Art. 2. The Roman Pontiff will enjoy all the guarantees necessary to the independence of the exercise of his spiritual power.

Art. 3. The form of Government of the Roman States will be pure democracy, and will take the glorious name of the Roman Republic.

Art. 4. The Roman Republic will have, with the rest of Italy, the relations which a common nationality requires.

M. Mamiani made a long speech, in which he declared that the temporal domination of the Popes had always been a misfortune to Italy, and that Rome was in such a state that she could not have any Government but that of the Popes or that of Rienzi. He then gave a historical sketch of the present state of Europe, which he examined at great length, and having come to the conclusion that it would be extremely difficult to maintain the Republic at Rome, he declared that in his opinion, the best thing the Assembly could do would be to postpone the settlement of the form of government for the present, and to leave the question to the decision of the Italian Constituent Assembly.

When he sat down, M. Mamiani was saluted with groans and murmurs of disapprobation.

At six o'clock the Assembly adjourned the debate for two hours.

On the resumption of the sitting, M. Audinot proposed that the Assembly should at once decree the deposition of the Pope, but that it should be left to the Italian Constituent Assembly to determine the form of Government to be adopted. A long debate on this proposition followed; but ultimately the Assembly resolved, almost unanimously, that the entire decree should be adopted; and that not only should the Pope be deposed, but the Republic be established. Of 144 members who voted, five only opposed the adoption of a Republican form of Government. The proceedings were not closed till past two in the morning.

The Alba says that the city of Rome was in a state of apparent joy and enthusiasm at the result. At two o'clock in the afternoon of the 9th, the flag of the Republic was hoisted on the tower of the capitol, amid the cheering of thousands of spectators, and the young Republic was saluted at its birth by the firing of 101 guns from the Castle of St. Angelo.

There was a grand demonstration on the 10th, in honor of the Republic, and the decree relating to it was read from the capitol. The people loudly applauded the article providing for the independence of the Pope's spiritual power. On the 11th a grand Te Deum was chanted at St. Peter's, on the occasion of the proclamation of the Republic.

TOWNSEND AND ORR’S PANORAMA OF THE HUDSON RIVER.—This is a painting of vast extent of canvas and of great artistic excellence. Its views of the scenery of the river are excellent, and delineated most truthfully. The shores of the Hudson are, in parts, picturesque and grand, and afford fine subjects for the artist's pencil, and Mr. Orr has given to them great effect and beauty.

The Common Council of Boston on Monday, unanimously voted against licenses for the sale of liquors.

Humorous.

LATENT TALENT IN DISTRESS,
OR, RECREATIONS OF A KIND EDITOR.

Oh, dear! Mr. Editor, what shall I do!
I haven't a soul to complain to but you.
I'm sorry to plague you, but you are so kind;
And I want your advice, when I've opened my mind;
For I haven't a soul to consult with but you.
Oh, dear Mr. Editor, what shall I do?

I want to be known as a writer of fame—
To be guess'd at at first, and then talk'd of by name.
I begin many things, but I never get on;
If I lay them aside, then my thoughts are all gone—
But I wouldn't say this, if it wasn't to you—
Oh, dear Mr. Editor, what shall I do?

I've been trying hard lately to make myself clever;
Yet I fancy I'm growing more stupid than ever.
I'm thinking and writing almost night and day;
But somehow I don't seem to find out the way.
I wish very often that I was like you.
Oh, dear Mr. Editor, what shall I do?

I've spent a long while, too, in writing a story,
Which, after all, brings me more trouble than glory.

Though there isn't much plot, every reader complains

That the story's so puzzling, it addles his brains—
(And, between ourselves, sir, it has addled mine too)—

Oh, dear Mr. Editor, what shall I do?

I want to be clever—I want to be noted—
I want to be talk'd of—I want to be quoted.
If there is any secret, I wish you would tell it;
If it is to be bought, let me know where they sell it.
Oh, dear Mr. Editor, help me—pray, do—
And be sure, in return, I will try to help you.

THE WIDOW BEDOTT

WRITES TO HER DAUGHTER, MRS. SMITH.

DEAR MELISSY: I now take my pen in hand to tell you that I ruther guess you'll be considerably astonished when you read what I set down to rite. I've got some news to tell you that you can't guess if you try till next never, so you may as well give it up first as last afore you begin. And you aint to let on a word about it only to Jupiter, and Kier and Seliny. Come to think, I don't care if you tell Sam Pendergrasses wife, bein' as how she's a pertickler friend o' mine. But don't you open your head about it to no other individvial—for I want to supprise the Wiggletown folks, and make 'em open their eyes a leetle. Come to consider I guess you'd better not tell Miss Pendergrass, for I'm afeard she can't keep it to herself. She might let it out to the Kenipes, and they'd tell the Crosbys, and the Crosbys they'd carry it strait to Major Coon's wife, and she'd be sure to tell old Dawson's wife, (the widder Jinkins that was—she 'twas Poll Bingham,) and she's the verry undentical person I want to keep it from till it busts upon her all of a sudden, like a thunder clap. I guess I'll let her know I can hold my head up as high as hern in futur, for who did she git but a decrippid old bung head that she wouldn't a had if she could a got anybody else. I guess on the hull you handn't better say nothing about it to Kier's wife, for fear she'll tell her folks, and they'd sartintly devulgate it all round. If you dew tell her, you make her promise she wont hint a sillybly about it to her step-mother—she 'twas Keiser Winkle—nor to nobody else. You must all keep it a perfoundsecret till I come. If nothing happens to prevent, we shall be in Wiggletown next week a Saturday on our bride tower. A Sunday mornin' we kalkilate to go to meetin' long a you and Jupiter, and in the arternoon we shall tend the baptist meetin'. I tell ye, won't ther be some starin' in Wiggletown that day. I guess they'll find out that I'm as good as enny on 'em, if not a leetle better. I shan't hev on none o' the things they've ever seen me wear. My rigin' is to be intwiredly new. Yer uncle Magwire has made me a present of a handsome green merino dress, and yer aunt Magwire has gin me a new brown velvet bunnit, and yer cousin Jefferson has persented me a nelegant plaid shawl, and I kalkilate to come out in 'em all at Wiggletown.

Speakin' o' my new wardrobes, reminds me to tell you that if Jabe Clark comes your way a peddlin', not to trade a cent's worth with him. You remember how he come it over me about the shoes, don't ye? Well, it's amazin' I should ever be such a fool as to be took in by him agin—but so 'twas. He come along here a spell ago, and sarved me the awfullest trick that you ever heerd on. I was alone in the house—yer uncle and aunt had gone to a sick nabor's, and the way he cheated me was perfectly dredful. My blood biles now a thinkin' on't. He pertended he'd experienced religion, and lamented over the way he used to cheat and lie; and as true as I live and breathe, actilly got round me so't he perswaded me to swop away a nelegant ston colored silk that cost me a dollar a yard, for a miserable slazy striped consarn, that he said was all the fashion now—called it "grody flewery"—and what makes it more aggravatin', made me pay tew dollars to boot. But that wasn't the worst on't, for come to onroll it, we found that three or four yards away at tother eend on't was all dammaged and stained up—'twant fit for nothin'. Yer aunt was mad at me for bein' so took in, and yer uncle he laft and hector'd me, and went on about it—you know what a critter he is to bother a boddly. At last I busted out a cryin', and went off and shot myself up in my room, and stayed there till tea time—and when I come down, lo and behold, yer uncle stept up and handed me a new green merino dress—he'd been off to the store and bought it a purpose for me, fringes and buttons and everthing to trim it with, and I've got it made up, and it sets like a dandy—and I'm gwine to be married in it. But I can't help feelin' awfully gauled about the silk. I took it to Parker and Pettibone's and swopt it for some things I wanted. They wouldn't allow me but eighteen pence a yard, and 'twas all 'twas worth. Jabe made me take a couple o' hankerchers tew, for a dollar a piece—said he'd stake his repertation on't they wan't half cotton—and no more they wan't, for come to dew 'em up, they showed out plain enuff that they was all cotton—did you ever? He got round the elder tew—made him pay five dollars for a buzzum pin—said 'twas topiz sot in gold, and it turned out to be yallar glass with a pinchback ring round it. I was clear out of pashence with the elder for bein' so green—but sittivated as I was I couldn't say anything, ye know. If yer I come acrost Jabe Clark agin, if he don't ketch it, no matter. But I'm wonderful bizzzy about these days—and so no more at present from your affectionate mother,

PRISSILLA P. BEDOTT.

P. S. Give my love to Jupiter. I'm grattified to hear that the baby is so forrard. What do you kalkilate to call him? I hope it won't be Jupiter—for somehow I don't egactly like the name, tho' it sounds well for a man. But don't in all favor name him arter yer par. Hesekier's an awful name. How do ye like Shadrack? That's the name of his grandfather that's to be. Yer uncle and aunt and Jeff sends love.

P. P. B.

P. S. Yer cousin Jeff asked permission to read this letter, and he says I haint told you who I'm a goin to be married tew, nor when the weddin's to be, nor nothin'. But taint to be wondered at that I forgot, for I've got such a numerous number o' things to think on now. My future companion is the baptist minister of this place—by the name of Elder Sniffles. The way we come acquainted was quite singular. You see I took to attendin' his meetin' because the presbyterian minister here is such small potatoes that 'twant eddifyin' for me to set under his preachin', and understandin' that Elder Sniffles was a verry gifted man I thought I'd go to hear him. Well, I liked him wonderful well, he's a powerful speaker, and his prayers is highly interestin'. So I goes to hear him a number o' times. He observed me, and was vidently pleased with me—but durin' all the time I was creatin' such a sensation in his feelins—I never knowed but what he had a wife. How I did feel when I found out he was a widdiwer. I was dredfully frustrated, and kep myself as scerce as possible. But he followed me up and persevered, till at last I consented to accept of him. It's so moloncholy to be alone in the world, and then ministers don't grow on every bush. The weddin' is to take place next week a Wensday evenin', at yer uncle's. Elder Yawper, from Slabtown, is to reform the ceremony, and preach in Elder Sniffleses place the next Sabbath when we're gone.

The elder lives in a gamble rufft yaller house. I mean to make him put wings to't and make it look ruther more fashionable. It stands on a desenden elevation that slants down to the canawl on one side, and not fur behind it is a morantic grove. He haint no family but a little highly tighty gal that they brought up. I tell ye if I don't make her stan' round when I get there I'm mistaken. We shall start for Wiggletown a Thursday, in the stage—and get there, I 'spose, a Saturday evenin'. Now, Melissy Smith, remember you're to keep it a perfound secret. I don't want nobody in Wiggletown to know a word about it till they see us come a walkin' into meetin'. If you anser this afore we come, direct your letter to the reverend Mrs. Sniffles.

Your affectionate mar,
P. P. BEDOTT. (till next week.)

P. S. I've writ an elegy on my marriage that Jeff thinks is one o' my best poems. He's gwine to send it to be printed in the Scrabble Hill Luminary, right under the marriage notice. He's a keepin' it from his par and mar, 'cause they haint no sense o' poetry—yer aunt especelly has always disencourridged my writin' for the papers. But she can't help herself.

P. P. B.

From the Scrabble Hill Luminary.

MARRIED.—In this village on Wed., the 20th inst., by the Rev. Elder Yawpers, of Slabtown, the Rev. O. Shadrack Sniffles, of Scrabble Hill, to Mrs. Prissilla P. Bedott, relict of the late deacon Hesekiah Bedott, Esq., of Wiggletown.

The fair bride has sent us the following morceau—which our readers will unite with us in pronouncing equal to a former effusion from the same gifted pen. We wish the happy pair all the felicity which their distinguished abilities so richly merit.—[Eds. Lum.]

TO SHADRACK.

Prissilla the fair and Shadrack the wise,
Have united their fortunes in the tenderest of ties;
And being mutually joined in the matrimonial connexion,
Have bid adoo to their previous affliction.

No more will they mourn their widdered sitiuation,
And continner to sythe without mitigation;
But pardners for life to be parted no more,
Their sorrers is cended, their troubles is o'er.

O Shadrack, my Shadrack! Prissilla did speak,
While the rosy red blushes surmanted her cheek,
And the tears of affection bedoozled her eye,
O Shadrack, my Shadrack! I'm yourn till I die!

The heart that was scornful and cold as a stun,
Has surrendered at last to the fortinit one;
Farewell to the miseries and griefs I have had,
I'll never desert thee, O Shadrack, my Shad!

CURIOUS REASON FOR DRINKING.—Mr. G——, who had by degrees become so attached to his cups that he could not comfortably go by ten o'clock without his "hip of brandy," and who was very anxious to avoid the suspicion of being a habitual drinker, was in the habit daily of inventing some excuse to the bar-keeper and those within hearing. He had used up all the stereotype reasons, such as a "slight pain," a "kind of sinking," not "feeling right," &c. One Saturday, at the usual hour, he called for his brandy and water, saying, "I am extremely dry: I am going to have salt fish for dinner."

Dean —, when residing on a living in the country, had occasion, one day, to unite a rustic couple in the bonds of matrimony. The ceremony being over, the husband began "to sink in resolution," and falling (as some husbands might do,) into a fit of repentance, he said, "Your reverence has tied the knot tightly, I fancy; but, under favor, may I ask your reverence, if so be you could untie it again?" "Why, no," replied the dean. "we never do that on this part of the consecrated ground." "Where then?" cried the man, eagerly. "On that!" pointing to the burying-ground.

A lady seeing at the window of a linen draper, who had not long been in business, that very common lure, "The goods of this shop selling under prime cost!" stepped into a friend's, who happened to live within two or three doors, and inquired whether he thought his neighbor was selling under prime cost, and would let her have any good bargains? "As to bargains," replied the friend, "I am really at a loss to answer; but, with respect to selling under prime cost, that I can most positively assure you must be impossible; for, to my certain knowledge, he has never paid a single farthing for any thing he has in his shop."

REMARKABLE CASE OF RECOVERY FROM INSANITY.—A man (says the Boston Traveller) who has for the last forty years been confined as a raving maniac, in the poor house, at Newton, has been suddenly restored to his reason. He has been regarded as incurable, and for a great part of the time during his confinement he has been so violent as to render it necessary to chain him. He appears like one awakened from a long sleep, and remembering distinctly events which occurred previous to the loss of his reason, but nothing that has transpired during the long years of his confinement.

EXTRAORDINARY LONGEVITY.—A colored woman, named Antoinette Moxen, died in Louisiana, recently, at the extraordinary age of 181 years. She was a native of Louisiana.

NEWSPAPER ENTERPRISE.—The proprietors of the New York Sun have completed arrangements for establishing, for the exclusive use of that journal, new Telegraph Lines between Boston, New York and Washington—the New York terminus to be within the editorial room of the Sun. The expense is estimated at $125,000.

Brooks is the very chief of shoe dealers, as well as an intelligent Odd-Fellow.

THOSE NEW CHAIRS.—Buxton and Franklin, those famous tonsorial artists, at 97 Nassau street, who shave all the editors in the vicinity, have recently added to the luxury of their establishment by introducing two new and superb chairs, worthy for an Emperor to sit in. This is the place, above all others, for luxurious shaving.

THE COVENTRY MURDER.—The Hartford Courant says that Brown, the murderer of a woman in Coventry, a few weeks since, has been identified fully as the individual who killed a Mrs. Hammond, in Mount Pleasant, and also injured the husband of her victim in April last. A reward of $700 was offered for his apprehension, and every effort made to secure him, but without effect.

GOURAUD'S LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

JULIA WRIGHT—CANTO II.

OUR Julia's neck was swan-like—I mean a black swan, That rare axis of the feather'd race, Which sometimes seen is Keewick's lake upon, And Derwent Water—(seldom in other place); Thus when our Julia walked the throng among, Her aspect was so queen-like in its grace, She seemed a stately Juno to all eyes; But her dark skin excited much surprise!

And well it might! for nothing looks so bad as a stately creature with a dark skin. Julia, at that time, was unacquainted with the surprising qualities of GOURAUD'S Italian Medicated Soap, in the removal of Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sallowiness, Salt Rheum, &c., and therefore she was obliged to submit to their evils. She was unaware of the magical properties of GOURAUD'S Powder Subtilis in eradicating superfluous hair; or GOURAUD'S Grecian Hair Dye for coloring red, light or gray hair a glossy black; otherwise she would have been provided with them. The sequel will show that she found out their worth afterward.

Remember! The genuine preparations of Dr. GOURAUD can only be obtained at his depot, 67 Walker-street, or last store FROM Broadway. No Agency in Brooklyn or New-York City. [To be continued.]

THE MORMON TEMPLE.—By a letter received from our brother, P. W. Cook, who was one that left Council Bluff last Spring for the Salt Lake, dated Aug. 2d, written while encamped on the Sweet Water River at the South Pass, (in sight of Fremont's Peak,) we gather some information which may not be uninteresting to our readers. The new Mormon Temple at the Salt Lake is to be a splendid building. They enclose a lot 17 miles long and 12 miles wide, with a mud wall eight feet high and four feet thick. There are to be four cities inside. They have discovered mountain rock that resembles Cornelian stone, which the writer says is beautiful for temples and pillars. The size of the temple is not stated, but its highest point is to be 600 feet, and can be seen eighty miles either way. The party that went out last season lost many of their oxen—having died with what they called the "swell head." Many of the streams which they crossed were so strongly impregnated with alkali that they dare not let their cattle drink. On the shores of many of the lakes a crust is formed an inch and a half thick. They break up this crust, scrape off the dirt on the bottom and the top, and find it pure saleratus. Strange as this may seem, it is nevertheless true, and the writer collected in a short time 75 pounds. A mountain of pure rock salt has been discovered near the Mormon settlement. The Mormons have discovered a rich gold mine 150 miles south-west from the Salt Lake. The last end of the journey to the Salt Lake, say 200 miles, is attended with little fatigue. Nearly all the way the roads are as good as on any prairie in Michigan. The writer was living on the meat of bears, antelope and buffaloes—animals very numerous on the route. He recommends mule teams instead of oxen, and that cows be driven along for their milk, and for beef if necessary.—[Niles Rep.]

INFORMATION WANTED.—Mrs. James Pinnell and daughter arrived in this city in October last, with a view to go to her husband at Geneva, and wrote to him to that effect. They were with several others who came over in the same ship, but did not appear, and have not since been heard of. Her husband, Arthur Pinnell, is now at Syracuse, and would be most grateful for any information leading to the discovery of his wife and child.

EARTHQUAKES IN THE WESTERN ISLANDS.—The Azores have been kept in a state of constant alarm for nearly two months past by a succession of earthquakes, which have thrown down many houses and churches on these Islands. The alarm was heightened to an intense consternation one night in December by the appearance of a brilliant Aurora Borealis in the West; such a phenomenon is without a precedent in that quarter.

LADY POSTMASTER.—One of the last acts of the late Postmaster General, was the appointment of Mrs. Maria J. Hornbeck to be Postmistress of Allentown, Pa. in place of E. R. Neweard, resigned. Mrs. H. is the widow of the late Hon. John W. Hornbeck, and has a large family dependent upon her for support.

Judge Timothy Farrar of N. H., died at Hollis, in that State, on the 21st ult, aged one hundred and one years, seven months and ten days. He graduated at Howard in 1767.

Judge Kingsbury, of Maine, dropped down dead in one of the streets of Gardiner, in that State, on Thursday of last week.

Col. J. H. Walton, formerly Mayor of Galveston, died of cholera, in Houston, on the 4th ult., where the disease was then prevalent.

DR. S. P. TOWNSEND'S
COMPOUND EXTRACT OF

SARSAPARILLA.

The Most Extraordinary Medicine in the World!!

This Extract is put up in Quart Bottles; it is six times cheaper, pleasanter, and warranted superior to any sold. It cures without vomiting, purging, or debilitating the Patient.

THE great beauty and superiority of this Sarsaparilla over all other medicines is, that while it eradicates the disease, it invigorates the body. It is one of the very best.

SPRING AND SUMMER MEDICINES ever known: it not only purifies the whole system and strengthens the person, but it creates rich, new and pure blood, a power possessed by no other medicine. And in this lies the grand secret of its wonderful success. It has performed, within the last two years, more than 100,000 cures of severe cases of disease; at least 15,000 were considered incurable. It has saved the lives of more than 10,000 children the past two seasons in the city of New-York alone.

10,000 Cases of General Debility and want of Nervous Energy.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla invigorates the whole system permanently. To those who have lost their muscular energy by the effects of medicine or indiscretion committed in youth, or the excessive indulgence of the passions, and brought on by physical prostration of the nervous system, lassitude, want of ambition, fainting sensations, premature decay and decline, hastening toward that fatal disease Consumption, can be entirely restored by this pleasant remedy. This Sarsaparilla is far superior to any.

Invigorating Cordial,

as it renews and invigorates the system, gives activity to the limbs, and strength to the muscular system, in a most extraordinary degree.

Consumption Cured.

Cleanse and Strengthen. Consumption can be Cured. Bronchitis, Consumption, Liver Complaint, Colds, Catarrh, Coughs, Asthma, Spitting Blood, Soreness in the Chest, Hætic Flush, Night Sweats, Difficult or Profuse Expectoration, Pain in the Side, &c., have been and can be Cured.

Spitting Blood.

New-York, April 28, 1847.—Dr. S. P. Townsend: I verily believe your Sarsaparilla has been the means, through Providence, of saving my life. I have for several years had a bad Cough. It became worse and worse. At last I raised large quantities of blood, had night sweats, was greatly debilitated and reduced, and did not expect to live. I have only used your Sarsaparilla a short time, and there has been a wonderful change wrought in me. I am now able to walk all over the city. I raise no blood, and my cough has left me. You can well imagine that I am thankful for these results. Your obedient servant, WM. RUSSELL, 65 Catharine st.

Dyspepsia.

No fluid or medicine has ever been discovered which so nearly resembles the gastric juice or saliva, in decomposing food, and strengthening the organs of digestion, as this preparation of Sarsaparilla.

BANK DEPARTMENT, ALBANY, May 10, 1845.—Dr. Townsend—Sir: I have been afflicted for several years with the Dyspepsia in its worst forms, attended with sourness of stomach, loss of appetite, extreme heartburn, and a great aversion to all kinds of food, and for weeks (what I could eat) I have been unable to retain but a small portion on my stomach. I tried the usual remedies, but they had little or no effect in removing the complaint. I was induced, about two months since, to try your Extract of Sarsaparilla, and I must say with little confidence; but after using nearly two bottles, I found my appetite restored, and the heartburn entirely removed; and I would earnestly recommend the use of it to those who have been afflicted as I have been.
Yours, &c. W. W. VAN ZANDT.

Great Blessing to Mothers and Children.

It is the safest and most effectual medicine for purifying the system, and relieving the sufferings attendant upon childbirth, ever discovered. It strengthens both the mother and child, prevents pain and disease, increases and enriches the food; those who have used it think it is indispensable. It is highly useful both before and after confinement, as it prevents diseases attendant upon childbirth. In Costiveness, Piles, Cramps, Swelling of the Feet, Despondency, Heartburn, Vomiting, Pain in the Back and Loins, False Pains, Hemorrhage, and in regulating the Secretions, and equalizing the Circulation, it has no equal. The great beauty of this medicine is, it is always safe, and the most delicate use it most successfully.

Scrofula Cured.

This Certificate conclusively proves that this Sarsaparilla has perfect control over the most obstinate diseases of the Blood. Three persons cured in one house is unprecedented.

Three Children.

Dr. S. P. Townsend—Dear Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that three of my children have been cured of the Scrofula by the use of your excellent medicine. They were afflicted very severely with bad sores; have taken four bottles; it took them away, for which I feel myself under great obligation. Yours, respectfully, ISAAC W. ORAIN, 106 Wooster st.

CHAPTER VII.

THE BLIND CHILD.

A rude, dark, stormy man was he—
His passions, like his deeds, were wild,
And yet he loved that gentle child
Who crept upon his knee.—MANNERS.

MATTHEW ORRALL, after leaving the chamber in which took place the interview with Robert Atree, walked quickly toward the outskirts of the city, taking his way through the thickly-peopled quarter, which was the residence of the sea-faring class of the inhabitants of Charleston. It was at the water's edge that he at length paused and at nearly the extreme end of the low, rough, somber-looking habitations which lined the river's bank. The quarter was at this hour apparently deserted, since the approach of the British fleet had drawn nearly all the occupants of the dwellings to the lower extremity of the town, whence could be better obtained a view of the hostile squadron. Some few disconsolate-looking women might be seen, returning homeward, after having, perhaps, parted at the lower beach with husbands or sweethearts, destined for Sullivan's Island; but the general aspect of the neighborhood was lonesome and gloomy in the extreme.

Orrall unlocked and opened the door of a small weather-beaten house, or rather hut, close to the water's edge, and sheltered on one side by a high, wooded bank, round which the river swept in a sudden curve; so that in fact the dwelling occupied a small promontory, as it were, abruptly jutting into the stream. The door, as it appeared, was not fastened, and the bravo, on stepping over the threshold, paused for a moment to observe the scene within.

The room was far from being so uncomfortable as the forbidding aspect of the habitation without might have indicated. The only window, it is true, was half concealed by various articles of apparel, which had been inserted in the broken panes, to exclude the air; and the rafters were blackened with smoke, and discolored from rain, which in the wet season penetrated the roof. But, nevertheless, there was an air of neatness about the place, in fact, a certain degree of comfort if not elegance, that one would not probably have expected to find in so unpromising a locality. Over one portion of the plank-floor was spread a carpet, antiquated in pattern and worn nearly threadbare, yet evidently of a very costly fabric. A ship's locker, entire, with mahogany facings, intricately carved, and bearing still some tarnished traces of gilding, occupied a position near the corner of the room, while the corner itself was filled up by a curious contrivance.

This was a merchant-ship's caboose, evidently the relic of an East Indiaman, as it yet retained upon its top a broken fragment of a royal crown, surmounting the arms of the "Company." It seemed to have been newly painted, and presented a very gay appearance, as contrasted with the rough walls of the hut. Its front, which was toward Orrall as he entered the room, was half hidden by a pair of thick crimson velvet curtains, stained and torn in various places, looped up in the center by a gilt wooden bar. Between the depending folds of this curtain a glimpse could be obtained of a bed, draped with gayly-colored bunting. The other furniture of the apartment was extremely plain. A common ship's cooking-stove, with a rusty pipe, stood near the door, and behind it hung a rude sailor's hammock.

But the caboose was the object most calculated to arrest the visitor's attention, both from the unique appearance of this singular article of furniture itself, and from its likewise containing, at the present moment, a tenant. Matthew Orrall, after earnestly surveying, for a moment, the bed beyond the curtains, moved on tiptoe across the floor, and lifting a portion of the velvet, discovered a young girl, beautiful as an angel. She was wrapped in a profound slumber.

It was curious to behold the sudden change that came over the bravo's features as he gazed down upon the sleeping maiden. The sneer had left his lip, and the scowl faded from his dark brow. He seemed to hold his breath, as he bent over the couch, and in the light of a pendant cabin-lamp, which hung in the middle of the apartment, the man's eyes glittered with a moist light, as if a tear were struggling through their hard corners. Silently he lowered the velvet over the bed, and half turned away.

But as he moved, one white hand of the sleeping girl was lifted, parting again the curtain, and her head rose from the pillow.

"Father!" she murmured.

In the faint glow of that solitary lamp, swinging from the ceiling, the contrast between these two beings was striking. The massy form of Mat. Orrall towered by the bedside, his tangled hair falling in a thick mass over his broad shoulders, while the dress which he wore made his proportions seem almost gigantic. The slight, airy-looking figure of the awakened girl, or child, for her age did not appear to be more than thirteen, was half upraised from the couch, and her small, delicately molded arm was stretched out toward him she addressed. Her face was a picture of loveliness—not the beauty of a woman, nor even of a child, but that strange unearthly loveliness, which pains almost as much as it pleases us; since we know that it cannot remain long upon earth—that it has no affinity with mortal things. Over her forehead, almost as clear and transparent as light itself, hung a cluster of golden curls, moist and soft, wreathing and wandering around a neck white as the purest marble. It was a wonder of wonders how such a being as this could be kin to the strange man whom she addressed as "Father."

The child's face was turned toward Matthew Orrall, and her small hands stretched out to embrace him. But in her eyes, which were of a dark hazel, though they were apparently fixed upon the man, no light of recognition beamed.

The beautiful child was blind!

It was a tear that now dimmed the bravo's glance, as he bent over the young maiden, and kissed her white forehead. But he dashed it quickly away, as if he would conceal emotion even from his stricken child.

"Father, I was dreaming of you."

These words were soft as music, and a light irradiated the face of the young girl as she uttered them, and at the same time raised the hard, rough hand of the bravo to her lips, and pressed it with a kiss. The man shook through every fiber.

"What ails you, father? Are you ill?"

"No, my child—no, Alice!" answered Mat. Orrall, recovering himself with an effort, and dropping his voice to a whisper. "But, tell me, what were you dreaming, Alice? Was it a happy dream?"

"Oh, a blessed dream, father," murmured the blind girl, clasping her tiny fingers together, while a calm, holy expression lit up her features. "It was of mother, and of the beautiful angels, and of you, father. But—"

"But—what, Alice? Was not your dream all happy?"

"O, father, I thought you was angry with the angels, and spoke cross to them. But, it was only a dream—you would not be angry with God's beautiful angels—would you, father?" murmured the child, pleadingly.

Matthew Orrall's countenance contracted with a violent but silent spasm. His limbs quivered convulsively, but he spake not a word in answer to his child.

"Would you, dear father?"

Again that spasm. But the bravo was a strong man, and why should the voice of a poor blind girl move him thus? He dashed his broad palm across his brow, and became himself again—Mat. Orrall.

"Sleep, my child—you are weary, Alice. Good night!" he said, in an altered and harsher tone.

"Yes, indeed, I am sleepy," answered the young girl. "Kiss me, father!"

The bravo stooped once more, and kissed his daughter's forehead. He carefully smoothed her pillow, and drew the covering of the bed over her slight form. Then, as she turned her sweet face toward the wall, he drew together the curtains of the caboose, and moved toward the other part of the room, where hung the hammock, in which his own restless nights were passed, and where was also a rough deal table, or board, fastened to the wall of the hut. At this table Mat. Orrall now seated himself, and, drawing from his pocket the purse which he had received from Atree, emptied its contents before him.

One—two—three! The bright gold pieces jingled upon that rude table, as the bravo counted them, ringing each coin sharply to test its metal. The man's grey eyes twinkled brightly, as the pleasant music greeted his ears, and his lip curled with a triumphant smile.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Matthew Orrall. "This is the stuff that rules the world! What would your whip or your tory do without it? What would your King George be worth if he had not his gold to buy soldiers? And where would be your Congress troops, if money did not pay for their patriotism?"

The bravo smiled grimly, and gathered the pieces in a pile before him. Then rising, he went towards the stove, and taking a small iron candlestick from the hearth beneath, lit at the swinging lamp a fragment of candle that remained in its socket. He glanced cautiously, as he did this, at the closed curtains of the caboose, and then moving to the opposite wall of the hut, stooped down and proceeded to lift a portion of the plank flooring. When this was effected, a dark narrow passage appeared, apparently leading in a sloping direction immediately under the wall. Matthew Orrall trimmed the wick of his lamp, and after examining the bolt of the door, which he had fastened on entering the house, gathered the gold from the table, and descended the subterranean passage.

The path was exceedingly slippery—the excavation running through a bed of clay, and so narrow that it at first scarcely permitted the man to force his way between the clammy sides. But, after proceeding a couple of yards the space became wider, and terminated in a sort of cove, the air of which was chilly as the grave. The excavation, in fact, was beneath the bank, which we have described as forming the protection of one side of the hut, and around which the river swept with an abrupt curve. The damp atmosphere arose in part from the clayey nature of the soil, and partly from the river-fogs, which obtained entrance through another sloping passage, leading upward through the bank, and opening directly upon the water's edge. Thus a communication could be had from the interior of the hut to the river; and a person pursued from the landside, and taking refuge in the dwelling, might easily escape by means of a boat brought close to the outlet at the other side of the bank. The whole had doubtless been contrived for a purpose like this, as well as for a place of secure deposit for stolen or contraband goods; the neighborhood about the hut having been generally the residence of the most lawless and desperate characters of the city.

Orrall stopped on arriving at the widest part of the cave, and stooping to the base of the clay wall, drew forth from a narrow aperture near the ground a small iron-bound chest. This he unlocked with a key which he drew from his pocket, and raising its lid, brought the feeble rays of the candle to bear upon its contents, causing an instantaneous flash of reflected light that for a moment appeared to illuminate the whole cavern.

The chest was nearly full of gold coins and jewels—the latter consisting of every variety of costly ornaments. Rich pearl and diamond necklaces, and brooches, magnificent finger-rings, and heavy pendants, miniature cases of the most elegant workmanship, splendid watches, and even wedges of solid gold, were exposed, glittering in the light of the candle, which the bravo held. Orrall laughed quietly as his eye gloated over the treasure.

"Ay, there ye lie," cried he; "there ye shine as bright as if there was no blood upon you. Ha! ha! Many a blow has been struck before ye were gathered in this box—many a quick stab and sudden plunge into the black ocean. Here," continued the bravo, lifting a pearl necklace from the heap, "here is a pretty thing that I once saw around as fair a neck as that of my bonnie Alice. Poor thing! she pleaded hard for her young life, but we sunk her with another sort of necklace about her throat."

The man's features contracted with a horrible expression as the memory of his crimes smote him for a moment; but he went on:

"This ring," he muttered, holding up a diamond ring, that sparkled like an eye amid the gloom. "It was on a delicate finger once. She refused to give it up, too, the proud lady, saying that it 'twas a love gift, and that she'd never part with it. And sure enough she kept it till we chopped her white finger off, when the breath had left her body."

Mat Orrall replaced the jewel in the chest, and with it the money he had received from Atree.

"Ay, ay," he muttered, "the heap grows bigger—the box will soon be full. Ha! 'twill be a fine fortune for the child—for Alice!"

The bravo's features once more softened into something like gentleness, but the momentary change was quickly succeeded by his dark, sneering smile.

"'Tis for her!" he cried fiercely. "'Tis for the blind girl, who shall never know that her father was a pirate and a murderer. It was for her that I've trod the bloody deck, and nailed my black flag to the mast. 'Twas for her that I've stabbed and throttled men, and been hunted like a wild beast, and outlawed from all good. Ha! ha! good! what does Mat. Orrall care for good? Who'll shed a tear when the buccaneer is run up to the yard-arm?"

The wretch buried his withering face in his hands, and almost sobbed with the terrible earnestness of his thoughts. Then, as if in answer to his last despairing question, he murmured, in an under tone:

"Alice!"

"Yes—yes!" he continued, "she'll remember Mat. Alice will remember the wretch who kissed her in her sleep!"

With these words the unhappy man closed and locked the chest, and deposited it once more in its receptacle. Then retracing his steps, the bravo regained the hut, and replaced the flooring as it had been before.

His candle had burned to its socket, but his swinging lamp still illuminated the apartment, and Mat. Orrall drew back the velvet curtain of the caboose to take a peep at his sleeping child.

She was not sleeping now. She was kneeling upon the couch, her hands clasped together, and her lips moving in prayer. There, in the darkness of her closed curtains, which was not darkness to her, was the child of the pirate and murderer, Matthew Orrall.

He now held his breath, and listened. The fall of a feather might have been heard in that rude hut, while the blind Alice prayed. She prayed that her father might not be angry with the beautiful angels of her dream.

UP WITH THE SUN.—To rise with the sun implies, in common parlance, very early habits of difficult attainment. "But," says Southey, "we rise with the sun at Christmas; and by continuing to do so till the middle of April, and without any perceptible change, we should find ourselves then rising at five o'clock, at which hour we might continue till September, and then accommodate ourselves again to the change of season, regulating always the time of retiring in the same proportion. They who require eight hours' sleep would, upon such a system, go to bed at nine during four months."

MELROSE ABBEY.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

PAUSE here awhile! and on these ruins look,
Worn with the footsteps of forgotten years;
Peruse this page in Time's black-lettered book;
Gaze long, and read how he his trophies rears.
See how each shattered shrine and sculptured nook
The deep gray impress of his footmark bears.
Who was it reared this ponderous pile of stone?
Ask Time! he only knows, who now reigns here alone.

View it when sunset through that arch doth stream,
Throwing a solemn splendor on the pile;
When the tall pillars flash back every beam,
And dusky crimson fills the vaulted aisle,
While the bowed roof of darker hue doth seem
As if it frowned upon the mocking smile
That gilds the ruins with a golden gray,
And with its gloomy look would chase the light away.

Gaze on that oriel now, 'tis shorn of all
Its saintly forms and gaudy colorings;
The deep blue tunic, and the purple pall,
The glowing gold that formed the vests of kings,
No longer flash at sunset on the wall;
Gone are the checkered angels' rainbow wings;
The hollow wind alone blows bleakly there,
And the cold moonlight comes through the broad blank to stare.

Altar and crucifix are now o'erthrown,
The wild briar waves where Mary Mother smiled:
And He whose sculptured agony had grown
Grim as the ruins round about him piled,
Rude hands have ages long ago hurled down;
But Time has sanctified what man defiled:
Though gone the Virgin's shrine, and shorn-crown'd brow,
It ne'er more holy seem'd, more meet for prayer than now.

See how the roof from clustering columns sprung,
Like some high forest-walk embowered and lone;
No branch is there in wild disorder flung,
But each arched brow has with its fellow grown,
Looking as if, while they in beauty hung,
Their growth was check'd, and changed at once to stone;

The bundled stems of each low arm bereft,
And their wide-spreading boughs for spanning arches left.

And from the ruined roof with fixed frown
See the Enchanter's gaze who changed the scene,
With stony eyes doom'd to look ever down,
(The corbels locked each springing arch between)
Waiting for Summer's green or Autumn's brown,
The aching gray around once more to screen:
So fancy deemed did think those forms of stone,
Which on the cold floor looked, and heard the wind's low moan.

Drooping between the oriel and the sky,
Like a dark banner the green ivy waves;
Casting a shadow where the dead still lie,
Or moving to and fro athwart their graves
Like silent spectres, ever gliding by,
With noiseless motion when the tempest raves;
Checkering the tombs with many a varied light,
The pale now somber'd o'er, then dusk, or silver-bright.

There was a time when, 'mid these ruins gray,
The pomp of Church and Chivalry were seen;
Amice and armor mingled there to pray;
And Beauty from those galleries did lean (Watching the entrance of the long array,
The abbot haught, and knight of austere mien,)
Her drooping eyelids glancing down abashed,
As some plumed warrior's gaze from the raised vizor flashed.

But they are gone! the dead that sleep below
Have left no record of their boasted deeds:
That time-worn stone once bore what thou wouldst know,

And, could it speak, would tell how moss and weeds
Did o'er its frail and chiseled glory grow;
But now within nought save the blind-worm feeds:
Where is the heart of Bruce? look round and see;
Perchance that nodding thistle yet may answer thee!

No more their war-cry shakes the battle-field,
Their trumpets wake the armed throng no more;
The cold gray granite is their only shield;
The tide of war has died upon the shore:

They who dealt death, to death themselves did yield:
The worms feed on those iron men of yore.
Look round and weep! here's all that thou canst see
Of pomp, and pride, and power, and gorgeous chivalry.

And on these mighty landmarks of the past
The heart still rests and scarcely dares to beat;
A silence falls upon us deep and vast:
It seems a land where Life and Death now meet,
And calmly on each other gaze at last;
Looking like friends amid this still retreat;
Still as Eternity with ruins crowned,
Gazing on the mute world that's stretched in silence round.

THE DEATH-WATCH.

A Fantastic Tale.

FROM THE GERMAN, BY JOHN OXENFORD.

COUNT MANFRED knelt, deeply affected, by the bed of his poor friend—now destined to be his death-bed. Silence and gloom were in the narrow room, which was only dimly lighted by a night-lamp. The moon shone, large and cold, through the one window, illuminating the wretched couch of the invalid. Soon loud groaning alone interrupted the melancholy stillness. Manfred felt a chill shudder in all his limbs, a sensation of horror came over him, and the bed of his slowly expiring friend, and he felt as if he must perforce go out among mankind, hear the breath of a living person instead of this death-rattle, and press a warm hand instead of the cold damp one of the dying man. He softly raised himself from his knees, and crept to the chimney to stir the almost extinct fire, that something bright and cheering might surround him. But the sick man raised himself up, and looked at him with fixed glassy eyes, while his heart rose higher and quicker with a breathless groaning.

The flame crackled and flew upward, casting a harsh gleam through the room. Suddenly a coal flew out with a loud noise and fell into the middle of the apartment upon the wooden floor. At the same time a terribly piercing cry arose from the bed, and Manfred who looked toward it with alarm, saw that the invalid was sitting up, and with eyes widely opened and out-stretched arms, was staring at the spot where the coal was lying. It was a frightful spectacle that of the dying man, who seemed to be struggling with a deep feeling of horror; on whose features death had already imprinted his seal; and whose short night gown was insufficient to conceal the dry and earth gray arms and legs which already assumed a death-like hue. Frightful was the loud rattle that proceeded from the heart of one who could scarcely be called alive or dead, and dull as from the grave sounded the isolated words which he uttered, still gazing upon the coal on the floor.

"Away—away with thee! why wilt thou remain there, specter? Leave me, I say."

Manfred stood overpowered with horror, his trembling feet refused to support him, and he leaned against the wall contemplating the actions of his friend, the sight of whom created the deepest terror. The voice of the invalid became louder and more shrill:

"Away with thee, I say! why dost thou cleave so fast to my heart? I say, leave me."

Then striking out with his arms he sprung out of the bed with unnatural force, and darting to the spot where the coal was lying, stooped down, grasped it in his hand, and flung it back upon the hearth. He then burst into a loud, wild laugh, which made poor Manfred's heart quail within him, and returned back to the bed.

But the coal had burned its very dross into the floor, and had left a black mark.

The room was again quiet. Manfred now breathed freely, and calmly crept to the couch of his friend, whose quiet regular breathing and closed eyes showed that he had fallen into a reposing sleep. Thus passed one hour, the slow progress of which Manfred observed on his friend's large watch, which lay upon the bed, and the regular ticking of which was the only interruption of the stillness of the night, except the still, quiet breathing of his friend.

The steeple clock in the vicinity announced by its striking that another hour had passed.

Manfred counted the strokes—it was twelve o'clock—midnight. He involuntarily shuddered, the thoughts of the legends and tales of his childhood darted through him like lightning, and he owned to himself that he had always felt a mysterious terror at the midnight hour. At the same moment his friend opened his eyes, and softly pronounced his name.

Manfred bent down to him. "Here I am, Karl."

"I thank you," said the sick man, in a faint voice, "for remaining by me thus faithfully. I am dying, Manfred."

"Do not speak so," replied the other, affectionately grasping the hand of his friend.

"I cease to see you," said Karl, more and more faintly and slowly; "dark clouds are before my eyes."

Suddenly he raised himself, took the watch which was lying by him, and placed it in Manfred's hands.

"I thank you," he said, "for all the love you have shown me; for all your kindness and consolation. Take this watch it is the only thing which now belongs to me. Wear it in remembrance of me. If it is permitted me, by this watch I will give you warning when I am near. Farewell."

He sunk back—his breath stopped—he was no more.

Manfred bent over him, called his name, laid his hand on the forehead, which was covered with perspiration; he felt it grow colder and colder. Tears of the deepest sympathy filled his eyes, and dropped upon the pale face of the dead man.

"Sleep softly," whispered Manfred, "and may the grave afford you that repose which you sought in vain upon earth!"

Once more he pressed to his bosom the hand of his deceased friend, wrapped himself in his cloak, put up the watch which Karl had bequeathed him, and retired to his residence.

The sun was already high when he awoke from an uneasy sleep. With feelings of pain he thought of the past night, and of his departed friend. In remembrance of him he drew out the watch, which pointed to the half hour, and held it to his ear. It had stopped; he tried to wind it up, but all in vain—it had not run down.

"Is it possible," murmured Manfred to himself, "that there was really some spiritual connexion between the deceased and this his favorite watch, which he constantly carried?"

He sank down upon a chair, and strange thoughts and forebodings passed through his excited mind.

"What is time?" he asked himself; "what is an hour? A machine artificially produced by human hands determines it, regulates it, and gives to life its significance, and to the mind its warnings. The awe which accompanies the midnight hour does not affect us if the hand of our watch goes wrong. The clock is the despot of man; regulating the actions both of kings and beggars. Nay, it is the ruler of time, which has subjected itself to its authority. The clock determines the very thoughts as well as the actions of man; is the propelling wheel of the human species. The maiden who reposes delighted in the arms of her lover, trembles when the ruthless clock strikes the hour which tears him from her. Her grief, her entreaties are all in vain. He must away, for the clock has ordered it. The murderer trembles in the full enjoyment of his fortune, for his eye falls on the hands of the clock, and they denote the hour when the already broken eye of the man he murdered looked upon him for the last time. In vain he endeavors to smile; it is beyond his power; for the clock has spoken, and his conscience awakes when he thinks of the horror of that hour. Shuddering with the feverish chill of mental anguish, the condemned culprit looks upon the clock, the hand of which slowly moving, brings nearer and nearer the hour of his death. It is not the rising and setting of the sun, it is not the light of day that determines the destruction; but the clock. When the hand, with cruel indifference, moves on and touches the figure of the hour which the judge has appointed for his death, the doors of the dungeon open, and he has ceased to live. As long as we live we are governed by the hour, and death alone frees us from the hour and the clock! Perhaps the whole of eternity, with its bliss, is nothing but an hourless, clockless existence; eternal, because without measure; blissful because not bound to a measured time."

Manfred had once more entered the desolate residence of his deceased friend, and stood mourning by the corpse, the face of which bore, in its stiffened features, the peace which Karl had never known in life.

He thought of the life of the deceased—how poor it was in joy, and how, during the four years he had known him he had never seen him smile. Tears came into his eyes, and he turned away from the corpse. Then his glance fell upon the black spot in the floor. The whole frightful scene of the preceding day revived in his soul, and the thought suddenly struck him, whether there might not be some strange connection between that particular spot and the strange excitement of mind. Fearful suspicions crossed his mind; he thought how often conscience had unmasked the criminal, in the hour of death; he remembered the frequent mysterious gloom of his friend; he remembered the wife with whom he had long lived unhappily, from whom he had been separated, and after whose residence Manfred had often inquired. On this subject Karl had always preserved silence, and often broke out into an unusual warmth. He reflected with what obstinacy Karl had remained in this room, although Manfred often and earnestly entreated him, as a friend and near relative, to go into his house. Nay, he now recollected quite clearly, that in the newspaper in which, years before he had read the arrival of Count Karl Manfred, it was stated that he had arrived with his wife. A few weeks after he had read of the arrival of his relative, Manfred had gone to him, and found him alone; and when Karl had told him of his separation from his wife, had inquired no farther.

All this now passed before his mind. He looked timidly back at the corpse, and it seemed to him as if it were scornfully nodding at him in confirmation of his thoughts.

"I must have certainty," he cried aloud, and stooped down to the floor. He now plainly perceived that the middle board, upon which was the burn, was looser than the others, and that the nails, which must have been there firmly, and the marks of which were still plainly to be seen, were wanting. He tried to raise the middle board, which at first resisted, but at last gave way a little. With a piece of wood he knocked the knife deeper into the floor; the nails became more and more unfastened, and he lifted and pulled with all the might of anxiety and curiosity. With a loud crack the board gave way; he raised it, and—sight of horror!—saw that a skeleton lay stretched out beneath. Manfred at first almost fainted; then feeling how necessary were calmness and presence of mind, he collected himself with a strong effort, and looked hard at the skeleton. It held a paper between its teeth, which Manfred with averted face, drew forth. Opening it, he soon recognised the handwriting of Karl. The words were as follows:

"That no innocent person may be exposed to suspicion, I hereby declare that I, Karl Manfred, am the murderer of this woman. This declaration can never injure me, as I am determined never to quit this room before my death. This small, wretched house, is my own property, and as I inhabit it alone, I am secure from discovery. When I am no more the secret will be unveiled, and for the finder of these lines I add, for nearer explanation, a short portion of the history of my life.

"I am the son of a collateral branch of the rich Count Manfred. My father was tolerably rich, and loved me; but he was haughty even to excess, and quite capable of sacrificing the happiness of his child to the pride he took in his ancestors. One day I went to the shop of a clock-maker to buy a watch. The clockmaker's daughter stood at the counter in the place of her father; her beauty excited my admiration, her innocent air attracted me; I talked with her for a long time, and at last bought a valuable watch set with brilliants. I then departed, but returned in a few days, and again, and again; in short, we were enamored of each other. I told my father that I had resolved to marry the clock-maker's daughter; he cursed me and disinherited me. But I persuaded my beloved to fly with me, and one night she robbed her father of his money and jewels, and effected her escape. We went far enough to remain undiscovered, and sold our brilliants, which, with the money we had taken, was sufficient to afford a considerable, nay, rather abundant fortune. As for the clock, which had been the cause of my acquaintance with my beloved Ulrica, I kept that constantly by me.

"Ulrica told me that her father had made it with his own hands. One day it stopped; I tried to wind it up, but all in vain, for it would not go. I laid it aside peevishly, and when, after some hours, I again took it in hand, it went. With a feeling of foreboding, inexplicable even to myself, I observed the hour, and some days afterwards read in the paper the announcement that Ulrica's father had died a beggar. We, however, continued happy in our mutual love. Years had passed away, when, one evening, I received an invitation from one of my friends. I was on the point of going, when Ulrica asked me when I should return. I named a time; "Leave me your watch then," said she, "that I may know exactly the hour at which I am to expect you, and delight myself with the prospect of your return." I gave her the watch, and departed. When the appointed hour had arrived, I hastened back to my dwelling, entered Ulrica's chamber, and—found her in the arms of one of my friends. She screamed with fright, while I stood petrified, and consequently unable to prevent the flight of the seducer. We remained opposite to each other, perfectly silent. "You must be more cautious," I said at last, and tried to smile; "you could have told by your watch when I was coming back, and when it was time to dismiss your other lover." At these words, I took the watch, and pointed at it scornfully. "It has stopped," said Ulrica, turning away. The watch had indeed stopped, and had thus deceived the deceiver, and caused the discovery of her crime. With unspeakable horror, I looked upon the watch, which I still held, when the hands slowly moved, and the watch was going. I swore to be revenged on the faithless woman, but preserved a bland exterior, and, with her, quitted the city. When, after a long journey, we arrived here, I inquired, whether it would be possible to purchase a small house, in which my wife and I might dwell alone, I soon found one, paid almost the entire remains of my ready money, and entered it with Ulrica. At night, when she was asleep, I tied a handkerchief about her mouth, that her cries might not alarm the neighborhood, and called her by her name. She awoke, and when she saw my ferocious countenance, stooping over her, knew my intention at once. She lay motionless, and I whispered into her ear: "I have awakened you, because I would not murder you in your sleep, and because I felt compelled to tell you why I kill you: it is because you have betrayed me." It is enough to say that I slew her. I had already turned the board from the floor, and now placed her in the cavity. I then took out the watch, as if, having betrayed the false one, it had a right to see how I revenged my wrong. It stood still, the unmoved hand pointing to the half-hour after midnight—the time when I murdered Ulrica. I laughed aloud, and sat down to write these lines: To-morrow morning I shall lock up my house, and travel for a time. When I return, the body will have decayed."

Manfred had read the manuscript, shuddering, and having finished it, looked again on the corpse of his friend. It had changed frightfully. The features, which before had been so calm and so clearly marked, now bore an aspect of despair, and were distorted by convulsions. At this moment the mysterious watch, which Count Manfred had put into his breast pocket, began its regular sound, but so very loudly, that Manfred heard plainly, without taking it out, that the watch was going.

An irresistible feeling of horror came over poor Manfred. He darted out of the room, and hurried into his own residence, in which he locked himself for the entire day. He had laid the watch before him, stared at it, and fearful thoughts crossed his mind. On the following day he was calm, but could not summon resolution to see the corpse again. He caused it to be quietly buried. The house he had already bought of poor Karl for the sake of contributing something towards his support.

Some nights after the burial, the stillness of night was broken by an alarm of fire, and at the very house in which Count Karl had lived. At first, as the house was uninhabited, the opinion prevailed that it had been purposely set on fire, but, as it had not been insured, this opinion gained no credence. Count Manfred set out on his travels, that with the various scenes of a wanderer's life he might get rid of the gloomy mind that troubled him. The watch he took with him. He fancied that some great misfortune would befall him, if he did not attend to it; he considered it as a sort of demon, always wore it, and regularly wound it up. For years it went well. Count Manfred had recovered his former cheerfulness, and indeed was happier than ever, for he loved and was beloved in return. Dreaming of a happy future, he arose from his bed on the day appointed for his wedding. "I have slept long, perhaps too long" he said to himself. He caught up his watch to see how late it was, but—the watch had stopped. A loud cry of anguish arose from his heart. He hurried on his clothes, and hastened to his bride. She was well and cheerful, and Manfred laughed at himself for his foolish superstition. However, when the wedding was over, he could not refrain from looking at his watch once more. It was going. After some weeks, Count Manfred discovered that the ill-omened watch had spoken truly after all. He had been deceived in his wife, and found that she would bring nothing but unhappiness. A melancholy gloom took possession of the poor Count. For whole days he would stare at the watch, and grinning spectres seemed to rise from the dial-plate and to dance round him in derision. In the morning, when he arose from his bed, he looked trembling at his watch, always expecting that it would stop, and thus indicate some new calamity. He felt revived, and breathed again, when the hands moved on, but yet, from hour to hour, he would cast anxious glances at the watch. His wife bore him a son, and the feeling of parental joy seemed to dissipate his gloom. In an unusually cheerful mood he was seen to play with his child, sitting for half the day at the cradle, and by his own smile teaching the little one to smile also. The very watch, which had been the torment of his soul, must now serve to amuse the child, who laughed when it was held to his ear, and he could hear the soft ticking. One day, however, as Manfred approached the cradle, he found the child uncommonly pale. His heart trembled with anxiety, and following a momentary impulse, he drew out the watch, which stood still. With a fearful cry, Manfred flung it from him, so that it sounded on the ground, and scarcely in a state of consciousness, buried his face in his hands. The child fell into convulsions, and died in a few hours. Manfred was, at first, beside himself with grief; then he became still, and walked calm and uncomplaining around the room in which the corpse lay. Having struck his fist against something, he looked down, and saw that it was his watch, which was still on the floor. He picked it up and held it to his ear;—it was going! Manfred laughed aloud, till he made the silent room echo frightfully with the sound. "Good! good!" he cried, with an insane look. "You will not leave me, devil! stop with me, then!" From this time, it was his serious conviction that the spirit of Karl the murderer, whom he had called his friend, had found no rest in the grave, but had been placed in the watch, that it might hover round him as a messenger of evil. He ceased to think of, feel, hear anything but his watch; he wound it up, trembling, every evening; he held it in his hand throughout the night, and kept awake, gazing upon it. Some months afterwards his wife bore him a daughter, and died in childbirth. The news made no further impression upon Manfred than that he looked at his watch, and whispered, "It has not stopped."

When his new-born daughter was brought to him, he looked at her with indifference, and glancing at the watch said, "It will stop soon!"

His bodily strength soon gave way under this ceaseless anguish of mind. He fell into a violent fever, and, in a few weeks, was buried by the side of his son.

MONTENEGRO WOMEN.

THOUGH able, the men are seldom inclined to carry any thing, or take any trouble they can transfer to the women, who are the beasts of burden in Montenegro; and I have seen women toiling up the steepest hills under loads which men seldom carry in other countries. They are, therefore, very muscular and strong, and the beauty they frequently possess is soon lost by the hard and coarse complexions they acquire, their youth being generally exhausted by laborious and unfeminine occupations. The sheaves of Indian corn, the bundles of wood, and every thing required for the house or the granary, are carried by women; and the men are supposed to be too much interested about the nobler pursuits of war or pillage to have time to attend to meaner labors. As soon as the tillage of the land is performed, they think that they have done all the duties incumbent upon men; the inferior drudgery is the province of the women, and the Montenegrin toils only when his inclination demands the effort. The men, therefore (as is often the case in that state of society), whenever active and exciting pursuits are wanting, instead of returning to participate in or lighten the toils necessity has imposed on the women, are contented to smoke the pipe of idleness, or indulge in desultory talk, imagining that they maintain the dignity of their sex by reducing women to the condition of slaves. The Montenegrin woman not only kisses the hand of her husband, as in the East, but also of strangers; and a traveler, as he passes through the country, is surprised to receive this strange token of welcome, at the house where he lodges, and even on the road. It must, however, be remembered, that he is thus honored as the guest, whose visit is sanctioned by the Vladika, and his hospitable reception depends on his being accompanied by some attendant from the capital.

A Molacco believes that if he murders any one he will be haunted by his shade, unless he carries about him a piece of the murdered man's dress. The part preferred for this purpose is taken from the sash; and, having once put it on his breast, beneath his clothes, he never goes without it. He has also a belief that the blood of the dead body will boil up, whenever he goes near it; and so strong is this fear, that if obliged to approach it, or when, in order to lull suspicion, he is induced to do so voluntarily, he will never look directly at it; and these two superstitious notions, as may be supposed, have frequently been taken advantage of for the detection of crime. The strong objection of the Morlacchi to take an oath has, in some instances, been construed into a proof of guilt; but this arises from mere prejudice; and the innocent man is quite as averse to it as the most culpable, even through he might thereby established his innocence, and it is only by degrees that the Austrians can succeed in overcoming this, and other strange scruples. They also believe that, when a man dies, especially one who has led a bad life, he comes out of the tomb, about forty days after his death, and haunts his neighbors, as a Vukozlak, or vampire, and sucks the blood of their children. The moment notice is given of his having appeared to any one, application is made to a priest, who proceeds forthwith to the tomb, and having pricked the body with pins or sharp thorns, thus prevents his future wanderings upon earth, and disarranges the domestic economy of the vampire, which consists of a body full of blood. When, as is sometimes the case, in these more enlightened days, a priest cannot be induced to perform the ceremony, the people do it themselves, and those who have the misfortune of living in bad company frequently take the precaution to pick the bodies of their friends, at the time of the burial, to prevent accidents.

The Vistize (witches) are married women who have led a bad life, and who have made a compact with the devil. Even while living their spirits leave their bodies, and flying about by night, as sparks of fire, inflict great injuries on those they dislike. They unite together in numbers and hold a consultation beneath some large walnut tree, respecting the calamity they shall bring upon them. If a husband suspects his wife to be one of this community, he waits till she is asleep in bed, and then turns her head where her feet were, so that the spirit, on its return, being unable to re-enter the body, is obliged to request him to place it in its original position. The discovery, however, is far from agreeable, as he lives in constant fear that she will do him some injury; but I could not discover that this notion had the effect of improving the treatment of women by their husbands.

Morra is really a nightmare, but is rather more serious in its consequences in Dalmatia than in other countries. It is supposed to be caused by a girl, who, as a spirit, goes to seek the man she loves contrary to his wishes, he being at the time in love with some other person. She, therefore, torments him, and seeks by these means to force him to renounce his favorites, and marry her. In order to ascertain whether she really visits him as a morra, or if it is merely a dream, he places a handkerchief before his door, on going to bed, folded in the shape of a cross; and if he finds next morning that it has been unfolded, he feels persuaded she has been to visit him, and that seeing the cross she had abstained from molesting him, being satisfied in disturbing the charm. The consequence is that she comes no more; but still his apprehension is not over; he dreads lest she should become the wife of another man, and then turning Viestizza, should do him some great injury (for it is only married women who have the power of assuming the character), and his only chance of safety is to apply to a priest for an amulet to protect him. This consists of a piece of paper with the name of God written within, and a cross on the outside, which being folded up flat and sewed into a piece of cloth, is worn at the back of the neck, much in the same way as charms in the East.

Dreams are of great importance among the Morlacchi, who, when their parents or friends appear to them, apply to a priest to interpret the vision. With great seriousness, he persuaded them that the souls of their friends are in purgatory, and require alms and masses to release them; often extracting large sums by this appeal to their fears and generosity; and Loerich says that many have been impoverished by these tricks of priestly avarice.

The Macich is a 'spirito folletto,' or elf, in the form of a boy, who is always laughing, and appears with a small cap on his head. The superstition is very common in the southern part of the Isle of Brazza. He who sees him is considered very fortunate, as he may order him to do whatever he likes. When commanded to bring him money, the boy generally proposes to go to some neighbor's house, and fetch it immediately; but if the man is honest, and objecting to this proposal, orders him to bring it from some place, in such a manner that no one shall be injured, he offers to go for it into the sea, and on his return, dripping with water, presents the wished for treasure.

The Vila (fata, or fairy) is the good companion of a man; not like the demon of Socrates, but a handsome girl, who accompanies him every where, assisting him in all his undertakings, and carrying him wherever he wishes. The fortunate man is called Vilenik, and is envied by his friends, and feared by his enemies.

MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

JAMES I.—James was always boasting of his skill in what he called Kingcraft; and yet it is hardly possible even to imagine a course more directly opposed to all the rules of Kingcraft than that which he followed. The policy of wise rulers has always been to disguise strong acts under popular forms. It was thus that Augustus and Napoleon established absolute monarchies, while the public regarded them merely as eminent citizens, invested with temporary magistracies. The policy of James was the direct reverse to theirs. He enraged and alarmed his parliament by constantly telling them that they held their privileges merely during his pleasure, and that they had no more business to inquire what he might lawfully do than what the Deity might lawfully do. Yet he quailed before them, abandoned minister after minister to their vengeance, and suffered them to tease him into acts directly opposed to his strongest inclinations. Thus the indignation excited by his claims, and the scorn excited by his concessions, went on growing together. By his fondness for worthless minions, and by the sanction which he gave to their tyranny and rapacity, he kept discontent constantly alive. His cowardice, his childishness, his pedantry, his ungainly person and manners, his provincial accent, made him an object of derision. Even in his virtues and accomplishments there was something eminently unkingly. Thus during the whole course of his reign, all the venerable associations by which the throne had long been fenced, were gradually losing their strength. During two hundred years, all the sovereigns who had ruled England, with the single exception of the unfortunate Henry the Sixth, had been strong-minded, high-spirited, courageous, and of princely bearing. Almost all had possessed abilities above the ordinary level. It was no light thing, that on the very eve of the decisive struggle between our kings and their parliaments, royalty should be exhibited to the world, stammering, slobbering, shedding unmanly tears, trembling at a drawn sword, and talking in the style alternately of a buffoon and of a pedagogue.

THE LAST FEMALE POLITICAL VICTIM IN ENGLAND.—Among the persons concerned in the Rye House Plot was a man named James Burton. By his own confession he had been present when the design of assassination was discussed by his accomplices. When the conspiracy was detected a reward was offered for his apprehension. He was saved from death by an ancient matron, of the Anabaptist persuasion, named Elizabeth Gaunt. This woman, with the peculiar manners and phraseology which then distinguished her sect, had a large charity. Her life was passed in relieving the unhappy of all religious denominations, and she was well known as a common visitor of the jails. Her political and theological opinions, as well as her compassionate disposition, led her to do every thing in her power for Burton. She procured a boat which took him to Gravesend, where he got on board a ship bound for Amsterdam. At the moment of parting she put into his hand a sum of money which, for her means, was very large. Burton, after living some time in exile, returned to England with Monmouth; fought at Sedgemoor, fled to London, and took refuge in the house of John Fernley, a barber in Whitechapel. Fernley was very poor; he was besieged by creditors; he knew that a reward of 100*l.* was offered for the apprehension of Burton; but the honest man was incapable of betraying one who, in extreme peril, had come under the shadow of his roof. Unhappily, it was soon noised abroad that the anger of James was more excited against those who harbored rebels than against rebels themselves. He had publicly declared that, of all forms of treason, the hiding of a traitor from his vengeance was the most unpardonable. Burton knew this. He delivered himself up to the government; and he gave information against Fernley and Elizabeth Gaunt. They were brought to trial. The villain whose life they had preserved had the heart and the forehead to appear as the principal witness against them. They were convicted—Fernley was sentenced to the gallows, Elizabeth Gaunt to the stake. Even after all the horrors of that year, many thought it impossible that these judgments could be carried into execution. But the king was without pity. Fernley was hanged; Elizabeth Gaunt was burned alive at Tyburn on the same day on which Cornish suffered death at Cheapside. She left a paper, written indeed in no graceful style, yet such as was read by many thousands with compassion and horror.

"My fault," she said, "was one which a prince might well have forgiven. I did but relieve a poor family, and lo! I must die for it!"

She complained of the insolence of the judges, of the ferocity of the jailer, and the tyranny of him, the great one of all, to whose pleasure she and so many other victims had fallen a sacrifice. In as far as they had injured herself she forgave them; but in that they were implacable enemies of that good cause, which would yet revive and flourish, she left them to the judgment of the King of kings. To the last she preserved a tranquil courage, which reminded the spectators of the most heroic deaths of which they had read in Fox. William Penn, for whom exhibitions which humane men generally avoid seem to have had a strong attraction, hastened from Cheapside, where he had seen Cornish hanged, to Tyburn, in order to see Elizabeth Gaunt burned. He afterwards related that, when she calmly disposed the straw around her in such a manner as to shorten her sufferings, the bystanders burst into tears. It was much noticed that, while the foulest judicial murder which had disgraced even those times was perpetrated, a tempest burst forth, such as had not been known since the great hurricane which had raged round the death-bed of Oliver. The oppressed Puritans reckoned up, not without a gloomy satisfaction, the houses which had been blown down and the ships which had been cast away, and derived some consolation from thinking that Heaven was bearing awful testimony against the iniquity which afflicted the earth. Since that terrible day no woman has suffered death in England for any political offense.

A MAIDEN'S DEFENSE.—The following is from "Pepy's Diary," just brought out by Lord Braybrooke: "18th August, 1667.—Walked towards Whitehall, just being wearied turned into St. Dunstan's church, where I heard an able sermon by the minister of the place, and stood by a pretty, modest maid, whom I did labor to take by the hand; but she would not, and got further and further from me; and at last I could perceive her to take pins out of her pocket to prick me if I should touch her again; which seeing, I did forbear, and was glad I did spy her design. And then I fell to gaze upon another pretty maid, in a pew close to me, and she on me; and I did go about to take her by the hand, which she suffered a little, and then withdrew." So the sermon ended, and the church broke up, and my amours ended also.

BUILDING HOUSES FOR BURNING.—On examining into the causes of the rapidity of the spread of flames in London houses when on fire, it will almost invariably be found that, whatever may have occasioned the fire to break out, the rapidity of its progress has been in proportion to the greater or less extent of the lath and plaster partitions, the hollow wooden floors, and the wooden staircases. Were the occupiers of houses sufficiently aware of the danger from lath and plaster partitions, especially when they enclose staircases, they would never occupy such houses; or, if they did, they would not give such rents for them as they would for houses with brick nogging partitions. And again and again we protest against the absurdity of constructing buildings as if for the express purpose of readily burning; and urge, on the other hand, the importance of adopting every precaution to render them fire-proof, and the sin against society which the neglect of this precaution involves.—[Builder,

A TOAST.

BY T. HOOD.

COME! a health! and it's not to be slighted with sips,
A cold pulse, or a spirit supine;
All the blood in my heart seems to rush to my lips,
To commingle its flow with the wine!

Bring a cup, of the purest and solidest ware,
But a little antique in its shape;
And the juice it shall be the most racy and rare,
All the bloom with the age of the grape!

Even such is the love I would celebrate now,
At once young, and mature, and in prime—
Like the tree of the orange, that bears on its bough
The bud, blossom and fruit at one time!

Then with three, as is due, let the honors be paid,
While I give with my hand, heart, and head—
Here's to her, the fond mother, dear partner, kind maid,
Who first taught me to love, woo, and wed!

ADELA.

FROM reason and observation, we are led to infer that every creature has its share of joy, and is no less certain than his fellows of undergoing his allotted portion of sorrow. Such at least is the universal opinion; and it cannot be denied that, in the hours of the most placid ease of ecstatic enjoyments, we are not unfrequently awakened from our dream of happiness to the recollection of misfortunes which belong to human nature; and I believe that the cloud which then overshadows our spirit derives as much of its darkness from our sympathy with the woes of others, as from that mere selfish feeling which would lead us to exclusive regard to our own destiny in the checkered mazes of life. I believe I may say that those who have themselves felt the miseries known to others by mere description, are softened by misfortune, and that they are rendered more compassionate by the sense of suffering which they have themselves endured. To use the metaphor of an eastern poet, "The sandal tree sheds its perfume on the axe that wounds it." To these I dedicate my tale.

In one of those beautiful towns that dot the southern coast of our island, I made some stay in the course of a tour through the western counties of England. It was here that I saw the heroine of my story, at one of the annual balls which attract the fair denizens of the neighborhood.

Adela Mowbray was in her eighteenth year; her stature was that of middle height, which exquisite art has chosen for its beau ideal of feminine beauty; her dark blue eyes were fringed with long and silken eye-lashes; her glossy hair, which vied in blackness with the plumage of the raven, fell in thick clustered ringlets upon her shoulders; the polished forehead, the Grecian mouth, bordered as it was with lips of the purest vermilion, added to the exquisite symmetry which was displayed in the formation of her limbs, it was not without difficulty that the eyes were withdrawn from their gazing. But as she was the most lovely of the many beautiful forms which graced that assembly, so also it was easy to perceive that she was the least happy. Her manner was not without cheerfulness, but it appeared to be the result of a painful effort, and the hectic spot that flushed her pale cheek seemed to tell that an inward melancholy had taken possession of her heart, and that as the soul was crushed by the weight of sorrow, so the body was soon to follow in the race of destruction. Her appearance, in good sooth, did not belie her situation—for Death had already laid his icy hand upon her. There was something so uncommon and interesting in the pensive gaiety (if I may use such an expression) of this angelic creature, that I made such inquiries concerning her as were in my power; and one of those good-natured, gossiping old ladies, to whom the affairs of every one else are more important than their own, furnished me with the outlines of her history.

Sir Robert Mowbray was the last male representative of a long line of noble ancestors; and the immense estates, which by inheritance and bequest, had centered in him, were the magnificent appanage of this, his only daughter. He was the proudest scion of a proud stock; and although his haughtiness was never shown in overbearing conduct to his inferiors, it was not the less deeply seated in his bosom. The rector of one of the parishes belonging to Sir Robert, and in which he usually resided, was his most intimate, perhaps his only intimate friend. The connection had begun during their residence at college, and these ties, as they had not been broken by years of separation, were therefore drawn more closely together; and the similarity of their circumstances, each of them having been early deprived of the beloved partners of their fortunes, added not a little to the strength of their friendship.

Mr. Clifford (such was his name) had a son and daughter of the same age as Adela, in whose society she passed the greater part of her time. They were brought up together, and received their instructions from the same masters; in fact, they were hardly ever separated. This intimacy between the young ladies was the means of bringing William Clifford very frequently into the presence of Adela. As he was by no means destitute of personal advantages, and a good share of intellect, which he well knew how to render available in conversation, it is not surprising that his fascinating manners would have made a deep impression on the mind of his young friend; and the attentions which he paid her were the more calculated to rivet her attachment. The retired habits of her father prevented her from meeting with the same assiduous respect from others which pervaded the conduct of her admirer; and the friendship in which this intimacy had commenced was shortly superceded by the most dangerous bonds of love. He, too, with the unthinking rashness of youth, had yielded to the impulse of passion; and forgetting the distance which fortune had set between him and the adored of his heart, thought only of how he might draw her affections more closely around him, and perhaps indulging a species of selfishness the most excusable, if that vice ever admits of apology, regarded only his present enjoyment, and the possible fulfilment of his aspiring hopes, to the neglect of her future happiness and his own peace of mind. The presence of his sister, though it was a cover for their frequent meetings, was yet a restraint upon their conduct, and might have prevented the evils which I have to relate. But Death, who with an unsparing hand crops the spring-blossom as well as the ripe fruit, summoned her to an early tomb; and the affection of Adela, which before had been divided between the brother and the sister, were now centered in one object. Their meetings were not now less frequent than formerly, but they were not so public. They were forced to snatch those hours by stealth in which they communed together; and the secrecy which they were obliged to observe, the danger and mystery of these meetings, and their necessarily lonely character, were not calculated to wean their young hearts from this ill-advised connection. Notwithstanding their caution they were unable to elude discovery; and the surprise and shock which it occasioned their parents was not a little increased by its being totally unexpected. The friendship which Sir Robert felt for Clifford was not extended with so lavish a hand to his children; and, if he had been the tenderest and most amiable of fathers, could not have been otherwise than displeased at so untoward an alliance.

The very moderate prospects of the young Clifford were not such as entitled him to think for a moment of uniting himself to the heiress of the Mowbrays; and if he had ever, in his cooler moments, entertained such a hope, it must have had, even to his sanguine temperament, only the appearance of a fading vision, a dream so indistinct and undefined, that the mind of man could not look forward to its accomplishment without incurring a suspicion of insanity.

I have said that the most affectionate and forgiving of parents would not have felt flattered by this discovery. Judge then of the effect which it produced on the mind of the haughty Mowbray. He insisted on the immediate removal of young Clifford; nor could his father make any reasonable objection to this requisition of parental jealousy.

He was destined for the law, and previously to his entering upon the actual study of that arduous profession, it was thought fit that he should graduate at one of the universities. He was forthwith sent to Cambridge, and amid the mathematical sons of Granta he soon forgot the sorrows of separation; at least the pangs that he first suffered were deadened by the dissipation of his gayer hours, or by the close reasoning which was necessary for his more serious occupations.

Not so with the fair object of his vows and protestations. Man has many ways in employing his mind; many paths in which he may tread, free from the seductive blandishments of love. Ambition, interest, and glory, are to him such powerful incentives, that the softer passions are merged and drowned in the more lofty sensations excited by the former. But woman, excluded as she is from all these views of honor and advancement, is taught by nature to cherish the more amiable feelings of humanity; her heart is more open to the tender impressions of love, and is so much more capable of restraining them, that they are scarcely ever effaced from the tablet on which they have been once imprinted. He who receives her virgin affections, has them, and holds them even in the grave. It is but too true that she loves once and for ever. Adela had too intensely and too entirely loved to forget the object on which she had bestowed her heart. She made no attempt to soften the dictum of her father, for she knew him to be unrelenting as he was proud. "Concealment preyed on her damask cheek," and she was fast sinking into the grave, a victim of unguarded passion.

It was some month after the eclaircissement I have mentioned, that I saw her, and I was told that this was the first time that she had been in public since her parting with her lover. Nay, that she was here only in the faint hope of catching one glance of him for whom she had abandoned all her prospects of grandeur, and was soon to give a more melancholy proof of the constancy of her attachment. He was not there, and she returned home sad and sick at heart, borne down by the weight of former grief and present disappointment. The remainder of the story I learned on my return to the university, from a common friend of Clifford and myself.

Shortly after I had seen her she fell into a rapid decline, and the physicians that were called in by the miserable parent could give but faint hopes of her recovery. Diseases of the mind are beyond the most subtle remedies, and the skill of the acutest physician cannot administer consolation to a broken spirit. They could but recommend the removal of the cause of her malady, and even then the chance of her amendment was but trifling. A drowning man will catch at a straw for support, so strong is the principle of hope within us, and the distracted father immediately sent an express to Clifford to summon him to her presence. But his consent to Adela's union had not been wrung from him till it was too late to preserve her. She lived, however, till Clifford arrived in breathless haste at her father's bidding. Nor had she lost all consciousness, for as he approached the couch on which her extended form was laid, her eye seemed to recover its wonted brightness, and her thin lips moved as if in thanksgiving for the bliss that was permitted her in her parting moments. As the warm tears fell on her cheek from the eyes of her disconsolate lover, she heaved a faint sigh. He clasped her frantically to his bosom, but her pure spirit had flitted from its earthly tenement, and he embraced but the corpse of his once beautiful Adela.

He that you mark for your friend, let him be a virtuous person; for an ill man can neither long love, or be long beloved. Thus the friendships of wicked men are rather to be called conspiracies than friendships.

Ages of activity are hardly sufficient to create an empire; one day of slumber can destroy it.

BETTER THAN BEAUTY.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

My love is not a beauty
To other eyes than mine;
Her curls are not the fairest,
Her eyes are not divine;
Nor yet like rose-buds parted,
Her lips of love may be;
But though she's not a beauty,
She's dear as one to me.

Her neck is far from swan-like,
Her bosom unlike snow;
Nor walks she like a deity
This breathing world below:
Yet there's a light of happiness
Within, which all may see;
And though she's not a beauty,
She's dear as one to me.

I would not give the kindness,
The grace, that dwells in her,
For all that Cupid's blindness
In others might prefer!
I would not change her sweetness
For pearls of any sea;
Far better far than beauty
Is one kind heart to me.

BEAUTY.

THE COUNTENANCE.

To preserve to the complexion that freshness and brilliancy of appearance which is so necessary to beauty, and to remove from the skin those incidental evils to which it is exposed by a variety of circumstances, is an object of considerable importance, and requiring great care. All applications of cosmetics, and other preparations containing mineral substances, should, (unless in extreme cases, when they must be applied under the management and direction of skilful medical advice) be carefully avoided. Any transient advantage they may possess is more than counterbalanced by the inevitable ruin they never fail, sooner or later, to produce.

The recipes given in this chapter are of at least a harmless, and in most instances they will be found of a beneficial character, having been recommended by eminent medical authorities.

TO REMOVE FRECKLES.—Freckles are occasioned by exposure to heat, and give to the complexion a very disagreeable appearance; they are removed by the following applications, the surface of the skin having been previously softened by a little mild balsam or emollient paste.

FRECKLE PASTE.—One ounce of bitter almonds, one ounce of barley flour. Mix with a sufficient quantity of honey to make the whole into a smooth paste, with which the face, particularly where freckles appear, is to be anointed at night, and the paste washed off in the morning.

FRECKLE WASH.—Take one drachm of muriatic acid, half a pint of rain water, half a teaspoonful of spirit of lavender. Mix them well together, and apply two or three times a day to the freckles with a camel's hair brush.

PURIFYING WASH FOR THE SKIN.—Take one teaspoonful of liquor of potash, two ounces and a half of pure water, and a few drops of eau-de-cologne. Mix and apply as above.

If these means do not prove effectual, it is plain that the blood or bile is in a state of disorder, and recourse must be had to internal and more active remedies.

SUNBURN.

Sunburn and freckles are of the same nature, and generally originate in the same causes. If sunburn arises solely from external heat the following remedies will, in most cases, prove effectual.

LEMON CREAM FOR SUNBURN AND FRECKLES.—Put two spoonfuls of fresh cream into half a pint of new milk; squeeze into it the juice of a lemon, and half a pint of brandy, a little alum, and loaf sugar; boil the whole, skim well, and when cool, it is fit for use.

GRAPE LOTION FOR SUNBURN.—Dip a bunch of green grapes in a basin of water; sprinkle it with powdered alum and salt mixed together; wrap it in paper, and bake it under hot ashes; then express the remaining juice, and wash the face with the liquor.

PREVENTIVE WASH FOR SUNBURN.—Take two drachms of borax, one drachm of Roman alum, one drachm of camphor, half an ounce of sugar candy, a pound of ox gall; mix and stir well together, and repeat the stirring three or four times a day, until the mixture becomes transparent. Then strain it through filtering paper, and it is fit for use.

PIMPLES.

Pimples appear frequently on the face, especially on the sides of the nose; when full, they must be pierced with a needle, and the matter entirely pressed out. This done, the following preparation usually prevents their return:

Take one ounce of bitter almonds, one ounce of barley flour, mix them with honey, until they form a smooth paste, and anoint the skin at night.

A little friction with the hand, covered with a soft glove, is often found to be of essential service. Small red pimples are of frequent recurrence, and very troublesome, but it is dangerous to remove them by repellant applications; they are produced by various causes, such as surfeit, drinking cold milk, or water, when in a state of unnatural heat, or eating cold vegetables. When they arise from these causes they become fixed, and continue occasionally to make their appearance to old age. They are almost the certain results of gluttony and intemperance, and are sometimes produced by hot rooms or violent exercise. Dr. Darwin mentions a lady who became afflicted with them from drinking vinegar. Persons so afflicted should by all means avoid the exciting cause, whatever it may be.

THE FIRST WIFE OF MILTON.

"Such virtues must prevail, and day by day
Perfect their power; for, though of gentlest kind,
Yet urg'd perpetual, such the sternest heart
Must gradual soften, and at length subdue.
Hast thou not seen the fountain's falling drops
Scoop, in long time, the most obdurate stone?"

MASON GOOD'S Lucretius.

MILTON had not lived long with his first wife before a difference arose, which ended in a separation; the lady returned to the house of her father, and Milton published his work on the "Doctrine and Discipline of Divorces," with the intention, it is said, of marrying another wife. In this, however, he was prevented, by a singular reconciliation with the lady from whom he had separated. One day, when he was visiting a friend, his wife, who had been planted in the adjoining room, burst suddenly upon him; and he was surprised to find one whom he thought never to have seen again, making submission, and begging pardon on her knees before him. His own generous nature, and the intercession of friends, soon effected a reconciliation; and they lived happily together for the remainder of her life.

It is said that this interview left such an imagination, as contributed very materially to his writing that beautifully pathetic scene in "Paradise Lost," in which Eve addresses Adam for pardon and peace. The passage will indeed be seen to be strikingly applicable:

"He added not, and from her turned; but Eve,
Not so repuls'd, with tears that cens'd not flowing,
And tresses all disorder'd, at his feet
Fell humble; and embracing them, besought
His peace; and thus proceeded in her plaint:
'Forsake me not thus, Adam; witness Heaven
What love sincere, and reverence in my heart,
I bear thee, and unweeting have offended,
Unhappily deceiv'd! Thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knee; bereave me not (Whereon I live!) thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy counsel, in this uttermost distress,
My only strength and stay! Forlorn of thee,
Whither shall I betake me—where subsist?
While yet we live (scarce one short hour, perhaps),
Between us two let there be peace!'"

The selfish man may accumulate the most property, but the benevolent man is most happy; the former may roll over beds of golden sands, and be the most miserable of God's creatures, while the latter has a peace and joy within which he would not exchange for all the world.

SCHOOLS OF THE OLDEN TIME.

THE schools, the schools of other days!

These were the schools for me;
When, in a frock and trousers dress'd,
I learn'd my A B C;
When, with my dinner in my hat,
I trudged away to school;
Nor dared to stop, as boys do now,
For school-ma'ams had a rule.
With locks well-comb'd, and face so clean,
(Boys wash'd their faces then,)
And a "stick-horse" to ride upon,
(What happy little men!)
And if a traveler we met,
We threw no sticks or stones,
To fright the horses as they pass'd,
Or break good people's bones;
But, with our hats beneath our arms,
We bent our heads full low;
For ne'er the school-ma'am fail'd to ask,
"Boys, did you make a bow?"

PARISIAN CLEANLINESS.

In Paris, every species of refuse is husbanded in the most careful manner. No refuse is allowed to be thrown into the streets after a very early hour in the morning, nor until after 10 o'clock at night. The refuse consists of what may be called the house dirt, and is laid in heaps in front of the houses near the gutters. A very numerous class of people, called chiffonniers, consisting of as many women as men, with deep baskets on their backs, and a small stick with a hook at the end, carefully turn over every one of these heaps, selecting from them every article of bone, leather, iron, paper, and glass, which are thrown at once into their baskets, and being carried to their places of general deposit, are there again examined and assorted, and appropriated to any specific application for which they may be suited. These persons appear like a most degraded class; they inhabit particular quarters of the city, and the interior of their habitations is such as might be expected from their occupation. The profession descends in families from father to son, and from mother to daughter. They are a most industrious race of people; and many of them may be seen, even at midnight, with their lanterns, taking advantage of the first pickings, and anticipating the labors of the coming morning, and with the earliest dawn they are sure to be found at their tasks. No article of food escapes them, and they call the street their mother, because she often thus literally gives them bread. Though their occupation is necessarily dirty, yet they are almost always comfortably clad, and are never ragged. They never beg, and disdain to be considered objects of charity. They are licensed by the city authorities for which some trifling sum is paid, and for which they must be recommended for their sobriety and good conduct. They have their particular district assigned them, and are very careful to prevent all foreign intrusion.

The chiffonniers have done their work, next come the sweepers and collectors of dirt. Every inhabitant of Paris is required, under a penalty, to have the sidewalk in front of his place of business or residence carefully swept every morning. The sweepers of the streets of Paris are almost uniformly women, who with long twig or birch brooms, sweep the streets thoroughly, and all the accumulations are taken in carts to be transported to the great places of deposit. The women assist as much in loading the carts as the men. These women appear to work extremely hard, carrying always a long broom in their hands, and a shovel fastened to their backs, to be used as occasion may require. The gutters in Paris are washed out every morning, by fountains which are placed in every street, and what these sweepers are not able to collect for the carts they are careful to sweep into the drains leading into the common sewers. I have looked at these people and the chiffonniers with great interest; and, filthy and disgusting as their occupation necessarily is, I have always felt in my heart a sincere respect for persons who, poor as they are, would be ashamed to beg; and who by the
